

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE TO FRANCE.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: I wish to put a question to the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Newcastle), relative to an apparent omission from the correspondence of our Government with the Governments of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, on the subject of the annexation of Savoy, as contained in the papers recently presented to Parliament. It appears that on the 27th of January Lord Cowley wrote to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for instructions respecting the language he should hold on the subject. These instructions were sent to him by Lord John Russell on the 28th of January, in a despatch in which he gives excellent reasons against the annexation. That despatch was communicated to Lord Bloomfield at Berlin, who was desired, when he saw Baron Schleinitz, to make his language conformable to those instructions, but not to read it to him, much less to leave him a copy. The same letter was sent to Sir James Hudson, for his information. I find no other traces of any communication having been made by any Minister of ours to any of these three Courts, but I find it is reported that Lord John Russell has made use of these words,—“It is my persuasion—I may be totally mistaken, because other circumstances may occur to prevent it—but my persuasion is that if the language of disapproval be held at Berlin, Vienna, and St. Petersburg, this project of annexation will not be persevered in.” In that I entirely concur; but it is not sufficient to state that that will be the effect if these several Powers hold the language of disapproval. It appears to me to be also necessary to take steps to bring them to a common opinion, and to the use of a common language; without that it is idle to suppose that any isolated expression of opinion on our part would be of any effect in putting a stop to this project. I have no doubt in my own mind as to the character of the language which the several Powers of Europe ought to hold. I think they ought to say that, considering the territorial changes effected by the peace of Zurich, and the present state of Central Italy, they are willing and desirous to take steps for the purpose of conferring and consulting with France as to the future of Italy, with a view to securing the welfare of the Italian people in any way consistent with the repose of Europe; but that, looking back to the transactions of the year 1815, they consider that the frontier of France as then settled was finally settled, and that no consideration will induce them to acquiesce in its extension as arising out of any changes in the territorial distribution of Italy. What I wish to ask the Government is, whether any steps have been taken, and, if any, of what kind, and at what time, to communicate the views of the Government with respect to the annexation of Savoy to the Governments of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, and whether steps have been taken to obtain their co-operation in inducing France to desist from that project?

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE:—I have no difficulty in answering the question of the noble Earl. The views of Her Majesty's Government in respect to the proposed annexation of Savoy have been communicated to the three Governments of Russia, Prussia, and Austria. The form in which those communications have been made has been to send to those Powers the despatches written by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to Lord Cowley, which appear in the papers laid before Parliament, and to send at the same time other despatches received from Lord Cowley and one from Sir James Hudson, the whole of which have been laid upon the table of the House. As regards the time, the dates of the despatches to which I have referred are the 28th of January and the 13th of February. The communication was forwarded to Berlin and Vienna on the 17th of February and to St. Petersburg on the 25th of the same month. As to the noble Earl's question whether we have invited the co-operation of these Powers in a protest against the annexation of Savoy, I have to say that no specific proposition of that kind has been made. The noble Earl would appear to indicate his wish to see something in the nature of a counter-alliance formed; but there has not been any proposal of the sort. If he refers to the despatches on the table, they will show him and the public that the Powers to whom these communications were addressed can be under no difficulty in ascertaining the strong view which Her Majesty's Government entertain on this subject.

The Earl of Ellenborough

THE EARL OF DERBY:—I have, also, a question to put to the noble Duke on this subject. Upon examination of the papers it appears there was a despatch received from Lord Cowley on the 25th of February, in which he refers to his having been written to by Lord John Russell the day before on the subject of the annexation; but no despatch from the noble Lord of that date is to be found in the papers. I see there is another communication on the subject of the annexation of the same date, but it appears to have been received before. It is possible that the mistake may have arisen in that way; but I should be glad to know whether there is any other despatch of the date of the 24th of February.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: There has been no mistake of the kind the noble Earl supposes. The despatch to which the noble Earl refers did not appear to be of any particular importance, but there is not the smallest objection to produce it, and my noble Friend the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs has it in his hand at this moment ready to lay on the table.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.

THE ADDRESS. NOTICE.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, the House would recollect that on the previous evening he mentioned the course which the Government proposed to take respecting the Address relating to the Commercial Treaty with France. Their Lordships were, no doubt, aware that the Motion intended to come on in the other House was postponed from last night to Thursday. It would be, therefore, impossible to move the Address in that House on as early a day as had been intended. It might, however, come up from the other House in time, so that notice might be given for Monday. But as it was possible that the debate in the other House might be adjourned, and as it would be convenient to their Lordships to have a day definitively fixed for the discussion there, he begged to propose Thursday in next week, which would answer equally well whether the Address came up to that House on Friday or Monday.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had no objection to Thursday week; but a noble Lord (Lord Teynham) had a notice on the books for that night for bringing forward some Motion about vote by ballot.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he had not recollected the circumstance at the moment. He hoped the noble Lord would not be indisposed to postpone his Motion for a day or two, and he would communicate with him on the subject.

GRAND CANAL, MIDLAND, GREAT WESTERN, AND GREAT SOUTHERN AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANIES BILL.
PETITION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE presented a Petition of the Inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood of Portumna, against this Bill. The noble Marquess said the Bill involved matters of the greatest public importance, as it was a proposition for the amalgamation of two railway companies, which engrossed the whole west and south of Ireland, with the Grand Canal, which was the only other means of accommodation for a considerable portion of country lying between the two railways. Although the Bill was a private one it involved a matter of the greatest importance to Ireland. There would be found in their Lordships' library many Acts of Parliament by which the public money had been advanced to the Grand Canal Company. The grants specifically for the inland navigation of the Shannon amounted to £133,100. There was a share of a grant of £1,000,000 for public works amounting to £54,649; and a share of another grant of £250,000—so that he was within the mark when he said that £200,000 of public money had been spent upon the navigation of the Shannon, which by this Bill was coolly proposed to be transferred to these railway companies. A large district of country lying between these railways was entirely dependent on them for communication; but this Bill would place the public altogether at their mercy. It would be said, perhaps, that clauses could be introduced by which tolls and rates might be fixed; but there could be no security that the railway companies would not take off the steamboats and bring the whole of the west, the centre, and the south of Ireland under their control. It was absurd to leave such a Bill to be dealt with in a Select Committee, and he should therefore oppose the Bill when it came before their Lordships.

The EARL OF LUCAN begged to thank the noble Marquess for calling attention to this Bill, which affected the interests of a large portion of the population of Ireland. The Bill came before the House under a false title. It was called a Railway Bill; but its object was to throw the navigation into the hands of the railway companies. It was most objectionable that any canal should be in the hands of any railway company—so much so that, two years ago, a Bill was passed requiring railway companies to come to Parliament before purchasing any canal whatever. The objection was much stronger in this case, where the canal was to be held by the two principal railway companies in the country, who claimed as their territory the whole of the west, north-west, south-west, and centre of Ireland. The Bill would be most mischievous in its operation. Had this amalgamation Bill passed five years ago, they would never have got a railway from Athlone to the west. This was not a mere Private Bill, but involved a question of public principle, and he thought the House should not allow it to go before a Private Bill Committee.

LORD MONTEAGLE concurred in all that had been stated against this Bill. The measure ought not to be dealt with as an ordinary Private Bill, for it was really a Public Bill of a very dangerous tendency. An attempt of this character was made some years ago; but it appearing to the Board of Trade that it was directly contrary to the public interests that such a measure should proceed, the Board gave notice to oppose it on that ground. He hoped that the same course would now be taken. He thought it a sufficient argument against allowing this Bill to pass that he had not heard a single opinion in favour of this Bill from persons connected with Ireland.

LORD REDESDALE said, this Bill was one of a class which very strongly impressed upon his mind the necessity of having a Department in this country to watch over these matters. The traffic of the country, as conducted by railways and canals, required supervision. Some years since a Railway Board had been established in connection with the Board of Trade, but it had since been discontinued. Besides the powers for purchasing the canal, this Bill contained other powers known as "working arrangements." A Bill of the same kind, promoted by the London and North Western and Great Northern Railway Companies, had been rejected last Session; but it was again before Parliament. All the House could do in this case was to allow the Bill to go before a Select Committee. The Board of Trade proposed in such cases that the tolls allowed to be taken should be such that the canal might always remain fairly open to traffic. It was evident that some authoritative council was needed; for although the Board of Trade had been at great pains in these matters, it was impossible, constituted as the Board was, that it could take the lead in protecting the public interest in such cases. The business coming before the Board was so multifarious that matters were handed over from one officer to another, and no one knew how they were dealt with. The railway interest was always strong enough to overbear the interference of the Board of Trade. He wondered that the railway companies had not arrived at the conclusion that the more they accommodated the public the more they would benefit themselves. By the Orders of the House this Bill after being read a second time would go before a Select Committee. It would come before the House again on the third reading; but the House would probably not be disposed to reverse the decision of the Committee. He had nothing to suggest as to the course to be taken on this Bill; but he thought it highly desirable that the Government should adopt some means whereby they might exercise control over the plans promoted by great railway companies, and which seriously affected the public interests.

THE EARL OF SHELburnE believed that the railway interest would be extremely benefited by the creation of such a Department as had been referred to by the noble Lord who spoke last, either in connection with the existing Board of Trade or in the establishment of an entirely new tribunal. He thought that such an authoritative body would be of great assistance to those who sought to carry out great works of public utility, as well as to the populations these were designed to accommodate.

After a few words from the Marquess of WESTMEATH,

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that a Government Department for the regulation of railways was no doubt desired by many of the railways and also by the public. In the first instance, the action of such a Board would be beneficial; but that which had happened before would happen again. Parties would complain of the decisions of the Board, the department would not be supported by the public and its influence would thus be weakened.

Lord Redesdale

The Bill, at the first view, seemed to deprive the public of the advantage of the competition they at present enjoyed. That circumstance would be one of the elements for the consideration of the Select Committee, and if they thought that the powers asked by the company deprived the public of the competition they ought to have they could act accordingly. He saw no reason why the general course should not be followed in this case. Let the Bill be referred to a Select Committee and let them decide whether it was one of those cases in which it was desirable to affirm the amalgamation.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that the public would not be represented at all before the Committee. As a question of inland navigation, this case went far beyond that of a common canal; and he now gave notice that he would object to the third reading of the Bill unless it was altered in some way by which the public would be guaranteed against the mischiefs that he apprehended from it.

DWELLINGS FOR LABOURING CLASSES (IRELAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE moved the second reading of this Bill, which was to enable persons who borrowed money from the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, for the improvement of estates in Ireland, to borrow money also for the purpose of building dwellings for the labouring classes. The Bill had been introduced last year and had passed their Lordships' House.

LORD REDESDALE said, it was true that the Bill had passed the House of Lords last year, but as it was by no means desirable that a system should be introduced by which the building of labourers' cottages should be made a charge upon land, a clause should be inserted giving the Commissioners power to judge of the necessity of the proposed new buildings, and at the same time to see that where the buildings were introduced to replace old ruinous dwellings the latter were destroyed. He hoped the noble Marquess would consent to the insertion of such an Amendment in the present Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH objected to the Bill, but hoped that if it passed care would be taken that loans were not granted unless the plans of the proposed cottages were laid before the Commissioners, as in the case of the improvement of estates by drainage, &c. There was nothing on the face of the Bill that put a limit on the amount to be granted.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH, also hoped that the noble Marquess would consent to the introduction of the provision in question, without which he must oppose it.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, in reply, gave some explanations which were inaudible.

Bill read 2^a.

ATTORNEYS, SOLICITORS, PROCTORS, AND CERTIFICATED CONVEYANCERS
BILL.

SECOND READING.

LORD CHELMSFORD, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, he was anxious to explain the circumstances under which it was introduced when there was already another measure of the same character before the Legislature. The whole of the laws with respect to attorneys and solicitors were comprised in the statute 6th and 7th Vict., which regulated the admission of attorneys to the roll and other matters. The experience of sixteen years had shown that the existing system required amendment, and that legal education was susceptible of improvement. The Incorporated Law Society having turned its attention to the subject, prepared a Bill for the improvement of the law, which was circulated among the members of the different Inns of Court, was sent to the different law officers, and a copy was transmitted to each of Her Majesty's Judges. Every one who was acquainted with and had investigated the subject expressed their approbation of the Bill so framed, and among others, his noble and learned Friend now on the woolsack, then Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, who expressed his highest approbation of the measure, and undertook to introduce it to the House. That was done, and the Bill having been introduced under his noble and learned Friend's auspices, passed their Lordships' House, and was sent down to the House of Commons very late in the Session—on the 27th of July. It did not get into Committee till August, where in consequence of the interposition of the Board of Inland Revenue in a matter relative to the stamp duties, delay took place, and before the Bill could be passed the Session came to an end. It was the intention of the Incorporated Law Society to have re-introduced their Bill on the opening of the present Session; but it being necessary to communicate with the Inns of Court and the Board of Inland Revenue with respect to the machinery for the certificates, some delay took place, and in the meantime an hon. and learned Friend, a Member of the House of Commons, introduced a Bill which, with some alterations, had come up to their Lordships' House. That Bill was framed in a very remarkable manner. The Bill which under the auspices of his noble and learned Friend had passed their Lordships' House, contained thirty-one clauses, embodying a general plan for the regulation and improvement of the profession generally. The hon. and learned Gentleman to whom he had alluded selected eight clauses of that Bill, and imported them into his own, adding three original clauses. When the Bill was introduced, the Incorporated Law Society put themselves into communication with the hon. and learned Gentleman, and requested him either to withdraw his measure in favour of the larger scheme which they proposed, or to delay its progress for a stage or two, in order that both measures might be before the House of Commons at the same time. That, however, was refused, and the Bill went into Committee; when the Incorporated Law Society endeavoured to procure the insertion of the twenty-three remaining clauses of their Bill; but the Committee were of opinion that the general scope of the Bill did not admit of the insertion of those clauses, and said it was too great an alteration to be made in Committee. The Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman therefore proceeded, and having passed the House of Commons, was brought up to their Lordships' House. Under these circumstances, the Bill, the second reading of which he now moved, had been prepared at the instance of the Incorporated Law Society, the object of which was to elevate the character of the profession generally, to raise the standard of legal education, and to confer privileges on certain classes of persons who desired to be admitted to practice as attorneys. Nothing could be more inconvenient or contrary to their policy and mode of legislation than to allow two Bills to effect the same object to be introduced in the same Session, when the whole of the provisions might be incorporated into one measure; and it was, therefore, desirable that they should pass a Bill which had already substantially received their sanction, and not allow the introduction of the Bill brought up from the other House. It was not necessary to describe at any length the general scope of the measure he was now advocating; but there were one or two provisions of great importance on which he would make an observation. Under the present system no person could be admitted an attorney without having served five years as an articled clerk; it was proposed to give to persons who had taken a degree at any of the Universities the privilege of being admitted after a three years' service under articles, and to others who had passed a creditable examination the privilege of being admitted after a four years' service. There could be no doubt that such a provision would tend to raise the character of the profession. It was proposed also to give to persons who had served for ten years as clerks in attorneys' offices—not those who did the mere drudgery, but clerks who were engaged in a sort of business in which attorneys themselves would be engaged, and which necessarily tended to improve their professional knowledge—the privilege of being admitted after serving as articled clerks three years. He had at first thought that clause objectionable, as operating against the interest of gentlemen who, having received a liberal education, chose the profession of attorneys; but, after mature deliberation, he thought that the privilege ought to be conferred upon persons of that class who had faithfully and honestly served as clerks to attorneys for long periods, and had thereby acquired a high degree of professional knowledge and experience. There was some alteration in this Bill and the last one with respect to conveyancers, who, instead of being permitted to renew their certificates at their own option, would now do so under the sanction of the Inns of Court.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he rejoiced that the Bill had been brought before the House by his noble and learned Friend, and expressed his approval of those clauses that related to a meritorious class of persons the managing clerks, and which would tend to raise them in society. He trusted that some provision would be introduced to test their literary acquirements. He also expressed his approval of the provisions with reference to certificated conveyancers.

Lord Chelmsford

After some explanation from Lord CRAWFORTH,

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

INDIA—ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

LORD MONTEAGLE moved an humble Address to Her Majesty for Copies of the Statement founded on detailed Reports from the several Presidencies and Districts in India, and exhibiting the moral and material Progress of India, directed to be annually prepared and laid before Parliament under 21 & 22 Vict., c. 106, s. 53; also, all Correspondence between the Government of India and the Home Government relating thereto; And also Copies of any Correspondence between the Secretary of State for India and the Government of India on the subject of the Introduction of a Government Bank and Paper Currency in India. The noble Lord said, that Parliament usually contented itself with the belief that when it had directed a certain thing to be done, compliance with its directions was sure to follow. With regard to India, at least, that was not always the case. When in 1858 the question of the government and administration of the East India Company's territories was before Parliament, it was found that extremely important provisions in the law, with reference to a three-fold selection of candidates and with reference to private patronage in the civil service, had never been put into practice—they had been allowed to remain a dead letter. So also with regard to a provision in the Act of Parliament requiring the Company to apply certain sums annually to the purposes of education. In consequence of these and other neglects he (Lord Monteaale) called the attention of the House to the subject, and proposed that, as in the Colonial Department, a blue-book relative to the administration of these matters in India should be annually laid before the House. It was then argued that the matter had better be left in the hands of the Government; he did so; and nothing had been done in the matter. In 1858 he brought the matter before Lord Stanley, the Secretary for India, and a clause was introduced ordering that annual accounts should be furnished, accompanied by statements prepared from detailed reports from each Presidency, exhibiting the moral and material progress of India. The accounts only had been given, but no detailed statement; and the accounts which ought to have been published in May last were not yet forthcoming. It was, however, added in a note to the accounts "that the statement exhibiting the moral and material progress of India had not yet been received from the Government of India." The Home Government was made aware of this in 1859, and he presumed there must be some correspondence on the question. With reference to the last part of his Motion, he learned through the public papers that there was a measure of enormous importance under discussion in India—a measure which if rightly described assumed that the Government of India were about to establish themselves in the position of bankers, issuing promissory notes payable on demand. Now, he did not say that this was an improper measure, but he could hardly imagine the case of any country, either abroad or at home, in connection with which a more important or critical question could arise for the consideration of the House than that of any Government assuming the position of a banker, and dealing in financial, pecuniary, and commercial affairs; but if that Government were a despotic Government, and if there were any case of exigency—and they knew the exigency under which the Government of India had been compelled to exist—if so easy and tempting a remedy as that of issuing a little more paper money to relieve itself from a pressing difficulty presented itself, he feared it might be too often induced to relieve itself in this way from its difficulty. It was a question calculated to create alarm and apprehension. We ought to know something of this matter, and how the matter was viewed by the mercantile communities of Calcutta and Bombay, and if such a scheme was really to be taken into the hands of Government, what were its recommendations and the plea for proposing it. It was altogether a question that called for the utmost consideration and the greatest possible care.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL must be excused following the noble Lord into a defence of the East India Company against the accusations he had brought against them, seeing that they were now dead and buried. These complaints, whether well or ill-founded, had nothing to do with the form of Government, although the noble Lord had insinuated that the same thing might arise under the new form of Government. With regard to the papers, for which the noble Lord had moved, the statistical returns had not been received at the India House. No very voluminous correspondence had taken place on the subject; but he believed that the Indian Government had been asked to produce the statement, and whenever it was produced it would be laid before Parliament. The clause in the Act was certainly vaguely worded when it referred to the "moral and material progress of the country." That was a very general topic, and he did not think that returns pursuant to such an order would have enlightened his noble Friend on the question of currency. With regard to the issue of bank notes said to be in contemplation, his right hon. Friend the Secretary for India had received a copy of a Minute issued by Mr. Wilson. He (the Duke of Argyll) believed that the construction put upon a part of that document in England was a mistaken one; but it was the wish of his right hon. Friend not to produce the Minute until he was also able to produce his own Despatch in answer to it. As soon as his right hon. Friend's reply was sent out there would be no objection to lay both before Parliament.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH hoped that nobody would be sanguine enough to expect ever to see the return now asked for. In India they would not understand what was wanted; or, if they did, there would be no one to employ for the purpose. Perhaps a Report might in time be forthcoming; it would be very voluminous, and probably not worth having. He would suggest that the only practical way to obtain the voluminous mass of information would be by schedule and Act of Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE thought that if things existed in India as described by the noble Earl, it argued a degree of incapacity for the new Government of India that might have been supposed to belong only to the old. It was no more impossible to make these reports upon India than it was to make these reports in connection with other colonies. All the Colonies of Great Britain, from Heligoland upwards furnished similar returns to those now asked for, showing their moral and material progress, and if they could not be procured respecting India it would be owing to the virtual re-creation of the effete and absurd Board of Directors, chosen out of almost the same body, and serving as a screen for negligence. The Colonial Minister had no difficulty in getting these reports, and he did not see why there should be any difficulty in this case. He trusted the question of paper currency was one that would be fully discussed.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: It is no use sending out the order when there is no one to obey it.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, if it were impossible to make out the return the officials ought to report to that effect, and prove it; but it was not proper that the servants of the Government should have the power of saying whether they would obey the orders of Parliament or not.

LORD MONTEAGLE then withdrew that portion of his Motion relating to a Government Bank and Paper Currency.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE LUNACY (SCOTLAND) ACT.

QUESTION.

MR. STIRLING said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce into Parliament in the present Session any Bill to amend the Lunacy (Scotland) Act. He would also ask how it is that the Scotch Reform Bill has not as yet been issued to Members, although the English and Irish Bills have been for some days delivered?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, with respect to the Scotch Lunacy Act, the matter was under the consideration of the Lord Advocate, and the right hon. and learned Lord would shortly ask leave to introduce a Bill. He believed he might say the Scotch Reform Bill would be in the hands of Members to-morrow.

The Marquess of Clanricarde

CAVALRY AND INFANTRY COMMISSIONS. QUESTION.

SIR HENRY STRACEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War if a Colonel on full pay of Cavalry, on becoming a General, and thereby being precluded from selling and receiving the same pay as the Colonel promoted from Infantry, but having paid £1,675 for his Commissions above that paid by the Infantry General, would still have to pay the difference between Infantry and Cavalry, if appointed to a Cavalry Regiment?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he feared the House would not derive much information from these questions on the relative prices of Commissions. The subject was very intricate, and it was difficult to render it intelligible. An Officer in the position described by the question of the hon. Baronet, would not (we understood) be called on to pay the difference.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he would also beg to ask, Whether, as it is proposed to equalize the prices of Cavalry and Infantry Commissions, Cavalry Officers who have in accordance with existing regulations, paid the larger sums, will receive credit for the extra money when purchasing their future promotion; for instance, will a Cornet, who has paid £840 for his Cornetcy have, to pay £250 more for a Lieutenancy, worth only £700?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT, in reply, stated that Officers of Cavalry would not be entitled to receive anything of the Crown till they sold out. On selling their Commissions they would, of course, receive back the difference.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE TO FRANCE.—QUESTION.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL brought up a letter of the 24th of January last from Lord Cowley to Lord John Russell, and which had been omitted from the correspondence laid upon the Table relative to the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, without having given the noble Lord the usual notice he would beg to ask him, Whether he will have any objection to lay upon the Table any additional Correspondence that may have reached the Foreign Office upon the same subject since the publication of the last Despatches?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL, in reply, said, he could not avoid remarking upon the inconvenience of asking questions regarding Foreign Affairs without placing them on the Notice Papers, as was the case with questions of a domestic nature. It was certainly right that the same rule should be adhered to with respect to questions on Foreign Affairs, which were usually of a more delicate nature. He was not prepared to say whether he could lay any more papers on the Table on the subject referred to; but as soon as the Government had decided that it could be done with propriety, he should lose no time in producing them.

MR. DISRAELI said, he desired also to inquire as to the production of certain private letters of Lord Cowley to the noble Lord, and which were referred to in the public Despatches.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL was understood to say the private letters could not be produced, and desired to know for what object the right hon. Gentleman required them.

MR. DISRAELI said, he would ask the question to-morrow, and state the reasons why he did so.

ARMY (SALE AND PURCHASE OF COMMISSIONS.)—ADDRESS MOVED.

SIR DE LACY EVANS (who was very imperfectly heard) said, he rose to move, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to order the gradual abolition, as soon as practicable, of the sale and purchase of commissions in the army (having due regard to existing rights)—with the view of substituting for the purchase system, promotion partly by seniority and partly by selection, grounded on war services of merit, length of colonial and home services, and attested professional fitness—under such regulations as Her Majesty shall be pleased to direct. The system of purchase was, he believed, as it at present stood, productive of the greatest abuses which existed in the army of any civilized country in the world. It imposed, as far as he could ascertain, a tax on the officers of our army amounting to £4,742,000, which was the actual sum of the commissions calculated at the price which might be legally expended. Now, in order to get rid of a system such as that, desirable as its abolition might be, he did not propose that any very great sacrifice on the part of the country should be incurred, because he felt convinced that if the authorities were in earnest in the matter they might allow the system to die away without rendering any great pecuniary loss necessary. Instead, however, of pursuing a course by which a result so desirable would be secured, different rules and regulations had of late been introduced into the service, by which the present state of things, instead of being remedied, was likely to be aggravated. He did not, however, seek by his Motion to effect any sudden change in the system, but was simply desirous of carrying out in the main the views which had been advocated by the Royal Commission which had been appointed to inquire into the subject, merely going a little further in what might be considered the reform of our military system. Indeed, it was well known that many Members of the Commission, including, he believed he might say, the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary for War, were desirous of going a little farther, and of including majors and lieutenant colonels in the non-purchasing ranks. Therefore he would propose that, as regarded the ranks of major and lieutenant colonel, the system of purchase should cease. At the date of the commission there were 222 lieutenant colonels and 258 majors in the army, including the West India regiments; and it appeared that between the years 1851 and 1855, 40 lieutenant colonels and 46 majors retired from the service. They might therefore assume from that the ratio of the retirement of those officers. Taking this basis he calculated that the sum that would be required in the present year to effect his proposal would be about £67,000; for the second year, £62,000; for the third year, £58,000; and so on. The present system allowed the incompetent officer to take the place of the competent. As an instance, he referred to a letter he had received from an officer of the highest capacity who had been passed over fourteen times. He mentioned the case of another officer who had been passed over eighteen times; and yet, strange to say, that officer was still an advocate for the system of purchase. Another officer, a man of great merit, had been passed over twenty times. After the Crimean war, in which the officers and soldiers were not less distinguished by gallantry and endurance than those in any former war, it was felt that a deficiency existed somewhere, and a Royal Commission was appointed, consisting of five civil and five military members. This Commission, which, however, was not constituted in a manner to secure perfect impartiality between the two branches of the service, heard evidence; and the result of their investigation was a Report, showing, in fact, the inexpediency of the system of promotion by purchase. One of the recommendations of this Commission was, that officers should be professionally educated, and he (Sir De Lacy Evans) wondered that this had not been attended to before now, as the education of non-commissioned officers and privates was for some time in operation most successfully. He was, however, sorry to say that this recommendation had not been followed up. Again, he wished to ask why the competitive system, which had been introduced into most of our civil departments, and obtained in the military departments of France, should not be introduced into our army. It appeared on the authority of the Report of the Commissioners, that at present commissions in the Guards cost 100 per cent more than the regulation price, while commissions in the Line and Cavalry cost 50 per cent over the regulation price. With regard to the comparative merits of the purchase with the non-purchase system, he thought that the experience of two services which were employed in the Crimea gave them a lesson that was most useful—he alluded to the Cavalry and Artillery. In the first of these the system of purchase was not in operation, whilst in the latter it was more rife than in any other arm of the military service. How, then, had the system of non-purchase in the Artillery and the system of purchase in the Cavalry worked in the Crimea? Why, the Cavalry lost all their horses the very first winter, and were scarcely able to exist; but when the campaign had ended, the Artillery were even in a more efficient state than when the siege of Sebastopol commenced. The time had come when it behoved the authorities at the Horse Guards to adopt any and every improvement in the organization of the army that could be suggested. Undoubtedly those who thought that the Treaty of Commerce with France would eventuate in the establishment of peace all over the world might regard the matter as of little import; but he could anticipate no such result from the Treaty of Commerce. He was not opposed to that Treaty—far from it; but he put no faith in it as a conservator of the peace of Europe. In his opinion the political sky was lowering;

Sir De Lacy Evans

wars and rumours of wars prevailed throughout the Continent, and the Emperor of the French in his recent speech to the Legislative Chamber had openly declared his resumption of the policy of conquest. Under these circumstances, it was the duty of the Government to maintain the army in the highest possible state of efficiency, and he ventured to submit that that could never be accomplished under the present impolitic system of promotion by purchase. He hoped, therefore, that the House generally would concur in the Resolution which he begged leave to move.

Motion made, and Question proposed.—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to order the gradual abolition, as soon as practicable, of the Sale and Purchase of Commissions in the Army (having due regard to existing rights),—with the view of substituting for the Purchase System, promotion, partly by seniority and partly by selection, grounded on War services of merit, length of Colonial and Home services, and attested professional fitness,—under such regulations as Her Majesty shall be pleased to direct.”

MR. RICH said, he felt much pleasure in seconding a Motion which nobody could have introduced with greater propriety than the hon. and gallant General who had won his way to honours and promotion by valiant exploits spread over half a century of service. His observations on the subject were so important that he trusted they would be placed in extenso before the public. The substantial question which was raised by the Motion was whether money or merit should prevail. Now, although he was perfectly aware that many who had risen to the command of regiments by virtue of the system of purchase had afterwards proved themselves to be admirably well fitted for the advancement which they had thus obtained, thus accidentally joining merit to money; yet, until hon. Gentlemen could show some necessary connection between money and merit he must hold that this practice, so contrary to all our principles and practice in every other Department of the State, of buying promotion and command, was neither consistent with the safety nor the honour of the country. The system was one which almost everybody was prepared to admit could not be defended on abstract grounds, and among those who maintained that opinion he might reckon the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War as well as the noble Lord at the head of the Government. He well recollected his right

hon. Friend's condemnation of the principle, and stating his determination to alter it whenever an opportunity offered. It was, however, asserted that by means of the system as it stood the efficiency of the army, that is to say the supply of officers of appropriate age and qualifications, was satisfactorily upheld. Now, upon that point he was prepared to join issue with its advocates, leaving out of account the last eight or ten years, during which period, owing to the wars in China, India, Persia, and the Crimea, far more than the ordinary number of officers had been appointed, and too many of them swept away. Previous to that period, however, he found that the average age of ensigns and cornets in the army was 21; that of lieutenants between 28 and 29; that of captains 38; that of majors between 43 and 44; that of lieutenant colonels, 49½; of major generals nearly 60; of lieutenant generals, 65 and upwards; and of full generals, above 70. Now no one would contend that these were appropriate ages for the respective ranks which he had just enumerated, and yet this was the undeniable result of the purchase system, bolstered up as it had been by very frequent brevets, by a vast increase of general officers and by so profuse a sale of unattached commissions as to elicit even the condemnation of a high authority at the Horse Guards. It left us in 1850 with our youngest grey-headed major general older by many years than the Duke of Wellington when he had laid down his sword after some fifteen years, not of a major general's but of supreme command, and thirty years older than Napoleon when he commenced his career of victory. There were, indeed, men so peculiarly constituted by nature—for instance, Sir C. Campbell—as to be able at a very advanced age to perform efficiently the duties which attached to their position, but such hardy veterans were only marvellous exceptions to the general rule to the unbending laws of human decay. The same objections applied to all the other ranks of which he had shown the inappropriate, and therefore detrimental ages. Thus the system of purchase had broken down, yet the Resolution of the gallant Officer opposite (Captain Leicester Vernon) recommended that it should be persevered in; and why? because promotion by seniority had failed in the Artillery, Engineers, and Marines. He granted that the promotion in these corps had not been rapid; but then it should be remembered that the Engineers and Artillery had not the advantage of exchanges, and moreover had fewer facilities with regard to the half-pay list, while in these corps and in the Marines there were fewer field officers than in the purchasing corps. It did not, however, follow that because a system of narrow seniority did not succeed the system of purchase must be upheld. He saw no connection between the failure of one system and the falsely assumed success of the other. One might have failed more than the other; but he contended both had failed, and what was now required was a system of combined seniority and selection to be carefully and honestly applied to the army, and the first step should be to put an end to the purchase of the rank of field officer. The purchase system too had broken down by the constant and flagrant transgression by the army of all the rules and regulations laid down by authority for keeping its prices within appointed limits. The Duke of Wellington felt this abuse so strongly that he issued a stringent order to the effect that any officer giving or receiving beyond the regulation price should be subject to be cashiered. The Duke had a strong hand and a resolute will, yet here he was not strong enough to contend with mere degrees of corruption. His orders were utterly fruitless. So, too, the Duke of York when he thought to curb this corruption by requiring that every officer who bought or sold a commission should declare on his word of honour that he had neither given nor would give, directly or indirectly, more than the regulation price—yet it was in palpable evidence that commissions brought 50 or 100 per cent beyond the regulation price. Was there not something inherently false and wrong in a system which no orders, no laws could bend. It was said that, by means of purchase, retirement was provided for old officers; but there could be no question that the grant of a moderate pension was much preferable. There were two classes of purchasers—one, men of large fortune and high station, who went into the army with all the gallant spirit of youth ready to put themselves in the very front of danger, but who after a time, wearying of the service, retired to their estates or filled seats in this or the other House of Parliament. It was good for these young men to go into such a school as the army; but it might have been still better for them to have learnt more of duty and obedience in its subordinate ranks, than to have rushed on by extravagant purchases to premature commands, and most undoubtedly it would have been better for the army. For instance, when in command of regiments they induced a system of expense—not extravagant in them, but mischievously so for their associates, and that was, in fact, the secret of the present check which Cavalry regiments had experienced; sober people being afraid to trust their sons in them far more because of their extravagant habits than the mere price of the commission. The other class of purchasers consisted of young men of high aspirations, proud hearts, and cool heads, who took the army as a profession, were ready to make any sacrifice to rise in it, purchasing each successive step and straining every nerve to raise the means. These were valuable and brave officers, the very men to command our regiments. But we too frequently lost their services just when they were becoming most valuable. It is well known that when officers become generals they forfeit the privilege of selling their commissions. Too many of these officers, therefore, pressed by the pecuniary sacrifices they had made to purchase their commissions, sell them when they approach the rank of general, and so they are lost to the service, while to induce others to remain, the pay of a general officer having a regiment is made double that of an Admiral so as to enable them to recoup some of the money they have squandered on their commissions. It is thus that in this item alone the country expends little less than an £100,000 a year in indirect support of the purchase system, which we are told is so economical, but which is, in fact, extravagant in a mere money point of view, but infinitely more costly in all that regards a nation's and an army's weal by its open disregard for all merit that has not money in its pocket. In the navy the system of combined-selection and seniority has answered well; up to 1850 there was a less slow promotion in the navy than in the army; and our naval officers were on a much younger scale than the army. It is not impracticable to adopt the same system in the army. For these reasons he hoped the House would entertain the Motion of the gallant General. His hon. and gallant Friend was quite right not to press it to the full extent of putting an immediate end to the purchase system; but it was to be hoped that the Government would give that encouragement to a gradual abolition which was embodied in the proposal that no purchase should be allowed above the rank of captain, and that the command of regiments should be by selection. If that were adopted it would be received by the public as a great boon and a step in the right direction, while it would relieve a great number of deserving officers from the pain of seeing themselves passed over, and leave the army open to those enterprising, gallant, and high-spirited young men of all classes whose services we could little afford to dispense with.

CAPTAIN LEICESTER VERNON said, he rose to move an Amendment to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster of which he had given notice, and which was to this effect:—

“That whereas the promotion in the seniority corps already existing—namely, the Royal Artillery, Royal Engineers, and Royal Marines, being of an unsatisfactory character, this House is of opinion that it is not desirable to extend the seniority system to the whole of the army.”

He had not the least doubt that the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans) had exhausted in argument all that could be found in support of his proposition. If he answered those arguments rather inferentially than in detail, he hoped it would not be supposed that he was wanting in courtesy, but the fact was, he must confess, he had heard very little of them indeed. He gathered that the hon. and gallant Member said something about professional education, but that applied equally whether promotion was by purchase or seniority. The hon. and gallant Member also urged that the service was weakened; he did not hear whether by a system of purchase or a system of seniority, but he concluded by seniority, because they found that a system of seniority did weaken the service, not only morally but physically. The hon. and gallant Member afterwards said something about the Admiralty, but he could not follow him there, because he confessed he was entirely at sea as to what the hon. and gallant Gentleman said. The Motion had been seconded by the hon. Member for Richmond (Mr. Rich), and he thought they ought to take that occasion to give their warmest thanks to the hon. Member for being ready on all occasions to advocate what he believed to be the interests of the army. If the hon. Member did not happen to be quite in the right groove, it might be owing to his not being in the profession. The hon. Member had taken a bold course, and said he would narrow the question to one of merit and money. There he should join issue with him. The hon. Member gave a certain A B C illustration of various positions, but he seemed scarcely to understand the alphabet of what he was talking about. The hon. Member spoke of the age of officers, and, if this Amendment had been moved at the time the hon. Gentleman addressed the House, he should have thought he was seconding the proposition. It was upon the objection of age that the hon. Member relied, and he might fairly say that when the hon. Member had uttered one word in favour of his own views, he had uttered two in favour of those which he advocated. The hon. Member had also said that the Ordnance did not allow officers to go on half-pay. That was a mistake, for he (Captain L. Vernon) happened himself to be on the half-pay of the Royal Engineers. He felt diffidence in taking the step he had done in moving the Amendment, as it placed him in opposition on a military subject to the high rank and experience of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster, which entitled his opinions to considerable respect. It did more, it placed him in opposition to a popular feeling which he thought was a popular mistake, and if it were not for certain facts, and the deductions from those facts, he should hesitate to stand forward to arrest the progress of popular opinion, headed as it was by the hon. and gallant Member. He hoped the House would extend to him some indulgence, while he endeavoured to show that the seniority system was not entirely one of unmixed good for the army. It must be conceded that if purchase were done away with, the main condition of promotion must arise from death vacancies. But senior officers could not be persuaded to die for the purpose of promoting junior officers; therefore, it stood to reason that promotion must be very slow, and then arose the unsatisfactory position partly assumed by the hon. Member for Richmond—that the officers were too old for the rank. This was no haphazard assertion, but based on broad facts. What occurred in the seniority corps—the Engineers, Artillery, and Marines, which represented an army of 45,000 men? They must recollect that peace was the rule, and war the exception. That being so, in peace the subaltern officers of those corps served no less than 24 years before they reached the rank of captain. Now, 24 years was nearly a quarter of a century, and, according to the average duration of life, the prime of manhood did not exist for more than 20 years. What, then, must be the position of that service where the subaltern officers passed the whole of the prime of life in that rank—where they followed the beat of the drum from colony to colony, in the east and west, in the north and south, in Asia, in Africa, and in America, with but very rare glances at Europe? That was the condition of those officers, who passed the whole of the prime of life, without comfort, and what was more, without hope, for “hope which came to all no’er came to them.” The necessary consequence was, that when war came the senior officers were worn out. In the Peninsular war the Duke of Wellington’s best officers of Artillery and Engineers bore the rank of second captains and lieutenants. In the Crimean war the colonels of Engineers one after another broke down and failed physically. The whole work was left to second captains and lieutenants, and he asked was that the condition to which they would reduce the whole of the British Army? There was an opinion abroad that the purchase system threw the commissions of high rank in the army into the hands of those who, in the slang of the day, were called the “upper ten thousand.” Nothing was more unfounded. Any man who looked at the Army List would find that such was not the case. If they looked down the list they would find that for one Plantagenet there were fifty of the great clans of Smith, Brown, Jones, and Robinson; for one aristocrat there were fifty taken from the small gentry, from commerce, and from trade. The fastest Lancer he ever saw was the son of a Scotch upholsterer. The wildest Dragoon and the most tearing Hussar sprang respectively from a provincial banker and a country attorney. The son of the silversmith of his mess was a major of heavy Dragoons, and only the other day he admired the nodding helm and shining cuirass which encompassed the offspring of a London solicitor. The father of Havelock, the hero of Lucknow, was a Baptist minister. That showed that it was not the aristocracy to whom commissions were confined by a system of purchase. They were told that it did not admit of promotion from the ranks. He knew some instances to the contrary. Sir John Elley, who rose to the rank of a Lieutenant General and Colonel of the 17th Lancers, was a private in the Blues. General Cureton, who led the charge of the 14th Light Dragoons and turned the fortune of the day at Chillianwallah, enlisted as a trooper; and, no doubt, the Secretary for War could put his hand on many officers who fought as rank and file at Alma, Inkerman, and Balaklava. They had been told that the seniority system acted well in the East India Company's service. Was that really the case? Did they not find that promotion was such a drag that officers were obliged to invent a sort of purchase system of their own? Every man was compelled to subscribe a certain sum to purchase officers out. It was not voluntary. They were compelled, and the price which they gave was very nearly the price of the regulation in the Queen's service. The French system was cited as a model. They were told that they should look at the French system—how good that was. The French system was one-third by seniority, one-third by merit, and one-third by favour. If that were introduced into this country how long would it be before merit and favour under our representative system became one? How did it act in France at this moment? During the Crimean war some officers of French and English regiments were coming over together in the same transport, being wounded. The conversation turned, as was always the case with officers, upon promotion. One of our officers said, "Your service gives you fellows something like a chance." A French officer replied, "Erreur! mon ami, erreur! pour avancer chez nous faut avoir parent au Ministère de la Guerre." But did the system work well in France? There, if an officer had not attained a certain rank by a certain time, he was forced out of the service. He was fit for no other profession, and for the rest of his existence he hung on to the outskirts of society. All who had been abroad must have seen hanging about estaminets men whose upright carriage, close cropped, grizzled hair, and heavy moustache showed what they had been, and whose haggard faces and threadbare clothes showed painfully what they were. Was that the condition to which they would reduce the British officer? He thought that one of the reasons why France was so aggressive was her military system. They preferred a despotism, provided it was military. They preferred war to peace because the one was bread, the other starvation. It had been said that under our present system merit was not the thing, but money was, and that no person could be advanced by merit alone. Now, he could give them a most remarkable instance to the contrary; and if in doing so he had to speak of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster's merits to his face, he did it not to give that gallant General any annoyance, but because it was necessary for the argument. A friend connected with the service had procured him the following particulars respecting the career of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster:—

"In the summer of 1814, Lieutenant Evans of the 3rd Light Dragoons, then a very young man, was appointed to the Quartermaster-General's Department, and attached to the expedition under General Ross which sailed from the south of France, at the conclusion of the war with Napoleon, to operate on the coast of America. He was mentioned with great praise and recommended for promotion by General Ross in the despatches announcing the action at Bladensburg and the capture of Washington; again by General Brook, who succeeded to the command when Ross was killed at Baltimore; and again, a third and fourth time, by Generals Kean and Lambert in connection with the proceedings at New Orleans. For these meritorious services he was Gazetted to a company in the 5th West India Regiment, without purchase, on the 12th of January, 1815. He became a Major by brevet a month or two later, and in the promotion consequent on Waterloo he became a Lieutenant Colonel on the 18th of June of the same year, he having returned from America in time to be at that battle. Thus stepping in six months from the rank of Lieutenant to that of Lieutenant Colonel without the expenditure of a single shilling."

It would have been impossible for the hon. and gallant General to have accomplished such a rise as that in a seniority corps. With all the merit in the world—even with all his own merit—the gallant General would have stopped at the rank of captain, and never got beyond it. It was no disadvantage to an officer without money to be in a regiment where purchase went on. Put the case of a young man without money in a regiment where he was at the bottom of the lieutenants' list, and suppose every other officer in the regiment had money, and was to purchase; the whole of those above him would buy themselves out of his way, until he arrived at the top of the tree, where he would wait for that death vacancy or other casualty to give him promotion, which he would have had to have waited for otherwise in every step from the bottom. In a book which had been sent to him he found this passage:—

"What does not seem to have been sufficiently considered is the advantage derived from purchase by those whose poverty subjects them to the mortification of being passed over by juniors. The practical effect of the system is to bring those men rapidly to the top of their respective ranks, where they benefit by any vacancies occasioned by death, by brevet or by augmentation. For instance (said the writer), I myself, when a lieutenant and captain in the Guards, did not purchase; three juniors went over my head; but within a year of reaching the top of the list (having served on full pay for nineteen years) I obtained my promotion by a death vacancy; whereas, had the system of purchase not existed, there would have been no inducement to the senior officers of my regiment to retire, and ten or fifteen additional years would probably have elapsed before I could have attained a position where promotion would have been possible."

He could not give a stronger proof of the difference between regiments where seniority existed, and those where purchase prevailed than the fact stated in Her Majesty's regulations, that in the one case a man who had served six years in the army might have the rank of lieutenant colonel, whereas, in a seniority corps he had himself been for twenty-four years a subaltern, and nine years an ensign, thus remaining absolutely longer in the lowest rank than the period within which the regulations allowed an officer to attain the position of a lieutenant colonel. The same work from which he had already quoted said:—

"The routine of unremitted colonial service must produce considerable inefficiency among the officers of the army, and the result would inevitably be either to maintain an enormous retired establishment at the public charge to furnish a provision for the worn-out officers, or to leave the commissions of the army in the hands of those incompetent to discharge the duties attaching to them if it were not for one of those very anomalies to which we have alluded at the commencement of this division of our report—namely, the system of sale and purchase of commissions as authorized by the regulations of the service."

The same report went on to say:—

"It is manifested in these returns that by far the larger portion of officers are perfectly qualified for their duties, and it is equally apparent that this efficiency is maintained by the system of purchase."

The weight which ought to be attached to these extracts might be inferred from the fact that—

"The report from which these extracts are taken is signed by fourteen of the most distinguished men that ever met together in any country for any stated purpose—namely, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Richmond, Lords Melville, Howick, and Hill, Henry Labouchere, Admirals Sir Charles Adam, Sir Thomas Hardy, and Sir George Cockburn; Generals Sir James Kemp, Sir Hussey Vivian, Sir Alexander Dickson,

Sir Henry Hardinge, and Colonel Sir Richard Williams."

The hon. Member for Richmond (Mr. Rich.) had put the question as one of money versus merit. There was a sort of morbid feeling abroad that the effect of purchase was to admit rich blockheads to promotion, and to keep back the poor but efficient officer. Those who said that carried the argument a step further, maintaining that those who purchased were of necessity blockheads, and those who did not were the reverse. Was that really so? Put it to the test. Look at the successes of our armies, where purchase was the rule, and compare them with those of the French army, where such a system of advancement was unknown. He was not there either to dispute or depreciate the glory of the French. That nation had raised a triumphal arch to that glory which terminated the dusty road which the Parisians were pleased to designate the Elysian Fields, and on that monument were inscribed the victories of their arms. He knew not with what feeling other foreigners might look upon that record of their defeats; but he owned that, as an Englishman, he was able to look upon that triumphal arch with complacency. From Cressy to Waterloo, of none of our battles with the French had we any reason to be ashamed. He had heard that the name of Corunna appeared on the record to which he had referred; but that he fancied must be a mistake either of his informant or of the chisel of the artist. He had always thought that we won the day at Corunna, and that Sir John Moore died in the arms of victory. The war in the Peninsula was for six years one continued success. The heroes of Jena, Wagram, Marengo, and Austerlitz—Marmont, Massena—so often victorious where the English were not that he was called "L'enfant chéri de la victoire"—Jourdain—so often beaten where the English were that he was called "the anvil"—Victor, Suchet, and Soult, were all out-marched, out-generalled, out-fought, and driven back from the lines of Lisbon to the gates of Paris by our own Picton, Graham, Crawford, Beresford, Pakenham, and Hill. Then came the crowning field of glorious Waterloo, and there the star of Napoleon, the so-called soldier of merit, sank for ever before the genius of Wellington, the so-called soldier of purchase. All the Generals who had thus honourably vindicated the fame of England in the Peninsula were of the purchase school; all save Graham and Picton were under forty years of age—the age of subalterns in the seniority corps. With these glorious antecedents before us—with the brilliant example of the gallant General who had made the Motion on the one hand, and on the other the discouraging instance of the mover of the Amendment—both types of different systems—while it was not for him to devise what was the best system for promotion in the army, he trusted the House would not think him out of place in denouncing as the worst that under which he himself and many others had groaned for years—the seniority system.

Amendment proposed, —

“To leave out from the word ‘That’ to the end of the Question, in order to add the words ‘whereas the Promotion in the Seniority Corps already existing, namely, the Royal Artillery, Royal Engineers, and Royal Marines, being of an unsatisfactory character, this House is of opinion that it is not desirable to extend the Seniority System to the whole of the Army,’ instead thereof.”

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

COLONEL DICKSON said, he could not but think that the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster, in the course he had taken, was acting rather in unison with his own private opinion than from any particular zeal for the interests of the service of which he was so distinguished an ornament, and which certainly had assisted him in gaining the honours he enjoyed. He regretted the invidious distinctions which had been raised between the two services and between two branches of the same service. The gallant General had not been just to the Cavalry in the Crimea, whose services in the field at Balaklava must ever remain graven in the hearts of the nation. It was true that the Cavalry suffered much in the war; but it must be remembered that they had to undergo the brunt of a series of actions which the Artillery escaped; and that they were, moreover, in the main, inexperienced recruits, while the Artillery were experienced soldiers and seasoned to their duties in every quarter of the globe. It was hardly fair, therefore, to draw the comparison which he had drawn, and use it as an argument for the abolition of the system of purchase. Another element introduced into the discussion of this question was the influence of the press. An article appeared in the leading journal of that very morning, the direct object of which seemed to be to put some pressure on the Secretary of State for War, and to guide the Government in their decision upon this vitally important question. He was one of the last men to complain of the liberty of the press. He believed all classes and conditions of the people were greatly indebted to the press, and that it was to its influence we owed the saving of our army during the Crimean war. But letters were occasionally published in certain journals which displayed such ignorance of the subjects on which they treated, that all who wished to form an unprejudiced opinion would do well not to rely upon the statements they contained, but calmly and dispassionately consider the matter for themselves. When he saw letters, all bearing the stamp of one writer, and animated by the same spirit, setting forth that British officers were nothing but fashionable idlers and extravagant scapegraces, and that colonels of regiments introduced a system of expenditure utterly regardless of the condition of the younger officers, whom they led into extravagant habits in order that they might pamper their own luxurious tastes—when he saw charges so utterly unfounded as these brought forward—he felt they ought to be treated with contempt, but also that they might mislead inexperienced persons. As to the purchase system, he did not wish to stand up as a patron of abuse. He was quite aware that from unavoidable circumstances, and from the long continuance of peace, great abuses had crept in, and that a system which he believed conduced, on the whole, to the welfare of the army, had, on that account, arrived at a pitch of extravagance that required alteration; but he thought there was a wide difference between improvement and total destruction. The purchase system, he contended, was a direct advantage to the poor man whom it raised to rank along with his richer comrades. Suppose a man rose from the ranks, and became an officer, with small means, he struggled on, and for some years performed the duties of his new sphere, and lived a mere annuitant on his pay. If the purchase system did not exist, there he remained till old age overtook him, when he must retire on the wretched pittance of half-pay. But under the purchase system, he could (after serving his country as long as he was fit), realize a handsome competency, which enabled him to fix his family in the position of life to which his gallantry and his good conduct had conducted him. This he regarded as an unanswerable argument in favour of the purchase system. If the system were abolished, it would cost, not £4,500,000, but £8,000,000, as, in his opinion, every officer was entitled in justice to recover back the whole of the money which he had paid for his commission, not only the regulation amount, but the extra sum which, although not openly recognized, was paid under the connivance of the authorities, and was as notorious as the regulation price itself. He entirely approved of the arrangement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War for assimilating the prices of the commissions of the Cavalry and Infantry. This was most satisfactory. He thought it was matter of regret that he did not go further, and, by refunding the sums they had paid beyond the regulation price, allow the Cavalry officers at once to reap the advantage he proposed to afford them at a future period. But if it were supposed that this reduction in the price of commissions would enable the poor man to enter a cavalry regiment, it was an utter mistake. The very nature of the service rendered it impossible, unless the country was prepared, which he did not think was the case, to make an enormous increase in the pay of the whole army. It was true that a cornet would get his commission for £450; but his outfit, dress, and accoutrements, would cost him at least £100 more, and his horses another £100. Well, then, this made a total of £650. But what was his position in the regiment? His cornet's pay was £146 a year. Now for his actual expenses; not, mind, his extravagance. He must have two horses, and he would be charged for keeping them £25 17s. a year; the expense of shoeing them at 2s. a week per horse would be £10; the wear and tear of saddlery another £10; some allowance must be made for wear and tear of horse-flesh, and this could not be put down at less than £20 a year; and in addition to that there was the subscription to the mess and band—the extravagant establishment talked of by the gallant General, but which were not the establishment of the cornet's choice—fixed by Her Majesty's regulation at £8. These items with other miscellaneous charges would cost him about £87 5s. a year. Then as to eating and drinking, taking the club standard, the cheapest way in which a man could live, or taking the standard of the wages given to the valet, this would come to 5s. or 6s. a day. Putting that down, then, at £100 a year, there was an actual deficiency of £50 a year at the very first, without reference to clothes or any article of comfort or luxury. Unless, then, they were prepared to increase the pay of the army they could not induce poor men to enter into the cavalry regiments. He would admit that the new regulations made the service more economical than before, and that the officers could live cheaper, nevertheless it required something beyond their pay to support them. He had heard a great deal of army extravagance, but he could truly say, from his own experience, having served in cavalry and infantry for a long time, and having been a member of what were termed a crack corps, that he never knew a single case of an officer ruined by extravagance at the mess, though there were no doubt many cases of officers being ruined by expenses incurred, extravagance and vice indulged in without the barrack walls. When such instances occurred the parents of the young men blamed the regiment for all these evil results. But, after all, how very few were those cases of misconduct on the part of individual officers! Such misconduct could not be long concealed, and it was obvious to everybody that the cases before the tribunals of the country where officers were accused were few indeed. The honour of the British Army stood far too high to admit for a moment such attacks. What he would ask would be the effect of the abolition of purchase? Why, one of the very first effects would be, that that which could not be done directly would be done indirectly the moment the purchase system was abolished. The truth was, that so long as men had money they would offer money for what they wanted, and when men had anything which others coveted they would accept of money. Nor could they, for instance, prevent the officers of a regiment privately subscribing for the purpose of purchasing a man out. The system prevailed in the Indian army, and it notoriously prevailed in the Militia, for Militia commissions were every day hawked about as they were in the Line. He had heard recently of an adjutant of Militia who had repeatedly refused £2,500 for his commission. It would be absurd to throw away so large a sum of money by the abolition of this system when a much smaller amount of money, if properly distributed, would contribute considerably to the welfare and comfort of the service. Abolish this system as they might, it would creep in again. A remark has been made as to the scarcity of cornets at the present time. One of the reasons for that scarcity undoubtedly was, that the examinations were what he should term absurdly severe. The very feelings which induced young gentlemen to enter the army, the very characteristics which stamped them as best fitted for the profession, were those least compatible with the present system of examination, which exacted close study and a knowledge of the most intricate questions. He knew one case of a young man who had gone to Oxford to take his degree rather than pass that examination, knowing that in the one case the knowledge which he would acquire would be useful to him throughout the rest of his life, while in the other it would not. He did not see why a certificate of having attained a certain position at a public school should not be received as a complete qualification for the army. He wished to read one or two opinions that had been given before the Commission. And here he would express his surprise at hearing the hon. and gallant General complain of the style of evidence which had been given before that Commission. He (Colonel Dickson) thought that the officers who had been examined there had given their evidence in the most straightforward way. Surely, the evidence of the Commander-in-Chief was as candid and as unexceptionable as any evidence could be. Earl Grey had expressed strong doubts as to the policy of competitive examinations, and said he did not think that those examinations were proper tests of qualities the most important in a soldier. Sir B. Brodie, in an interesting work, said he feared that the forcing of the youthful mind would prove most injurious in after life, and this was demonstrated in the French service, where diseases of the brain

the consequence. He was allowed to refer to the French army, which was always crammed down into it. But what was the fact? the experience of the two systems measured? He was aware that owing to circumstances our military system first broken down; but when out our deficiencies, day by day by week the system improved, became entirely superior to that which, as we succeeded, decayed in the same proportion; so much so that he believed they could not continue the war any longer, and this country was obliged to conclude a premature peace because France was unable to continue the struggle. That which had carried us through the Crimean war and had gained for us so many of our most glorious victories was the so-much-decried regimental organization—the only portion of our military system which the principle of purchase affected. Now, what was the remedy proposed? It was a remedy of selection. Whatever might be the fate of this Motion that was a principle against which he must utterly protest. It was a system which, if adopted, would ruin the British army. It was a system which no officer could carry out. It was quite impossible for any commanding officer to decide who ought to be promoted and who ought not. The Duke of Cambridge said he should be sorry to see any partial change. A change should be complete or should not take place at all; for a partial change would lead to doubt and insecurity. He thought that if they did away with the purchase system the next day they would have an indirect purchase and sale going on, which would lead to great mischief. It would be impossible for the Commander-in-Chief to make selections without exciting great discontent and heartburnings in the army. Then how was a Commander-in-Chief to act as regarded officers on foreign stations? Even at home there might be two regiments in garrison, the colonel of one of which wished to retire. The major of the other might happen to be a relative. How was the Commander-in-Chief to act in such a case without exciting the suspicion of jobbing? Of course he would put into the hands of the Commander-in-Chief the power of a veto, in order to prevent the promotion of undeserving men. But to suppose that a Commander-in-Chief could act upon the principle of selection was perfectly ridiculous. The great body of the English army was characterized by an esprit de corps. If we ever destroyed that feeling we should ruin the efficiency of the whole army. The regiments which had performed the most brilliant actions were noted for their esprit de corps. That it was which sustained them at Inkerman, when every individual felt that he was not only fighting for his country but that the whole reputation of his regiment depended upon his efforts. In conclusion he wished to thank the House for the attention with which they had heard him, and to assure them that he was actuated solely by a wish to promote the interests of the service in the observations he had made.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he had no wish to disparage the heroic exploits of the British army, but he thought the invidious references which had been made to the victories it had gained over the French might have been omitted at a time when we were entering into a treaty of commerce and peace with France. He could not believe the assertion which had so often been made, that the purchase system was absolutely necessary to the efficiency of our army, seeing that no such system existed in France and other countries, which, nevertheless, possessed excellent armies. Military men, however, were so bound up by their own transactions that they could not express an unbiassed opinion on the subject. He complained that, with the view of conferring some advantage upon certain places of education in England, admission to the Artillery and Engineers, which he had always regarded as scientific corps, were now regulated by the classical acquirements of candidates rather than by their knowledge of the theory of projectiles. He was no enemy of classical learning, but it seemed that in future the man who could repeat arma virumque cano with the best grace, was to be preferred to the candidate who was the most deeply versed in mathematics and mechanics. That was a matter which demanded, and he hoped would receive, some explanation.

SIR FREDERICK SMITH said, it was with great pain that he differed from the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster upon any subject, but especially upon one that so closely concerned the army. They were both old soldiers, though belonging to different branches of the service, and he could truly say that he had watched the career of the hon. and gallant Gentleman with great admiration. The question he had mooted went to the very root of the British army, and he felt sure that in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War it would receive the attention which it deserved. He regretted that, in consequence of the low tone in which his hon. and gallant Friend had addressed the House, he had been unable to gather the purport of many of his observations; but he did not think, so far as he had heard him, that the hon. and gallant General had proved the existence of an abuse of any kind.

The object of the Motion was to abolish promotion by purchase, and to substitute promotion by selection combined with seniority. He confessed he could not see how selection was to be combined with seniority. Promotion must be either by purchase, or seniority, or selection. As a member of the scientific branch of the service, he knew that promotion by seniority gave to the State men of advanced life when it wanted young active officers, and he believed that if the purchase system were introduced into the Ordnance, it would produce men equal in talent and superior in physical power. With respect to selection, the Duke of Cambridge, Earl Grey, and Lord Panmure—all high authorities—were of opinion that it would be utterly impossible to carry on promotion in the British army upon that principle. Take the case of selection in a regiment. Suppose a captaincy was vacant, and there were ten lieutenants. What was to be the test of fitness? In time of peace a man might possess latent qualities for war which the Secretary of State, or the Commander-in-Chief, or whoever had the appointment, could not discover. Who, then, was to be selected—the man of science or the man of drill? If neither science nor drill were to be the test what was it to be? Well, then, say the fourth or fifth on the list should be selected for promotion. What in that case would be the heartburnings and discontent of the first, second, and third, who were passed over? Instead of having a harmonious regiment, we should have one in which discord prevailed, and the mess would be a hell upon earth. He should regret, therefore, to see the system of selection introduced into regiments. But give the principle a wider range and suppose the power of selection to extend over the whole army. A captaincy might be vacant in a regiment stationed at home. The general commanding in Canada recommended Mr. A, belonging to the 10th Regiment. Mr. B, of the 20th, was highly spoken of by his senior officer in India; and a report came from Gibraltar in favour of Mr. C, a deserving officer of the 50th. Who was to decide as to the respective merits of these candidates for promotion? He believed that unless the men were brought together and tested in a variety of ways no Secretary for War or Commander-in-Chief could give fair play. But the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster was for seniority combined with selection; the latter based upon war services of merit, length of colonial and home service, and professional fitness. How was professional fitness to be tested in time of peace, and who was to say how many marks were to be given to war services, how many to colonial, and how many to home service? The hon. and gallant General was mixing up things which had no natural connection, and he might as well try to add pounds, shillings, and pence to pounds avoirdupois. He had heard that the late Sir William Reed, when a lieutenant of Engineers, was senior officer of Crawford's division in the Peninsula, and had under him a lieutenant of the line as an assistant engineer. By the recommendation of Lieutenant Reed, before the campaign was over his assistant became lieutenant colonel, while Sir W. Reed came home still a lieutenant. That was an instance of the disadvantage of promotion by seniority, and the benefit of a system of merit and purchase. He hoped that Her Majesty would never be advised to adopt the Resolution of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster. What he would say was, "leave things as they are." They were producing and had produced for the country the finest troops in the world, and if our regiments were good, surely the staff could not be bad. He believed that with practice and with such opportunities as the Government were now giving to staff officers, we should not only have the finest regiments but the best staff officers in existence. The Government were going in the right direction, and he hoped they would persevere and continue to encourage officers who were doing their duty. With the expression of these sentiments he was quite satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War.

CAPTAIN JERVIS wished, as a member of a non-purchasing corps (the Royal Artillery), to say a few words. The intention of the hon. and gallant Member (Sir De L. Evans) appeared to be to open the army to the middle classes more than at present. It was, however, first necessary to ascertain whether the country was inclined to pay the cost necessary for that experiment or not. The purchase system, which had existed in this country for 200 years, had been so controlled during the last forty or fifty years that it had relieved the country of a great burden in pensions, and the Duke of Wellington had borne his high testimony to its value as a means of bringing young, active, healthy, energetic, and better qualified men into the army, at the same time that it threw none for a provision upon the funds of the State. But it would be impossible, without a great deal of inquiry, to state the amount of the dead-weight of pensions under the proposed system of abolition of purchase. For himself, he should not object to open the upper ranks of the army to the whole body of the people, as he believed that the more closely the people were connected with the army the more attached did they become to the institutions of the country. But when a person in the middle classes put his son to a profession, after giving him a solid education and starting him in life, he expected that the young man would maintain himself by his own exertions. How far would the pay to officers in the British army go to realize that expectation? He would not take the case of the cavalry, or other expensive branches of the service, but instance that of the infantry, and ask whether a man could subsist upon it or not? The pay of an ensign was £95 14s. a year, or 5s. 4d. a day. In the Artillery it was a little more than £100, but, as that brought the officer under the income tax, his pay was a little less than that of the officer of the Line. The average duration of service as an ensign was three years. He then became a lieutenant, in which rank he remained, on an average, from seven to eight years, when his pay was £118 2s. 6d., without deducting income tax. There were few who attained the rank of captain before the age of 35 or 36, when the pay was £211. The next step was that of a field officer, when his pay would increase to £292. At 45 a man might become a lieutenant colonel at £310 a year. Now, would a man with any affection for his son place him in a profession where at 45 he would be in the receipt of no more than £310 per annum, with all the expenses attending his position? If the hon. and gallant General really meant to do away with the system of purchase, he must be prepared to increase the pay of the army to such an extent would induce persons of the middle class to put their sons into it. Any man, of whatever profession he might be, ought to be able to support himself upon his pay without running into debt. The very principle of a profession was that it should produce sufficient to live upon. He had served in many parts of the world, and could state that England was of all countries that in which an officer lived at the least expense. At home he was nobody—a mere subaltern; but abroad he was the representative of the English people; he incurred mess expenses in entertaining fleets, &c., and he could not do this on his pay. Often on colonial stations had he expended £17 a month in mess expenses in entertaining persons of whom he knew nothing, when his pay for the same period was not more than £7 or £8. Compare with this the salaries paid to the civil servants of the Crown, who were not overpaid. The third-class clerks were paid from £100 to £300; the second-class, from £350 to £500; the first-class, from £500 to £800. So that entering a public office at 18 or 20 years of age upon £100, a clerk might reasonably hope, with intelligence and assiduity, to be in the receipt of from £600 to £800 at an age when in the army he would be receiving £310 per annum. Considerable expense was also incurred by officers in moving about from one station and one garrison to another. If an officer was foolish enough to get married upon his pay, he was doomed to sell out, and must go to the diggings. The late Lieutenant General, Sir C. Napier, was a lieutenant colonel, certainly a field-officer, at Corunna. He afterwards went to America. He made a name in Cephalonia, and afterwards in Bermuda. He was appointed to the command of the northern district in England during the Chartist riots, and at 60 he was offered as a reward for his long and distinguished services, the command of the Bombay army. Did Sir C. Napier, with these advantages, accumulate large means? On the contrary, when he arrived in India he looked back with desperation to the fact that if he had died on the voyage he could not have left his girls a single farthing, for he had expended all he had on the journey. Sir Charles had landed in India, after paying the passage of himself and family, with only £2 in his pocket. Without entering into particulars, he might state that the purchase system was no bar to the mercantile class going into the army; but as a general rule they carefully abstained from doing so, because it did not pay; and unless the House were prepared for a large pension list and increased pay, the resolution of the gallant General would mean nothing at all. With regard to promotion by seniority, the hon. and gallant Member for Berks (Captain L. Vernon) told the House he had been for twenty-four years a subaltern in the Engineers. The term of service had been shorter of late years, but the reason why promotion was better now was that in the course of twelve years the Artillery had been exactly doubled. When he entered the service there were eight battalions; this year there were sixteen. He had, therefore, received the promotion due to twenty years' additional service. But you could not go on doubling this force. A return had been moved for by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell) which showed that out of sixty general officers on the staff there were only two Artillery officers and one Engineer, the reason being that they were too old to serve on the staff. As far as opening the army to the middle classes was concerned, the question was one of money. Unless the hon. and gallant General was prepared to amend his Motion in this sense he must vote against him.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he wished to explain to the House what a gallant officer examined before the Commission in 1857 said with respect to himself. That gallant officer, Captain Macpherson, stated in his evidence that he had been purchased over no less than eighteen times, and yet, when asked by the Chairman of the Commission what his opinion was of the purchasing system, he replied that he thought it highly beneficial to the service by accelerating promotion to officers who did not purchase as well as to those who purchased. The gallant officer added, that though he had been passed over eighteen times, and though it took him eighteen years to get his company, he considered that he should have had many years longer to wait for it if there had been no system of purchase. The officers examined before that Commission seemed to be pretty nearly divided in opinion, and the balance was turned over in favour of the purchase system very much by the civilians who gave evidence. He was willing to admit that if it could be fully proved that the system of purchase was vicious in principle, inefficient for the army, and inconsistent with the public benefit, it would be the duty of the House to make good to the officers who had sunk their money in commissions the amount so expended; but he did not think that the House would be called on for that sum, because he believed the system to be good, both as regarded the army and the public, and he had heard nothing that night to alter his views. The hon. Member for Richmond (Mr. Rich) had asserted that the system of purchase had not produced any greater rapidity of promotion than the system of seniority in the Ordnance, but such was not the case, for he was in possession of a return for a series of years before the Crimean war, showing the periods of service after which officers attained the rank of lieutenant colonel; and the return proved that, although the system of purchase was the system of the army, a system of non-purchase also existed to a considerable extent. In $21\frac{1}{2}$ years—and he took the period before the Crimean war, that its influence might not be taken into the calculation—from 1833 to June, 1854, 428 officers arrived at the rank of lieutenant colonel, and these officers averaged about 25 years' service before attaining that position. Those who rose by purchase were 22 years and eight months attaining that rank, and those who did not purchase were 27 years and nine months. Now that was sufficient to show that the system of purchase was useful to give youth and vigour to the ranks of the army. If they abolished this system, they must come to compulsory retirement; and in France the allowances on compulsory retirement were, for a lieutenant general £300 to £350, for a lieutenant colonel £120, and for a captain from £90 to £120; the retirement taking place with a lieutenant general at sixty-five, with a lieutenant colonel at sixty-two, and with a captain at fifty-three, and a lieutenant at fifty-two years of age. It would be absurd to think of having lieutenants of that age in the British army, considering all the duties they had to perform, and all the different parts of the world they were sent to. He asserted that the country would not have lieutenants and captains of proper age, and youth, and vigour, in the several ranks of the army if the system of purchase were abolished. Again, the total number of officers on full pay of the army was 8,167, and the amount of retired full pay was £56,714. On the other hand, the number of officers in the Royal Artillery was 1,072, and the amount of retired full pay for that corps was £32,232, being only about £24,000 less than the other. The retiring pay would, therefore, be enormous if they desired to have that exodus out of the various ranks of the army which would maintain the present amount of promotion. Moreover, the system of purchase was compatible with every principle of examination. Examinations of a military character were regularly made under the authority of general officers, and controlled and watched by the Commander-in-Chief, who was extremely desirous that they should be effectively carried out. These examinations could be as effectively conducted for the benefit of the service and the good of the country as well with the purchase system as without it. They were all agreed that merit should be rewarded; and in the higher ranks of the army it was done whenever the opportunity presented itself. Lieutenant colonels were promoted to the rank of generals in consequence of merit; but what constituted merit it was difficult to arrive at in peace time. He had conversed with general officers on the subject, and always found that they considered it exceedingly difficult to ascertain degrees of merit. Men's capacities varied. Some men might be able tacticians, but they were not found out till they were engaged on active service. Others had talents of a different kind; but there was no means of deciding the superiority of one over another till they were taken into the field. It might seem a curious argument, but there was to some extent a control which upheld the discipline of the service, in the system of purchase. There was a species of control in the knowledge that they had embarked capital in the service; that that capital was their own, and that at any time they could get it back again. He prayed the House to reject the Motion, for he believed the system of purchase had been found most efficient in the army. Imputations were cast upon the regimental system, but the regimental system had never failed. It was not the regimental system in the Crimea that failed. It had ever stood the test of peace and the test of war, and he believed it was equally for the benefit of the army and for the public good.

COLONEL P. HERBERT said, holding in very high respect the gallant General who had brought this Motion forward, he regretted to find himself compelled to oppose him on a military question. But as that question excited considerable attention in large constituencies, where perhaps it was but imperfectly understood, he could the better rely on the military opinions of the gallant General the further he was removed from Westminster. He had understood the gallant General to say that in the Crimea the horses of the Artillery suffered in much greater proportion than the horses of the Cavalry, and to attribute that in some way to the system of purchase in the one case and the absence of it in the other. [Sir DE L. EVANS intimated that he said quite the reverse.] So far as his

(Colonel Herbert's) experience went, he thought the Artillery branch of the service lost just as many horses there from starvation and suffering as the Cavalry did; and in proof of that he might cite the case of the two batteries attached to the division under the command of the gallant General, which, from having far on to 300 horses at the beginning of the war, had only 40 or 50 between them at the end of the first six months. He hoped the House would not be carried away by statements of opinion of the officers of foreign armies in reference to this question. He had had repeated opportunities of conversing with foreign officers on this subject, and he almost uniformly found them under the misapprehension that the system of purchase, as it existed in our service, was one under which a rich man was able to buy commissions at his will, over the head of any officer who did not happen to be so rich as he, and that, in fact, commissions were put up to the highest bidder. He had also found that when the system was explained to them as a system of seniority, provided that an officer was able to provide a certain sum of money, the foreign officers had allowed its advantages. He did not oppose this Motion from any consideration of the manner in which the system of purchase affected individuals. He rested his defence of that system on the broad public ground of its tending to promote the efficiency of the service as well as public economy. No one would deny that in general it was desirable that officers of all grades should be in the vigour of life, and that not only senior officers should gain their rank while still in the prime of life, but that officers in the lower grades should attain their rank young. Again, the House must recollect that officers retiring from the service after 10, 20, and sometimes 30 years' connection with it do not cost the country a single penny for pensions. He asked the House to consider the cost of retirement which would be requisite to keep up the necessary stream of promotion. In the service of the East India Company the retirement on full pay as a captain was allowed after 18 years' service, and as a major after 22 years; and yet there promotion in every case—at least it was so before the Mutiny—was lamentably slow amongst all ranks of officers. But did any one wish to reduce the promotion in the Queen's service to the same level? He would also remind the House that in the East India Company's service there was a system of purchase. That was a remarkably oppressive system, and many a young officer had been forced into debt by a system which was not virtually optional, as in our service. Again what was the case of the Artillery and Engineers? Between 1830 and 1840 there had been instances of subalterns promoted to the rank of captain after 20 and 22 years' service, and of captains promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonel after 20 and even 29 years as captain alone. It might be said that things were better now, but if so, that was entirely owing to the large additions that had been made of late years to the Artillery. At present the full pay retirement in our service amounted in the infantry and cavalry to £60,000, and in the Artillery and Engineers to £48,000. The number of officers in the Artillery and Engineers was 1,465, and in the infantry and cavalry upwards of 8,000, making the proportion as 1 to 5½. The present rate of retirement in the Artillery and Engineers, to keep up the stream of promotion, would be manifestly insufficient when the augmentations ceased; and in the infantry and cavalry we should have to increase the full pay on retirement from £60,000 to £264,000, which would make a difference of £204,000. Certainly, the feelings of poor and meritorious officers ought to be much respected. He thought they were very often respected, and that great consideration was shown at the Horse Guards to officers who from want of means had been unfortunate in promotion, and although when they had entered the service they knew the system under which they were to serve. The question of military education was so irrelevant, that he did not think it necessary to say anything about that. Allusion had been made to the French army. What was the system of promotion carried on there? It was one partly of selection and partly of seniority. But he was not aware that the French Army was without heartburnings, and he had heard many accounts of duels that had taken place in the French army among the officers on account of promotions that had taken place. There was one very important point which should be borne in mind, and that was, that in France when people had complaints to make about promotions there was no House of Commons to discuss those complaints, and there was no free press which could take up their grievances, or in which some correspondent, signing himself "Justice," could advocate the claims of an officer who might happen perhaps to be his own brother. A gallant officer, a friend of his, a man of high military rank and of still higher military reputation, had summed up in these terse and graphic words the opinion of British officers on a system of promotion by selection:—"Every officer of the army is ready to recognize the principle of selection, provided he is himself the person selected." He, however, defended the present system upon higher grounds than mere personal advantages, believing that it tended to the efficiency of the public service and economy in the public purse.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Sir, the subject which the House is called upon to consider is one of the most difficult and complicated that can be submitted to it. In the first place, it is well that we should be certain that we are using clear and definite terms and describing as we intend to do the subject we are discussing. I agree, as an abstract proposition, with the opinion advanced by the gallant Officer who moved the Amendment, that seniority by itself is a bad method of promotion; but when you use that expression it seems to imply that seniority promotion was something unknown to our present system. The fact is, as has been stated in debate, we have several distinct corps, which may be said to be governed upon different principles in respect to promotion. We have the Infantry and Cavalry of the Line and the Household Troops, the two scientific corps, and the Indian army. These are all seniority corps, with this distinction between them, that in the Queen's service and in the Indian army there is a seniority system accelerated by purchase, and in the scientific corps in the Queen's army it is seniority pure. The man who stands first for a death vacancy in the Line gets it, or, if he does not take it, the man who stands first for purchase, having the money, gets it, and so on. Having said so much, I must add that there is no subject which has been so overlaid on both sides with arguments that are not tenable, and by statements which are gross exaggerations, as this question of purchase. I must also say that the gallant General (Sir De L. Evans) in my opinion, made some very extravagant assertions respecting that system. The gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Herbert) has truly said that the argument of the gallant General leads to this, that the greater loss of Cavalry horses in the Crimea was attributable to the purchase system, while the greater vitality of the Artillery horses was traceable to the absence of that system. On the other hand, the supporters of the present system declare that the whole spirit and value of the army depends upon what is certainly an artificial system after all. They have passed upon it the most extravagant encomiums, amongst other things attributing to it the victory of Waterloo. Again, the gallant General argued that purchase was not only incompatible with education, but that money and education are positively antagonistic. That is a great social and moral discovery, in the truth of which, however, I do not believe, but, on the contrary, I am of opinion that it is so ordained by Providence that you may truly say poverty and ignorance go together, because education costs money, and is therefore more within the reach of those who have money. There is nothing more erroneous than the notion, into which those who advocate the abolition of the purchase system have fallen, that the non-purchasing officer is necessarily a hard-working, meritorious man, devoted to his profession, while the man who purchases is therefore to be regarded as a man not devoted to his profession or deserving of his promotion. That is an unfounded assertion, and any argument based on it is therefore fallacious. There is another argument which on both sides is extremely doubtful. I have heard most sanguine expectations held out by the advocates of entire abolition of purchase that a change of system would procure for us a different class of officers, and would bring into the ranks the sterling ambitious characters of the middle class who would give immense force and strength to the army. It is said, on the other hand, that if you abolished purchase, you would lose the means of officering your army with gentlemen, and I am one of those old-fashioned persons who believe that gentlemen officers are a great advantage. In this country, which is not a military nation, and which possesses but little of the spirit of military subordination, I am not ready to give up anything which tends to secure to our officers a ready and willing obedience. But I believe that both those assumptions are incorrect. If purchase were abolished to-morrow, I do not think you would find the slightest difference perceptible in the class of men who would come forward to officer regiments. It is said, and truly, that the army is an ill-paid profession; but it carries with it honour, and station, and reputation. The very fact of its being an ill-paid procession will cause its officers to consist in a great degree of men who have something else besides. But then, if you think the abolition of purchase will deprive the army of that class of gentlemen and all the professional and middle classes comprised within that term, I ask why should the army be worse off than the navy, where no purchase exists, and whose officers I am sure the army will admit will compare in any way with military officers? Then it is said by some that the Queen's army is completely and especially aristocratic, and that the Indian army, on the other hand, is a purely middle class army. But what is the English army but a middle class army? The presence of a few sons of noblemen does not alter the character of the great bulk of the officers who are drawn from the middle, by which I mean the professional, classes. Having premised so much upon the general subject, I will pass to another point. I was a Member of the Duke of Somerset's Commission. The Report of the Commission was drawn up with great ability, and gave a true and impartial account of the advantages and disadvantages of the system of promotion by purchase. The greatest stickler, either for or against purchase, would admit that the case on either hand is fairly put. When I came into office, among the various topics which presented themselves to my attention was the effect which the purchase system had upon the army and on the public service. I do not know why the gallant General says I inveighed against purchase, but certainly I have listened to and adopted, and am ready to act upon, any scheme by which I can see a way to get rid of the abuses and scandals that overlay the practice of purchase. I find, looking at purchase fairly, and admitting that it quickens promotion, that to a great degree it is valuable. Some one has said that purchase does not procure physical vigour and is incompatible with intellectual vigour. I do not admit that. It is true that as President of the Commission of 1854, I found that purchase alone would not insure vigour among officers, and that it was necessary to supplement it by additional measures of retirement; but with those supplemental measures it is quite possible and easy to keep the army on a safe and healthy footing as regards age. My gallant Friend (Sir De L. Evans) quarrels with me for what I did, and read extracts from my letters, and if I was at all thankful for his inaudible tones, it was when he quoted from my letters. The case is this:—I found when I entered office that an old controversy existed between the War-office and the Treasury respecting the cause of the difficulty in filling up the cornetries in cavalry regiments. The matter was a very serious one. There were more than sixty vacancies for cornets, a number equivalent to all the cornetries in seven regiments, which could not be filled up. It had been said that this was entirely owing to your making men pay subscriptions to the band and to the deductions made from their forage allowance. I asked what was the cost of the outfit of a cavalry officer. Several estimates were given me, none of which were under £1,500, and some reached £2,000. Now, will a charge of 1s. 5d. a day for those objects drive away from the cavalry men who are willing to pay £2,000 to begin with, and who afterwards pay large sums for their steps—as high as £17,000, I believe, for a Lieutenant Colonelcy? It was absurd to suppose that such a small amount would deter men from entering this branch of the service. Then I had to find some other cause, and I think the true cause has been correctly stated by the hon. and gallant Member for Limerick (Colonel Dickson). He said that the difficulty was not occasioned by the price of the cavalry commissions, the cost of the forage, the subscriptions to the band, nor even the expenses of messing. The chief expenses of a cavalry regiment, he added, lie outside the barrack-yard—that is to say, in the expensive amusements of wealthy men. Now, of all the recipes you can supply for repressing these none are so inefficacious as attempts by authority to impose sumptuary laws. Why, the very fact of attempting it would drive the officers into further expenses. There is another way of accomplishing your object. What is it that gives a tone to a regiment? There is a passage in Carlyle's Life of Stirling which I recollect made a profound impression on me. It is that where, talking of the English public schools, he says, the schoolmasters are always exclaiming, "See how we administer these schools; what men we produce; what a tone there is!" This is all nonsense, says Mr. Carlyle; it is not the masters but the boys who produce this tone—who produce it, moreover, not in obedience to the masters, but half the time in spite of them. It is through the boys that the spirit of combination, of resistance, and of honour which prevails in our public schools is maintained. and Mr. Carlyle laughs to scorn the claims of pedagogues to be considered the creators of this English tone and feeling. So it is in our army. It is the officers themselves who give the tone to a regiment. The best plan is to try and introduce fresh elements of a sounder public opinion into these regiments—to bring in men who cannot afford to lead this kind of life—to set their public opinion against that of the wealthy and extravagant; and as soon as there are enough of those who have not the means of indulging in these expenses you will restore a healthy tone to these regiments. I am sorry that the gallant Officer objected to my course in this particular, when he ought, on the contrary, to have approved of it as a step in his own direction. I had to deal with the price of the commission. He says I aggravated the evil. On the contrary, I diminished it by one-third, and two more moves of the same nature would produce a total abolition. He says the plan will fail. Now, I do not like to prophesy, but I think I shall prove right when I say that it will succeed, I know that already the applications to the Horse Guards for cornetcies have increased; and I myself have had letters from friends who have sons in the army, and who say, “We have kept our sons in the infantry because we could not afford the price of the cavalry commissions; but we had now much rather that they were in the cavalry.” The feeling is that the reduction in the price of commissions will diminish the extravagance, which two things together have always hitherto made an inconvenient hole in the parental pocket. The Duke of Somerset’s Commission took evidence upon those points at great length and from very able men. It is unnecessary for me to attempt to decry the character of the officers who were examined on either side. They were all excellent men, and there was a variety of opinion. Some spoke in favour of purchase without the slightest qualification whatever. Some, again, only deprecated the abuses of the purchase system, and thought that efforts ought to be made to check them. Well, what are the abuses which mark the purchase system? At the outset, I would say that nothing is more true than that both in England and abroad the system is very much misunderstood. A French newspaper, giving a résumé of the life of Lord Raglan, said that such was his enthusiasm for the profession of a soldier that, though the son of a Duke, he scorned to enter the army by purchasing a colonelcy, but came in as a simple ensign. That is very much the measure of the foreign view of the purchase system. In England I know it is commonly thought that when a rich man goes into a regiment he can get what rank he chooses by holding up his finger; he is certainly obliged to follow in the natural order of the military hierarchy, but though he cannot pass over ranks, he can pass over men’s heads as he likes. That is not the case, and in the lower ranks it may happen that a poor man may gain by the system. Suppose, for instance, that a man has risen from the ranks, and that, as somebody expresses it, all the officers superior to him in his grade “get out of his way” by purchase. He finds himself thus at the top of his rank; the first time a death vacancy occurs he is there ready for it to fall into his mouth; and after having served for a certain number of years he may retire with a small fortune gained in the service by these means. No doubt, this purchase system is indefensible in theory, but in practice it is extremely useful, and I think you should pause for a proper substitute before adopting any sweeping measure of abolition. Where is it that the great scandals of purchase arise? Not in the lower ranks of the service. The great prices are given in the superior grades by very wealthy men who want a position which gives them power, responsibility and reputation. It is this which leads to these high prices at which public feeling is justly shocked. We hear, too, of exchanges made for the purpose of trafficking in this way, and sometimes a regiment is thus deprived of its step. A striking case has been mentioned by Lord West, and is to be found in the blue-book. An officer in a certain regiment wished to sell, but his juniors were poor; he had no prospect of getting a high price for his step, and he therefore exchanged with a lieutenant colonel into another regiment, where there was a rich man who was ready to pay any price for promotion, and his own regiment therefore lost the advantage of the step. Such cases are always attributed to the Duke of Cambridge and the Horse Guards, and it may not be unnatural to suppose that the officer who is at the head of the whole system has it in his power to stop such an abuse; but the Duke of Cambridge does not know, and cannot know, of such an intention. How is he to trace the motives for the different exchanges which come before him? A few months after they are effected he may find out that he has authorized an exchange for unfair purposes, but he is perfectly powerless to apply a remedy. The system of exchange is much complained of, and sometimes with justice; but in all professions, and especially in so severe a one as our army, it is often a great advantage to enable men who have served perfectly well in other parts to avoid serving in India, or in climates which they are, perhaps, unable to endure. I do not see much inconvenience or evil in such a system. The Duke of Somerset's Commission recommended that, in order to check the great prices which are given in the upper ranks of the army, purchase should be confined to the rank of major and the grades below it. The importance of a lieutenant colonelcy was so great, it was argued, that succession to it should not be allowed by seniority—that is, by seniority either with or without purchase. The Commission objected very much to the system of seniority. So do I. I have always been opposed to it. I was responsible for the introduction of a system which I freely admit has been much complained of in the army, but which I am sure has added very much to its efficiency, by which officers selected from among the colonels, are made either brigadiers or temporary major generals, and ultimately attain the rank of major general. That, therefore, is not promotion by seniority, but by selection. Of course, these changes are very disagreeable to a body like the army. Of course men who are not selected feel great disappointment and discontent. But, after all, the public service is the first thing to be considered. You may regret to wound the feelings of officers; but you must keep in view something higher and more important still—namely, the efficiency of the army of which they are individual members, and certainly the army has very much benefited by the change. The Duke of Cambridge in this respect is very much opposed to the system of selection, as casting upon the person who has to select a burden which in this country it is almost impossible for him to bear. He says that the duties of the commander of a regiment are of the most important kind. But if you contrast the seniority system with the system of selection, you find the former open to the gravest objection; because under it, with your eyes open, seeing the incapacity of an officer, you are forced deliberately to put him into an office of responsibility and trust. As to the effect of this system what is said by General Simpson? He is a most excellent officer, has had great experience in inspecting troops, and has been in command of a district; in reply to Sir H. Jones he stated that he had known several officers who were not equal to the command of the regiments which they held. He was unable to say what proportion had obtained their commissions by purchase, but the effect was the same where the promotions had been by seniority. He was asked if this could not be remedied by a system of selection, and he replied that it could, but to pass over a man would be a very serious and difficult matter. Some gallant Members appear to think it would be very easy for the Commander-in-Chief to exercise a veto in any case where the officer succeeded by seniority is deemed unfit for the post. [Mr. ELLICE: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman cheers; there are two ways in which this veto may be exercised, and I shall be glad to learn which method he considers least invidious. Either you must tell a man, "You are a good officer, I have no fault to find with you, but there is another still more able and with higher professional qualifications whom I must prefer;" or you must say, "You are utterly unfit and incompetent for the situation, and I therefore must appoint another man over your head." [Mr. ELLICE: Not so invidious as to allow juniors to purchase over old officers.] At all events it is so invidious that General Simpson said that in the course of his life he knew only two instances in which it was done. The Commander-in-Chief expressed his willingness, if supported by public opinion, to exercise the power which he possessed, but he found the thing was in itself so invidious as to render it impossible to do so. General Scarlett gave his opinion that selection in the upper ranks would operate as a check on those enormous sums which are given for commissions over and above the regulation price. You come then to this point, you have officers in command of regiments who having arrived at them by seniority are not equal to the commands they hold; you have the opinion of General Scarlett that selection in the higher ranks would remedy that evil; but you have also the practice and evidence of the authorities to show that it is impossible, as being too invidious, to pass over a man because he is incompetent when there are no fixed principles on which selection is to be made. We, who signed this Report in 1854, conceived that if a stop were put to the purchase of the rank of lieutenant colonel, by which an indefeasible right is acquired to the successive steps of major general and lieutenant general, with the command of a regiment, and all the perquisites and emoluments attaching to that important position, the same inducement would no longer exist to give extravagant prices in the junior ranks of the service. There have been very important changes in the system of promotion during the last six years; formerly every officer rose to be a captain, and then obtained a brevet, becoming, in course of time, lieutenant colonel, major general and so on; he might never have served a day in command of a regiment, or acquired any experience of that character, but he was eligible for command, and could retire on half-pay. It is impossible to imagine any worse system than this; not only was he promoted, though he had no service, but he had better chances than a man with service, because he did not go to unhealthy climates. This mode of promotion has been swept away, and in its stead has been substituted that of promotion for service. At the present moment the rule is that no man can rise above the rank of lieutenant colonel unless he has held a regimental command for a certain period, or served for a certain time upon the Staff. The Staff will be very soon closed to everybody who has not passed through the Staff College. The mass of regimental officers of course will not go there—in fact, it would be very inconvenient if they were to do so—and you will consequently have a number of excellent officers whose only chance of rising to the higher grades of their profession will be by having five years' service in command of a regiment. How are they to obtain this qualification? I will suppose the case of officers who have not the money sufficient to purchase their promotion. I hear it said by the gallant Colonel (Colonel Herbert) that they may acquire the necessary qualification by their senior going on retired full pay or by death vacancies. But again I ask, with the long list which precedes his own name, and the few opportunities which can thus occur, how is it possible for the necessary qualifications to be obtained by poor but deserving officers? As a broad and general rule I believe it will be very difficult for a man who cannot purchase his lieutenant colonelcy to rise to the higher ranks; and, when the practice

becomes established, the injustice will be felt to be intolerable, and will lower the army as a profession in the eyes of the British people. It is therefore necessary to devise some means by which the rule may be broken through in favour of those who have not money, and who may not succeed in getting the death vacancies. The view of the Commission was that the cessation of purchase of the rank of lieutenant colonel would open an avenue to those who could only rely on meritorious services for their claims to improve position, and would also diminish what I believe is the unanimous disposition of the lower ranks—to give illegitimate prices. You found it impossible by the "declaration upon honour" to check this tendency; the only way, therefore, to do so, will be by diminishing this temptation. I come now to some other points which have been raised in the discussion. It is said in answer to the proposals of the Commission that the danger of selection will be very great, on account of the likelihood of favouritism and political pressure. Hon. and gallant Gentleman say that under a despotic government you may select the best officers for particular services, but that in a free country it is impossible to do so. I believe that is a libel on free institutions. Those selections are even now made in other professions, and in the army they would be made under the influence of public opinion brought to bear on them by this House. I believe the statement of the impossibility of selections under free institutions, when examined, really means this—that by the criticism to which the selections are liable you give the selector a very uneasy life. That is quite true; but in proportion as it is true, it is a guarantee against favouritism and jobbing. The apprehension of public criticism of a job prevents a job being done; the whole system of publicity rests on that criticism. Look at the Admiralty; for many years the Admiralty was in the habit of making political promotions; it was notorious. Public opinion has revolted against it, and the House of Commons took the chief part in putting it down. Now, no Minister to influence a division, or for any political motive, would dare to give a ship to an officer incapable of commanding her. Such is the susceptibility of the House of Commons on this subject that I recollect a strong and I think unreasonable attack was made within a very recent period on a right hon. Baronet opposite, because he wished to get a naval officer into the House to assist him with his professional experience in conducting the public business. I think it was a very proper course for him to take, and I only mention the case to show how jealous the House is of all such influence. But it is said the person making the selection of officers in the army should not be the Commander-in-Chief only, it should be somebody else. How the Secretary of State can make the selection I do not know. He would have no personal knowledge of the merits of any of the officers. He must go to some military man to make any selection for military reasons. It is argued that the selection by the Commander-in-Chief is not only liable to be influenced, but that it cannot be made with proper regard to efficiency. I doubt that very much. Sir G. Brown said, in his evidence before the Commission, that he was quite sure that the Commander-in-Chief has the means of knowing the character, capacity, and intelligence of every officer in the army, if he goes to the proper quarter to ascertain them—the Adjutant-General's office, and that he himself, when in that department, had been repeatedly sent for by Lord Raglan to discuss the fitness and ability of officers required for a particular service. Sir G. Simpson and Lord Panmure both state that the Commander-in-Chief has full means of knowing the character of every officer. It is said that this power of selection may be exercised during a war, but not in time of peace, and that in peace promotion by selection would degenerate into a system of promotion by seniority. But what is the present system but a system of seniority accelerated by purchase? Then it is said there is a difficulty of selecting in the case of officers serving abroad. The Duke of Cambridge says he can select officers at home, but not so well abroad. I admit there is a difficulty in doing so. Though in India, or wherever large bodies of troops are collected, the means exist of comparing officers together, yet where the force is less there are less means of comparison. I have gone through the objections raised to the question of selection for the rank of lieutenant colonel. I have in this blue-book evidence on evidence, from men whose opinion is entitled to great weight, that the command of a regiment should not be held for a very long period by one officer. This is the opinion of Sir C. Yorke and Lord Panmure. The distinction drawn by the Commission of which I was a member is, that it is in the upper ranks of the army the sale of commissions gives rise to scandal and injustice, but that in the lower ranks it gives that acceleration to promotion necessary to keep the army in proper physical youth and vigour without being attended by the evils it causes in the upper grades. When I signed the Report of the Commission, I did so with the conviction that on a very difficult question this was the best course to take. I view with apprehension and alarm any proposal for the entire abolition of purchase; I do not see what is to replace it. I have looked carefully at the plan of Sir Charles Trevelyan; but I think his proposals would weigh hard on the officers of the army, and throw a very heavy burden on the Government. His plan, on paper, shows a great saving, but, practically, I do not think it would prove so. The principle we follow is not open to many of the objections urged against the system of purchase, while it removes it from the ranks, in which the greatest evils and scandals arise from it. I signed the report, believing it laid down the best course to pursue, and I have seen nothing since to shake my opinion. Holding, as I do, that purchase in some shape, to some extent, in some ranks, is necessary, I believe it better to preserve that system and make it more useful by making it less open to objection. Without pledging myself to details, because many points will require very careful consideration, I may state that the principle laid down by the Commission is the principle the Government acknowledges in dealing with this question. It will be my duty to prepare a scheme founded on that principle with the greatest care, thought, and caution, and lay it before the military authorities for consideration. On one side it may be said by the hon. and gallant General (Sir De Lacy Evans), this is a miserable course of proceeding, and a very small measure of improvement; that it does not meet all his conceptions, and, therefore, he will have none of it. On the other, my right hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Ellice) will say the change is too hasty, too sweeping, and too rash. I have been accustomed to live between two fires; and, between two extremes, I am not sure but we are nearer the truth. As far as I see my way, I am prepared to act. It must depend, of course, on the Government how the measure can best be shaped. There are great difficulties to encounter, strong prejudices to be met; but beyond the point to which

I see my way I will not move an inch. This great machine, the English army, is not a thing to play with. The value and reputation of an army does not depend merely on its numerical force, but on the spirit by which it is animated, and we must not deal lightly with anything that concerns it. I have, for a civilian, had much experience of military matters; and every day I am disposed to think more highly of the English Army, its working, and administration. I have told you the principle on which the Government are prepared to act. I will lay before the military authorities a scheme based on that principle, and which will carry our views honestly into effect. I trust the House and the country will support us in bringing this scheme to a successful issue. I listened with the greatest attention to the evidence which was given before the Commission by Lord Clyde, General Spencer, Lord West, and other officers who were in favour of the total abolition of the system of purchase. They saw all the abuses and scandals by which the working of the system was attended; but they did not appear to have thought of the substitute for it which was to be provided, or how a remedy was to be applied to the evils of which they complained. The simple remedy of plunging our hands into the public purse will not do. Then what course, let me ask, is open to us? For my own part, I think that purchase ought to be limited to the ranks of the service below that of lieutenant colonel, in which position I think due care ought to be taken that an incompetent man, to whose charge the lives of 1,000 men are committed, should not be placed. While, however, I deem it right to act upon the principle which I have just laid down, I will not be driven to go one inch beyond the point to which I distinctly see my way. Our army is a machine too delicate to be lightly handled, and while I shall seize the earliest opportunity consistent with due deliberation to submit to the Government the scheme to which I have referred, I feel bound to dissent from the Resolution of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster, as well as from the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Berks.

Mr. ELLICE (Coventry) said, his right hon. Friend who had just spoken was quite justified in regarding the question under discussion as being one of the most difficult and important which could be submitted to the notice of Parliament. He must, however, confess that he did not think the mode in which his right hon. Friend had announced it to be his intention to deal with the subject was calculated to diminish the difficulties by which it was beset. To the system of purchase taken in the abstract he was perfectly aware strong objections existed. He was, moreover, ready to admit that if any scheme could be devised by which those objections could be put an end to, without impairing the efficiency of the army, he should be prepared to give such a proposal his cordial support. He was at the same time, however, unwilling to take a course by which the abuses which at present existed would, instead of being removed, be to a great extent aggravated, and he should, therefore, advise hon. Members to be careful how they gave their assent to the proposition which his right hon. Friend had shadowed out. It was quite true that that proposal had emanated from the majority of a Commission of which his right hon. Friend was a Member; but then it should be borne in mind that there was also a minority which had objected to the recommendations which the Commission had made. In that minority were two general officers of great experience, who were of opinion that those recommendations would, if carried into effect, tend to increase the evils with respect to the system of purchase of which complaint was made. One of those officers had, he might add, arrived at the highest rank in the army without ever having purchased a step, and had seen officers who possessed larger means frequently placed over his head. Now, the scheme which had obtained the approval of his right hon. Friend was accompanied by so many difficulties that he was unwilling to pronounce any very decided opinion upon it until the measure in which it was embodied had been laid before the House. He must, however, observe that if the right hon. Gentleman deemed the scheme so good a one as he seemed to think, it was somewhat strange he should not have placed it on the table in a tangible shape some time within the last two years. It would seem, indeed, as if the proposal of his right hon. Friend had been brought forward simply to meet the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster, but he could not help thinking it would have been laid before the House with a better grace if it had been introduced when the Army Estimates were being moved, in conjunction with those great improvements which he was prepared to admit his right hon. Friend had during his military administration effected. The right hon. Gentleman founded his proposal on the grievous abuse which was said to exist with respect to the system of exchange, and also with respect to the means by which officers arrived at the rank of lieutenant colonel. The right hon. Gentleman in doing so, however, appeared to forget that the abuse on which he relied was one which had reference to other times, for he (Mr. Ellice) must do his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief the justice to say that since he had become Commander-in-Chief it had ceased to exist. Those instances in which officers of large fortune had exchanged with poorer officers from one regiment to another, even when they did exist, could have been very easily dealt with, if the authorities were so disposed. They were perfectly well known at the Horse Guards, which, in fact, had encouraged them, so that the authorities were to blame for the abuse which had taken place. The practice, moreover, had not been one of common occurrence, and yet the right hon. Gentleman was disposed to regard it as one of the great evils of the existing system! Now, he should like to know what effect the proposal of his right hon. Friend was calculated to exercise on the lower ranks of officers in the army? Was it probable that many gentlemen would be desirous of entering the service by means of purchase when they were aware that, having arrived at the rank of major, they might be able to proceed no further, and might have a favourite of the Horse Guards placed over their heads? A great deal had in the course of the discussion been said about foreign armies, but the question which the House had to consider related to the English army, which could only exist in a country like our own. We had no conscription, no enforced military service. Our officers were independent, and not the slaves of absolute power. They were under the protection of that House. They were, as his right hon. Friend had truly said, derived for the most part from the middle classes. Well, then, how did the matter stand? A clergyman, a lawyer, or a manufacturer placed his son in the military service of the country. He happened, perhaps, to have some £3,000 or £4,000 to give him with a view of promoting his interest in life. He knew that as things at present stood so long as the young man conducted himself well nobody could be raised over his head by means of patronage or jobbery. Thus far the system worked well, and one security for the independence of the army was afforded. But there was also another point worthy of consideration. At present it appeared to him that whether a man was promoted by seniority or by purchase, it came to the same thing. One abuse—the great abuse of the system of purchase—had been done away with; no man could now enter the army without satisfying the country of his efficiency by passing an examination. There were now, owing to an agitation of the question for thirty years, and through the willing assistance of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, two examinations which a man must pass for the army as there were for the navy. Formerly there was no examination at all. A man could purchase his steps and arrive at the command of a battalion, and no man knew whether he was able to take the command of 1,000 men or not. But it was hard to say what influence the proposed change, if adopted, would produce in the independence of our officers, whose promotion might be interfered with by an undue exercise of patronage. There were also considerations of another kind. It must be recollected that ours was an army which was scattered throughout India, Canada, the West Indies, the Mediterranean—in short, over all parts of the globe, in small detachments, and that it was of the utmost importance that the officers by which it was commanded should maintain unimpaired their esprit de corps. That feeling would not admit, however, that it should be in the power of the authorities to select some gentleman, a relation perhaps of some Member of that or the other House, and put him over men who had been quartered in a pestiferous climate, where their services were forgotten—merely because it was thought he had done better service at St. James's than in foreign fields? His right hon. Friend was not a member of the Commission on which he (Mr. Ellice) had the honour to serve. Both Earl Grey and he had tried very much to improve the scientific corps of the army. The hon. and gallant Member for Harwich (Captain Jervis) had stated their case with great truth. Nothing could be worse than the state of the scientific corps. Six or seven years ago it was very difficult to find a captain who had not arrived at the age of 60. During the Duke of Wellington's campaign in the Peninsula they sent out to him various superior officers of the Artillery, and along with them

Captain Dickson. He found them all unfit for the position intended for them, and he took Captain Dickson, who being a general in the Portuguese service, and the two armies acting together, became a general in the united army, and commanded 12,000 men during the campaign. Such was the state at that time of the Artillery and Engineers. In the Commission, Earl Grey and he proposed that some measures should be taken at least to accelerate promotion, if for no other reason than this—that our troops served sometimes with other troops in the field, and a young foreign officer of 30 or 35 having been advanced for some particular service, was found commanding some of 60 or 70 years of age. They proposed to the two distinguished officers who served on that Commission, Sir John Burgoyne and Sir Hew Ross, that in the Artillery and Engineers, in order that something might be done, they should adopt the course taken, he believed, in the French army, and have one-third promotion by merit and two-thirds by seniority. Those two officers said they knew what were the feelings of these corps. The officers lived together as brothers. There was no mode of distinguishing during peace who were the superior officers, and they asked how they could select one man and place him above his seniors? If that system were attempted it must fail. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Herbert) had quoted such parts of the evidence of General Brown and General Yorke as appeared to be in favour of his proposition; but, so far as he (Mr. Ellice) knew their opinions, he must say there were no two officers in the British army more averse to this scheme. The proposition was that purchase should stop at the majority, and that officers should be selected for lieutenant colonels. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief on being asked his opinion on the subject, said he hoped that if that plan were carried out they would find some other person to undertake that selection. In this country during peace it was impossible. It might not be impossible in time of war, but it would be unjust: for, suppose a regiment serving in Jamaica, the officers sacrificing their lives in that pestilential country, was some young man for distinguishing himself in the Crimea to be placed over the heads of men of long and laborious service? The men who suffered most and deserved most from the country were those who served and suffered in those remote and isolated stations. Well, but was there no remedy for the evils of which his right hon. Friend complained, and preventing incompetent officers arriving at the head of regiments? They had some discussion on that subject in the Commission, and he asked the Duke of Cambridge whether he thought it would be his duty, supposing he knew a man incompetent to command, to appoint him even by purchase in his own regiment? His Royal Highness said, certainly not; but still it would be a very difficult and invidious duty to place on him. This, however, was very unlikely to occur, since examinations were instituted in the army by which the competence of officers was, to a certain extent, secured. There was another remedy suggested by his right hon. Friend, in which he entirely concurred. He thought there was nothing so bad as placing officers in command of regiments, and keeping them there till they became general officers. First of all they became too old for their duty, and then it stopped all kinds of promotion in the service. Unless they intended to alter the system of purchase altogether—and he would give his willing consideration to any scheme the Government might propose with that view—his belief was the only improvement they could now safely introduce was to use their authority directly to see that no incompetent officer was appointed to command a regiment; that officers shall only remain six years in command, and that the public should be prepared to provide liberally for them. They had no right to tell a man who had embarked his money as well as his existence in their service, that they would deprive him of that reward he had looked forward to until he became major general. He did not think the difference between his retiring allowances on full pay when he became a major general would be a very serious addition to the expense of the army. And he believed the best step between the existing system and that new system, which some more able man than himself must suggest for the abolition of purchase altogether, would be what he had just indicated. The hon. and gallant officer (Sir De Lacy Evans) had stated that he had produced certain papers before the Committee with respect to the relative condition of the navy and army. To show how serious a question this was, they had 150 retired officers who had from £1,000 to £3,000 a year from the public. Those pensions for their past services in command of regiments were partly a remuneration for the money they had invested in the service. An admiral in the navy had from £400 to £600 a year and no more, yet no man could say that a general's service was either more difficult or arduous than that of an admiral in the navy. Then there was our Indian army. Was that to be placed on the same footing? Their Indian officers were in a state of great uncertainty; they knew not who were their masters, and what was to be their destiny. It was full time that question was settled. Before they attempted to patch up the affairs of their own army and entertained novelties in their system of promotion, for God's sake let them have, at all events, before them some scheme as to how they were to deal with the Indian Army. That army, he supposed, would be added to that of the Queen. In the Indian Army the system of promotion was very different; the scale of pay, allowances, and pensions was very different; but these things were all in the air. They unsettled things very fast, and settled them very slowly. Let them, then, have some general scheme, not of mere patchwork, but by which they seriously intended to settle the affairs of the whole army, and then the House would decide on the entire question. Having said thus much, he might add, that he knew of no Administration that had done so much for the British Army as that of his right hon. Friend. Go where they might, look to what branch or department of the army they pleased, they would find that his head and hand had been at work in the right direction. This made him regret all the more that he felt himself now compelled to differ from his right hon. Friend on this occasion; but he must beg and entreat him to consider that each British regiment of Infantry was the best pawn to be found on the military chess-board of the world. It always stood its ground; it always did its duty well whenever and wherever called upon. Let them be just to the army—err rather on the side of generosity and liberality to their officers than show a disposition to curtail their privileges and advantages. The moment was one in which it was necessary to give encouragement to do everything that was great and generous on the part of the country towards the army. And, being afraid that the proposition of his right hon. Friend would be very badly received by the army in general, he was sorry to differ from him.

COLONEL NORTH said, he had heard with regret the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary at War.

VOL. CLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

His proposition was but an endeavour to get in the small end of the wedge which would eventually lead to the destruction of a system most advantageous to the army and the country. The plan of the right hon. Gentleman was not yet before them, but it would appear that the only prospect which an officer had in future before him was to attain the rank of major. However bad it might be on principle to look merely to money as a means of promotion, it would be still worse to have to look to the patronage of men in power. He could not clearly understand from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman how the officers were to be selected, and whether lieutenant colonels were to be chosen from the majors of other regiments. If that were so, they would be obliged to proceed a great deal in the dark, for it was well known that many men who showed no particular abilities as majors when promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonel made very good commanding officers. The chief reason why he objected to doing away the system of purchase in the army was the way in which it would operate to the injury of as good and brave a body of men as was to be found in any army in the world—the non-commissioned officers. He could not suppose that for the mere 1s. or 1s. 6d. a day, which the sergeant major would get when raised to a subaltern's position, he would be willing to sacrifice all his associations and remove into a totally different sphere to that in which he had formerly moved, and a sphere for which he was quite unfitted. In his opinion, the non-commissioned officers themselves would much prefer the continuance of the present system, as they generally looked forward to obtaining a commission as a reward of bravery and good conduct, in order that they might sell it and maintain themselves and their families in comfort. He did not think the statements of the hon. and gallant General, with respect to the manner in which the promotions were made, were quite in accordance with the facts, nor did he concur in the remarks he had made with respect to the youth of the officers. He believed that no class of men showed themselves better or more efficient in the Crimea than those youthful officers, and contended that their early entrance into the army was essential for the formation of thorough soldiers and officers.

LORD STANLEY said, he did not rise for the purpose of continuing the debate, but to express his hope that the hon. and gallant General would not think it necessary to divide upon a question with respect to which no distinct expression of opinion would be conveyed by the votes they gave. He had been a member of the Commission which sat on this subject four years ago, and he could assure the House that though no man had gone into that Commission with a stronger conviction of the anomalies and inconveniences of the purchase system, yet after he had heard the evidence there given he could not but see, as he believed all the members saw, that to abolish totally that system throughout all grades of the army was an undertaking of great difficulty, one which would be attended with enormous expense, and for the carrying out of which no sufficiently matured plan had then or to this day been submitted to the House and the country. As a member of that Commission he had at the time readily concurred in the compromise to which it had come, and which was embodied in the plan now proposed by the Secretary of State for War. To that course he was still prepared to adhere, and if the House went to a division, he should be compelled to vote against the proposal of the gallant General, which went to abolish the purchase system without substituting any plan for it, while he should be equally prepared to vote against any Resolution which might assert that the system was one which could be defended in all its parts. It appeared to him that the hon. and gallant General would, by pressing his Motion to a division, only injure the cause he had taken up, since many Members would be compelled to vote against him, who on general grounds would be in favour of some amelioration of the system. He hoped the House would be prepared to receive the compromise recommended by the Government without a division.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he would accept the suggestion of the noble Lord, and withdraw his Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON observed, that he hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had moved the Amendment would be disposed to withdraw it; as, of course, it was inapplicable now that the hon. and gallant General did not mean to take the sense of the House upon the Motion.

CAPTAIN LEICESTER VERNON said, that of course, as the Motion was withdrawn, he could have no objection to the withdrawal of the Amendment.

Lord Stanley

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, the House divided:—

LEAVE—FIRST READING.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend an Act to make provision for the better Government and discipline of the Universities of Scotland, and improving and regulating the course of study therein; and for the union of the two Universities and Colleges of Aberdeen. The Commissioners under the Act of 1858 for improving the discipline of the Universities had suppressed the faculty of Arts in Marischal College. He begged to move for leave to introduce a Bill to remedy this suppression, which was felt to be a grievance by the people of Aberdeen.

MR. CUMMING BRUCE remarked, that the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was, in effect, the casting of a most undeserved slur upon the legislative ability of that House. It was only two years since the then Lord Advocate introduced a Bill for the regulation of the Universities. The present Lord Advocate gave the measure his full concurrence. In Committee the hon. and gallant Gentleman proposed an Amendment which in substance was the same as the Bill he now proposed to introduce. That Amendment was negatived by a majority of about 100, and the Bill passed through Parliament. The Bill was scarcely in operation when the hon. and gallant Gentleman had the hardihood to move for leave to introduce a Bill to repeal it. He hoped that the House would refuse their assent to the Motion.

MR. E. ELLICE (St. Andrews) said, when he stated that the whole public of Aberdeen, the county, the synods of the two churches—free and old—all, without exception, were against the manner in which the Commissioners under the Act of 1858 had exercised their duty—and that if the award of the Commissioners was to be carried into effect, it would be almost a war upon the whole population—he thought he had stated sufficient reasons why they should allow the Bill to be brought in.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he supported the Bill of 1858, and was one of the Commissioners under it, and concurred in their ordinances, and he should therefore not be misunderstood when he recommended his hon. Friend not to throw any obstacles at this hour of the night to the introduction of the Bill; but he begged it to be distinctly understood that he did not mean to commit himself to the principle of the Bill, or promise the support of the Government to it.

MR. STEUART said, he did not think the House was in a fit state to enter into a discussion upon this Bill. Although the hon. Member for St. Andrews said that the synods of both Churches were against the commission, he had received within the last two days a letter from an influential member of one of those synods declaring his objection to the proposed Bill because he believed it would be destructive to the education of the rural part of the population north of Aberdeen. He would move that the debate be adjourned.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS expressed a hope that the hon. Gentleman would not persevere in his Amendment. Although it was not likely that he (Sir George Lewis) should support such a measure he should be sorry to see the Motion of the hon. and gallant General refused. If the Bill were introduced he would ask the hon. and gallant General to postpone the second reading of it until after Easter.

MR. STIRLING said, he thought that a bonâ fide case ought to be made out for the introduction of the Bill, and he did not think such a case had been made out. He hoped, however, the hon. Member for Cambridge would withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill to amend an Act to make provision for the better Government and Discipline of the Universities of Scotland, and improving and regulating the course of study therein; and for the union of the two Universities and Colleges of Aberdeen, ordered to be brought in by Colonel SYKES, the Earl of MARCH, Lord HADDO, and Mr. EDWARD ELLICH.

Bill presented and read 1^o.

PIERS AND HARBOURS BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. PAULL moved the second reading of this Bill. upon the understanding that it would be afterwards referred to a Select Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. RIDLEY opposed the Bill, on the ground that it conferred enormous powers on the Board of Admiralty, which already had enough to do in superintending and providing for the naval defences of the country.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he could only assent to the second reading of the Bill upon the understanding that it should be referred to a select Committee. If the principle of the measure were carried out with due consideration it might lead to a vast saving in the preliminary inquiries relative to the improvement of piers and harbours.

MR. FINLAY condemned the Bill as wrong in principle, inasmuch as it proposed to devolve upon the Admiralty powers which ought only to be exercised by a Committee of this House.

MR. BOUVERIE suggested that time ought to be given for the consideration of the details of the measure, and moved the adjournment of the debate.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS observed that he entirely approved of the suggestion that more time ought to be allowed for examining the details of the Bill.

MR. PAULL said, in that case he would consent to the debate being adjourned.

Debate adjourned till to-morrow.

CUSTOMS ACTS.—REPORT.

Resolutions reported.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he wished to ask why the article "books" had been omitted from the schedule?

SIR FITZROY KELLY remarked that as the Resolutions had been passed through Committee on the understanding that they should be afterwards taken more fully into consideration, he wished to know when that would be.

MR. LAING said, that in the absence of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer he wished to state that it was of extreme importance to the trade of the country, when Resolutions of this description were agreed to in Committee, they should be reported to the House with as little delay as possible. At that late hour of the night it would not be fair to bring forward any of those articles which would be likely to excite serious discussion, which would probably be the case with two of the articles—malt and timber. He thought there was no doubt those two articles might be brought forward to-morrow. With regard to books, that article, as well as all those into the manufacture of which paper entered, was postponed by arrangement, until the question of the paper duty should be fairly considered.

MR. BASS remarked, that as it was not intended to make any change in the malt duty for some considerable time, it did not matter whether that article was discussed to-morrow or a month hence.

MR. LAING said, the article on timber would necessarily come on at once. The article on malt would be taken on Friday if possible.

Resolutions 9 and 10 agreed to.

Resolutions 11 and 12 postponed; to be further considered this day.

Resolution 13 postponed; to be further considered on Friday.

Resolution 14 agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in upon Resolutions 9, 10, and 14, by Mr. MASSEY, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. LAING.

WAYS AND MEANS—REPORT.

Resolutions reported.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary for the Treasury, as it seemed to be proposed by the Government to give a bounty to the exporters of British spirits, how much the bounty was to amount to?

MR. LAING said, it was not properly a bounty, but it was an allowance to the exporter of British spirits for the loss he was subjected to on account of the Excise duty. The drawback would amount to 3*d.* per gallon on rectified spirits, and 2*d.* per gallon on raw spirits.

MR. HENLEY said, the thing might be called by any name the Government chose, but the provision amounted to a bounty to the British producer on the exportation of an article, which he would not obtain if the article were kept at home.

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

PACKET SERVICE (TRANSFER OF CONTRACTS) BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that as he understood that the contract, known as the Dovor contract, entered into between the Admiralty and Mr. Churchward, was to be transferred from that department to the Post Office, and as under a former contract, that of 1849, a gentleman, Captain Jenkins, he believed, was taken as a surety, whereas the contract was now being performed under the provisions of an agreement come to in 1859, he (Sir F. Kelly) wished to know whether Captain Jenkins was still held to be a surety under the contract of 1859, or whether he was held to be discharged; and, if it seemed necessary, he would suggest that the consideration of the Bill should be postponed till the House had had time to consider the circumstances.

MR. LAING said, there was nothing in the Bill before the House that interfered with the existing contracts. It simply did what was done several years ago in the reverse case. Then a number of contracts with the Post Office were transferred to the Admiralty; by this Bill there was a transfer of contracts or alleged contracts from the Admiralty to the Post Office, without in any way affecting their validity or invalidity. Whatever might be the position of Mr. Churchward or his sureties, with regard to the Admiralty, it would be precisely the same with regard to the Post Office. It was obvious, therefore, that if the view of the Admiralty was correct, that their contract of 1859 did not now exist, and that view was adopted by the House, and was not affected by law, no penalties on account of its non-performance could attach to a surety. No existing contract was affected by the Bill, which merely transferred the power of entering into contracts from the Admiralty to the Post Office.

Bill read 3^o, and passed.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Wednesday, March 7, 1860.

Their Lordships met, and having gone through the business on the Paper,

House adjourned at a Quarter before Four o'clock till To-morrow.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES, in moving the second reading of this measure, said the object of its leading provision was to prevent more than 300 objections being heard in one day by any barrister appointed to revise the list of voters. In the large constituency of the West Riding of Yorkshire by the absence of such a limitation a very large number of persons to whom objections had been taken were summoned to attend, and, having been detained till a late hour, were frequently dismissed without any possibility of having their cases decided till a future day; by which means, unless they happened to be zealous politicians, they became disgusted and went away, the result being that claims which were often just and valid were struck off the roll. From the magnitude of the practical inconvenience which was thus experienced it had become necessary to establish some fixed rule on the subject; and he selected the limit of 300 in order that the proceedings of the Court might not be unduly restricted. If any assurance, however, were given that the subject would undergo the general supervision of Parliament, he would be willing to withdraw his Motion; but in the absence of such an undertaking he believed the effect of a Reform Bill, if carried, would only be to magnify a grievance, of the existence of which there could be no doubt, by increasing the number of those entitled to the franchise.

MR. BAINES seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed—
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he had no invidious feeling towards the hon. Gentleman who proposed the Bill, but with the enormous mass of important business before the House it was necessary to show the futility of this peculiar species of legislation. Some general review of the system of registration must shortly take place; that system had been originated by the first Reform Bill, and it was only natural to suppose that it would be dealt with in the measure now before the House by some provision introduced either by the Government or by some private Member. The present system it must be confessed was not satisfactory. The revising barristers, it was well known, complained that the duties of the registration, being intrusted to ignorant and insufficiently remunerated overseers, were often negligently and inefficiently performed. The Bill before them was drawn to meet a single evil, but if partial, and what he might term local legislation were sanctioned on this question, there was no knowing to what extent the principle might be carried. An Act might be passed limiting the number of cases to be tried by a County Court Judge who had frequently 400 cases to get through on a single day; nay, they might even direct that a Judge at nisi prius should not have more than thirty or forty cases on his list. Grievances undoubtedly arose in practice from an excessive number of cases being set down, but it should be remembered that many were often governed by the decision in a single case; and the only proper safeguard lay in the appointment of competent and sensible officials to preside. He hoped the Motion would be withdrawn, but, in case it were persisted in, he should feel it his duty to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: It is a rule of law de minimis non curat lex, and I think it may be desirable that we should apply a similar rule to legislation. My hon. Friend makes this proposal from the best motives and with a desire to remedy an evil which has been brought peculiarly under his observation. But from any information which has reached me I am not aware that any general complaint is made respecting the mode in which the registration is conducted. With the exception of the 3rd clause, and of a provision that the name of the revising barrister shall be inserted in the notice, the Bill appears to be a verbatim reprint of a section of a former Act. Whether it is worth while to pass an Act of Parliament limiting revising barristers to the disposal of 300 cases a day it will be for the House to decide. My hon. Friend has not referred to any particular case in support of his argument, and I can only say that no complaint has reached me, nor am I aware that any communication has been addressed to Her Majesty's Government on the subject. If you are to legislate in this case why not in others? Why not pass an Act to limit the number of cases to be set down before County Court Judges or even those of the Superior Courts. But if you cannot trust Judges selected by authority to manage the business of their own courts, I contend that the whole of our judicial system must be abandoned. It may happen that 500 persons will have claims dependant on a common principle, and, being put down for a particular day, one decision will govern the entire number. It is, I admit, desirable that the somewhat intricate legislation with regard to elections, beginning with the issue of the writ down to the withdrawal of the election petition, should be revised, or, at all events, consolidated; and Her Majesty's Government have had under their consideration a Bill for the consolidation of all these statutes. The subject, however, is one of great difficulty and delicacy; the law on the subject is diverse both in Scotland and in Ireland, and where interests of such great importance are concerned it is requisite to proceed with caution. I cannot, therefore, undertake to bring forward the measure at any particular time, but the Government recognize the necessity which exists for its being considered at an early day, and they have already taken steps with that object in view.

MR. BAINES said, he had been a personal witness of the practical grievance to the electors of the West Riding which this Bill was intended to remedy. Several hundred persons whose votes were objected to were detained before the revising barrister till 10 or 11 o'clock at night, and refused on that ground to attend any more, and their votes were consequently lost. Revising barristers, instead of being paid, as formerly, for the time occupied in the revision, were now paid so much for the entire duty, by which means, as well as from the pressure of their private business, they were sometimes tempted to compress the time occupied by the revision as much as possible, and to perform each day more than an ordinary day's work.

MR. PEASE said, that in South Durham many voters were struck off the registry in consequence of the inconvenience to which persons were subjected in having to dance attendance on the barrister. He, however, hardly thought it worth while to pass a Bill on the subject.

MR. BEALE expressed a hope that the House would give serious attention to this subject, which would assume more important dimensions when the constituencies were increased.

MR. CLIVE said, that speaking from his own experience as a revising barrister subsequently to the passing of the Reform Bill, it was formerly objected that too much time was occupied in the revision. At that time the rate of payment was by the day; now, when the system had been altered, and barristers were paid by the job, it was said that they got through the work too quickly. There might be men in the profession who so far forgot themselves as to do that; but he did not know them. He believed the proposed limitation would be useless, and would interfere with the business of the Courts.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID observed, that he had heard many complaints of delays in disposing of cases in the borough registrations; persons were kept waiting three or four days in the registration courts.

MR. WALPOLE said, he objected to the measure. It was true the machinery of registration required material amendment; but if they attempted to lay down such a rule as that proposed by the hon. Member for Pontefract, by fixing a certain number of cases to be heard as a maximum, and if they extended that principle to boroughs, they would find the machinery much more expensive and dilatory, and that it would come to a stand-still. His opinion was, the work was, upon the whole, at present well done. In some boroughs there were thousands of objections, a vast number of which were of a very frivolous nature, being based upon a misdescription of the household property and the like, and which broke down as soon as they came before an experienced barrister. Again, if they were to limit the number of cases to be set down to 300 in one day, the revising barrister would some days have done at twelve or one o'clock, whilst other days two or three cases might occupy him the entire day. He felt confident, therefore, that the present Bill would increase rather than mitigate the inconvenience which at present existed. The best mode of securing a good administration of the law was to take care that able men were appointed to carry it out, and then they might trust to the influence of public opinion to correct any inconvenience. He was glad the Government intended to take the subject into consideration. He thought, if they imposed any restriction, that proposal would not, at all events, answer the purpose. He hoped to see the Government take the whole subject in hand very soon.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he would consent to withdraw his Bill, but subject to the assurance that if, when the general measure was introduced, no such provision was embodied in it, he should move the insertion of a clause.

CORONERS' BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COBBETT said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill. The chief object of the measure was to alter the mode of paying coroners. At present they were paid by fees under an Act of the reign of George II. For some years there had been a conflict between the magistrates and the coroners as to the allowance of these fees. Sometimes they were allowed, and sometimes, under precisely similar circumstances, they were disallowed. In Middlesex, Kent, Norfolk, and twelve other counties, this conflict had taken place. He looked upon the office of coroner as one of great importance; and as the conflict raged and was spreading, it was desirable they should terminate it by altering the law as to the mode of payment. The dispute appeared to have begun soon after the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Act. Practically, the fees of the coroners were formerly paid out of the poor-rate; but the Poor Law Board, wishing to take from the poor-rate every payment not strictly chargeable upon it, obtained an Act which rendered it no longer legal to pay coroners' fees out of the rate for the poor; but the magistrates were enjoined to pay them out of the county rate. The magistrates, then, beginning to look more particularly into these expenses than before, and in some cases, perhaps, thinking they could supersede the coroners altogether, began to disallow their charges of fees for inquests. The practice began in the county of Middlesex, the magistrates of which passed a resolution in the year 1861 stating that the office of coroner was unnecessary. Other counties adopted the same resolution, citing the example of Middlesex as an authority for so doing. From that time there had been a strong contest raging against the coroner. In Middlesex a great number of cases had been disallowed without reason assigned. In Kent the magistrates had instructed the coroner not to hold an inquest except in cases where there was a suspicion of criminality. In some instances the coroner had been instructed not to hold inquests at all. When some years ago the numerous cases of poisoning in the county of Norfolk excited public attention it was stated that twenty persons lost their lives by the administration of poison, without any inquest being held on them; and the Home Secretary of that time (Sir James Graham) expressed his regret at the jealousy existing between the magistrates and the coroners, which discouraged them from holding inquests. He (Mr. Cobbett) had received several communications in which the same opinion was expressed, and he might add that the number of cases of suspicious death was attributed in a petition from Durham to the disallowance of the coroners' expenses by the magistrate. In the counties where the fees were most generally disallowed the coroners' juries frequently passed a resolution condemning the conduct of the magistrates in disallowing the expenses. This proved there was a strong feeling in those counties, adverse to the course taken by the magistrates. His attention was drawn to the subject from hearing that in the West Riding of York the magistrates had issued a circular to the constables, instructing them as summoning officers in what cases it would be necessary to inform the coroner and summon a jury. This seemed to him to be calculated to lead to great mischief. The document directed the constable to make inquiry into suspicious cases, and, having satisfied himself, to act accordingly. He put it to the House whether that was not practically abolishing the office of coroner, or at least subordinating to the police-officer a jurisdiction which was one of the safeguards of the country. The police-constables could not possibly know all the circumstances of every death by accident. They were instructed not to inform the coroner of such cases as death by being thrown from a horse or falling from a scaffold, or an infant overlaid in bed, "or such like." Only by inquiry could it be ascertained if the scaffold was properly constructed or not; or whether a man in a quarrel might not have been pushed off the scaffold by another person. Death from such a fall might involve the guilt of murder or manslaughter. The cases of "infants overlaid in bed" were especially open to suspicion; it was a lamentable fact that in the last thirty years the proportion of deaths among infants had enormously increased and was increasing. If a kind of impunity were extended to deaths from such a cause, and the check of an inquiry by the coroner were removed, he feared the crime of infanticide would be fearfully increased. And could it be imagined that any person would give impunity to such cases, as was done by the circular of the magistrates in this instance? He had also received many letters on the advantages to the public of coroners' inquiries, among others from Mr. Dickinson, an inspector of coal mines, who stated that coroners' inquiries brought into discussion the management of mines. What would be the condition of the workpeople if there was no inquest? The principle of the Bill was that in future coroners should be paid by salaries instead of fees; that the amount of salary should be calculated on the area and population of a district; the amount to be fixed, on that calculation, by agreement between the magistrates and the coroner; in case they could not agree the salary would be fixed by the Secretary of State. There were other clauses amending the law in matters in which it had been found defective under recent statutes.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he would move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, which should also be instructed "to consider the state of the Law and practice as regards the taking of Inquisitions in cases of death, and the election of and the remuneration now paid to Coroners; and whether it is expedient that any, and what, alteration should be made in the manner in which such remuneration is now made; and to consider the effect and operation of the Statutes now in force upon that subject, and to report thereupon to the House." There were three principal points which were important enough to be examined by a Select Committee—first, whether coroners should be paid by fees, as at present under the Statutes of Geo. II., or, secondly, by fixed salaries, and, thirdly, whether the office ought to be abolished or retained. He thought the House would pause before it decided that such an office should be abolished. It was the most ancient in the kingdom, so ancient that its origin was scarcely known. He believed it could be traced to the reign of Alfred, and it was certainly in full operation in the time of Elizabeth and James I. That was shown by the illustration of "Crowners' quest law," given in the play of "Hamlet" by Shakspeare; with regard to which it was doubtful whether the great dramatist intended to vindicate the authority of the coroner, or to satirize a celebrated case reported in Plowden, in respect to the inquest on Sir James Hales, the Judge who tried Lady Jane Grey. But it was certain that the office of coroner was a very ancient one. The hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Cobbett) had referred to the value and importance of a coroner's duty. But he might be allowed to mention a very remarkable case, in which, had it not been for a coroner's inquest, a great criminal might not have been brought to justice. It was the case of Palmer. The medical men in that case had given their certificate that Cook died of apoplexy, and the body would have been buried on that certificate, had not the father-in-law of Cook gone down to Rugely and obtained an inquiry into the cause of death by a coroner's jury. On the verdict of that jury Palmer was indicted for murder. When the duty of a coroner was properly performed it was a great safeguard. He did not say that duty should be exceeded, and that the coroner ought to wound the feelings of families by making an inquiry into every case of sudden death; but in all cases of which no explanation could be given of the circumstances under which the body was found, no doubt the coroner's inquiry was a great security. The other two questions were as to the different modes of paying the coroner, and on these points the House would derive great advantage from an investigation by a Select Committee. He thought the payment by fees brought the coroner into unseemly conflict with the magistrates. In some cases the magistrates were wrong. But the difficulty was that nothing like precedent could be established on which they could decide. It must depend entirely on the various circumstances of each case. It was impossible to lay down any fixed rule. It was a hard case for the coroners that one bench of magistrates might take one view of a case, and another a totally different one. The verdict on an inquest might also involve the visiting magistrates in blame when it was held in the county gaol or asylum. The next question was whether a coroner ought to be paid a fixed remuneration. Men of high authority upon the subject were of opinion that coroners ought to be paid by means of salaries, and almost the only argument which he had heard against that proposal was that the stimulus to hold necessary inquests, which under the present system existed, would thereby be removed. The best control, however, he could not help thinking, which could be exercised in the matter was that which was afforded by public opinion, and

By the selection for the office of coroner of honourable and upright men. There would then be no fear that the duties of the office would not be properly discharged, as from his own experience he believed they were at the present moment.

Amendment proposed,

“ To leave out from the word ‘ That ’ to the end of the Question, in order to add the words ‘ a Select Committee be appointed, to consider the state of the Law and practice as regards the taking of Inquisitions in cases of death, and the election of and the remuneration now paid to Coroners ; and whether it is expedient that any, and what, alteration should be made in the manner in which such remuneration is now made ; and to consider the effect and operation of the Statutes now in force upon that subject ; and to report thereupon to the House, ’—instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he feared the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken must, after the Motion which he had made, be regarded as in some measure guilty of infanticide, and the Bill before the House as a fit subject for a coroner's inquisition, inasmuch as he found on the back of it the name of the hon. and learned Gentleman himself. So far as the office to which the Bill related was concerned, he could only say that it was one of high antiquity, and one by means of which great security for the preservation of human life was provided. It must, nevertheless, he thought, be admitted that changes and improvements had of late years been introduced into our social system which rendered the duties of the office of less importance than they were in ancient times. He might also observe that Shakespeare, in referring to “ crowner's quest law,” in the passage to which the hon. and learned Gentleman had alluded, had not intended to speak of it with any very great respect. In Scotland no such office as that of coroner existed, and yet he had never heard that life was in that country less secure than in England or Ireland. The fact was that the light which in modern times was thrown upon events, the intelligence which the newspapers supplied in each county with respect to everything which took place within it, and the general institution of the county police, had diminished the value of the office in question; and to that fact it was, he thought, to be attributed that the magistrates showed a desire to diminish the extent of its operations. In many counties the magistrates had, in certain instances, disallowed the fees for inquests which had been held; while in others a rule had in express words been laid down to the effect that unless reasonable cause of suspicion arose that the death of a person had been produced by illegal and improper means no inquiry before the coroner should be entered upon; that was to say, that such inquiry should not take place in those instances in which death was found to have been accidental. It was perhaps to the repeal of the old law of deodand in 1846 that that change in the views of the magistrates in particular localities was to be attributed; for to ascertain the deodand had, before the repeal of the Act to which he referred, been one of the functions with which the coroner and a jury were intrusted. There was, however, in the existing state of things with regard to holding inquests an evil which called for some remedy—he alluded to the conflict of opinion on the subject which prevailed between the magistrates and the coroner. The coroner had no defence against the magistrates, whilst the Home Secretary was unable to interfere. It was with a view to provide a remedy that he had introduced the Bill which stood on the paper for second reading in his name. In that Bill he proposed to give the coroner in those cases in which his fees had been disallowed by the magistrates a right of appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench ; and, although he had heard it stated that that proposal would be rendered nugatory in consequence of the expense which the appeal would involve, yet he did not think it ought to be rejected in deference to that argument, because, notwithstanding that it was quite clear that if appeals were to be made every time a sum of 20s. was matter of dispute the objection would be valid, still he could not help believing that such would not be the case, but that, the question of right once tried, the decision pronounced would become of general application, and the principle contended for would be settled one way or the other. But, to advert for a moment to the Bill under discussion, the hon. and learned Member for Oldham proposed to give up payment by fees in the case of coroners, and to substitute for it payment by salary. Now, one obvious objection to that course was that it might make the coroner, under the altered system, less zealous in taking all the steps which would be desirable to inform himself with regard to the circumstances of the different deaths which might take place in his county, whereas while the payment continued to be by fees it was his direct interest to do so. The hon. and learned Gentleman, moreover, proposed to enable the coroner to enter into an agreement with the magistrates as to the amount of salary which he should receive, empowering him, if he were not satisfied with his bargain, to apply to the Secretary of State, who might without any control charge the county rates with the sum which he might think fit by way of increase of salary. Now, to act upon that proposal would be to impose a charge on those rates on a new principle, and he for one did not deem it expedient, unless some strong necessity for making the change could be shown, to resort to so extreme a remedy. The same might be said of the power given to the Lords of the Treasury to settle a scale of superannuation. He should, under these circumstances, vote against the second reading of the Bill, while he should not object to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the subject.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, it was formerly the practice to pay the highest judicial officers by fees, but this system was abolished because it was desirable that they should be rendered independent. He did not see, therefore, why the ancient judicial office of coroner should not be placed on the same footing. The Bill, however, would not remedy the state of things that existed; he was anxious, therefore, that it should go before a Select Committee. One of the evils of the system as it stood undoubtedly was that unseemly contests between the magistrates and the coroner in many instances prevailed, while the latter was fettered in his freedom of action by the fact that he had not only to come to a decision whether it was desirable a particular inquest should or should not be held, but also to take into account the probability, in case it should be held, of the proceeding obtaining the sanction of another body. He was also of opinion that the mode of electing coroners—in connection with which at present bribery to a great extent prevailed, so that the coroner de jure was not in all cases the coroner de facto—was a subject which might with advantage be investigated by the Committee. At present there was no remedy for the abuses that took place, except by a quo warranto on the part of the defeated candidate; and under that issue the jury would have to try the validity of all the votes given at the election.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he thought that the whole subject of inquisitions in case of death should be referred to a Select Committee, and that any legislation on the subject which might take place ought to embrace Ireland as well as this country. The order of reference to the Committee, if one were appointed, should be more extensive in its scope than the provisions of the Bill would seem to justify, and he hoped that, pending the inquiry before the Committee, the Secretary for the Home Department would not press his Bill through the House. The office of coroner was, he might add, a most important one; it was, according to the report of the Registrar General, a popular institution, inasmuch as the county coroner was elected by the freeholders. It was also, according to the same authority, one of the great advantages of the inquest that it engaged the body of the people in the administration of justice. He trusted, therefore, that the Committee would enter into an extensive investigation of the subject.

MR. COLLIER said, he should support the Amendment. The ground stated by the hon. and learned Member for Oldham (Mr. Cobbett) for reading his Bill a second time was that inquests were not holden in cases where they ought to be. Now, he (Mr. Collier) thought that if they paid coroners by salary, and not by fees, their interest would be to hold as few inquests as possible. Coroners were placed in an entirely different position to the Judges, who had to deal with the business brought before them by other persons. The whole mischief had arisen through a mistaken view of the law by certain justices in some counties, and he thought they had taken a far too limited view of the duties of coroners. The justices had acted under a misapprehension of the law when they supposed that a repeal of the law affecting deodands interfered with the question of the payment of coroners. With respect to the Bill of the Government, it seemed to him to deal with a matter quite independent of the duties of a Committee.

MR. HENLEY said, he quite agreed that the subject before the House was one of considerable importance. The object of every hon. Member must be to secure that all inquests which were necessary should, and that all those which were unnecessary should not be held. Then arose the question, what means it was most desirable to adopt in order to secure that end. Was payment of the coroner by salary the best system which could be adopted, or was payment by fees preferable? Now in dealing with that point he could by no means concur with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department in the opinion that the office of coroner was less necessary now than it had been in former times, or that inquests should be held only in those cases in which a person had come by his death by illegal and improper means, to the exclusion of those instances in which death was the result of accident.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had pronounced no opinion of his own upon that point, but had simply referred to the view of the matter which was in all probability that which was taken up by the magistrates.

MR. HENLEY continued: Although the right hon. Gentleman had expressed no opinion of his own on the subject, yet it appeared to him that the tone of his remarks was such as to have justified him (Mr. Henley) in the inference which he had drawn. But, be that as it might, a question which naturally suggested itself was, how the coroner was to ascertain that death in a certain case had been the result of illegal and improper causes, unless inquiry into the matter were instituted. Take the instance of a railway accident. It was the duty of a coroner to inquire into the whole matter. Again, there were deaths which arose from negligence. That was an important matter, and, if he might use the phrase, it had received great development in the course of the present century. But it was said that the duties of the coroner were less necessary on account of the publicity given to such matters by the newspapers. It was the inquest, however, which gave that publicity which was turned by the newspapers to such valuable account, and in dealing with the subject that which such an investigation often prevented as well as what it brought to light ought, he should contend, to be duly regarded. Persons too often came to a hasty conclusion, from the nature of the verdict, that such and such an inquest should not have been held, forgetting that the holding of inquests prevented a great deal of bad work, as he should call it, going on. Coroners had other duties to perform than that of merely sitting in judgment. They had to ferret out the whole case. He was very glad the subject was to be referred to a Select Committee. It was not a very simple or easy question. Generally speaking, he believed coroners were a very respectable class of men, with important judicial functions to discharge, and they did their duty honestly, fairly, and well. He could not, however, approve paying them by salary; that would take away one of the strongest existing inducements to an active performance of their duty, particularly as the magistrates who paid would have an interest coincident with that of the coroner in preventing many inquests taking place. He thought the Government Bill should be referred to the same Committee so as to improve its machinery as much as possible, as there would be more difficulty in working out his Bill than the right hon. Gentleman appeared to imagine. No one case could properly form a precedent for other cases, for every case would depend on its own surrounding circumstances. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would allow his Bill to go through the same ordeal with that of the hon. Member for Oldham. He should support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he was at a loss to know why the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State would not send his Bill before a Select Committee. Supposing the right hon. Gentleman's Bill passed into law, they would call upon the Queen's Bench to perform duties which they had already declined. He thought both Bills should be referred to a Select Committee. The reference should also, in his view, be enlarged to comprehend an inquiry into the election of coroners. In Middlesex, for instance, persons amply qualified for the office were deterred from becoming candidates in consequence of the great trouble and expense involved in an election where the constituency was so very large and a contest might extend over ten days. The election was in the hands of the freeholders, but not freeholders on the parliamentary roll or any roll; nobody knew who they were; but they came forward and proceeded to establish their claim at the time of election. The coroner had often most important judicial functions to discharge. The Bill for the regulation of mines contained clauses imposing penalties not only on masters but on miners, for neglecting to carry out the regulations that were prescribed. Was it not absolutely necessary that the coroner should have the opportunity of inquiring into the causes of death in such cases? Who was to do it if not the coroner? The causes of the late accident on the Eastern Counties Railway were now being investigated before the coroner, and he had no doubt the result of the inquiry would be pretty nearly decisive, not indeed as to the amount of damages that should be awarded, but as to whether there was any negligence on the part of the railway.

SIR GEORGE GREY thought the law in an unsatisfactory state, from the different course which was taken by different benches of magistrates,—some placing no check on the discretion of coroners, and others too narrowly restricting them. It was urgently pressed upon him that the law should be altered, and it was suggested that the payment of the coroners should be by salaries. But the difficulty connected with the payment of coroners by salary was this, that it would take away every motive but a sense of duty for holding inquests. At present their payment depended on the number of inquests held; but the moment a salary was substituted for fees their interest would lie in the opposite direction. He thought, however, it would be right to give them a power of appeal when their allowances were too small. He agreed with the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire that coroners had very important duties to perform, and effectual precautions should be taken against their neglect. This Bill was totally silent on that point, and in other respects would require extensive alterations. The Commission which sat on the costs of prosecutions had taken some evidence which bore on the question, but only incidentally, and it was most desirable that, without committing the House to this Bill, the whole subject should be inquired into by a Committee. The terms of the inquiry proposed by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. E. James) would include everything except the mode of appointing the coroner; but words might be added to the reference which would embrace that point as well. On the order of the day for the second reading of the Bill of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State he would explain the course he intended to take in regard to it.

MR. DEEDES said, that as a member of the Commission which had been referred to, he wished to state the course he should pursue on this matter. He thought the Bills should be referred to the consideration of a Select Committee. Unfortunately he had, as magistrate for Kent, been engaged in a contest with the coroners through a difference of opinion in reference to their charges. It was a matter which he did not like, but, as a guardian of the public purse, he felt that he was bound to inquire into the holding of inquests. He would suggest this. If the Government Bill could not be referred, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would abstain for the present from further legislation, and until the House received the Report of the Committee, for the appointment of which he should vote.

MR. INGHAM said, he also should support the Amendment. He wished, moreover, to point out that the constitution of the jury in the coroner's court was a matter that ought to be investigated. These juries had often delicate and difficult duties to discharge, and yet no qualification whatever was necessary for the office.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he was in favour of paying coroners, as well as all other judicial officers, by salaries instead of fees, which salaries should be fixed by the magistrates on taking area and population into account. He then denied the imputation that a salary would render coroners indifferent; he held that they were a most respectable class, and he was sure that in every case they would do their duty. He objected to the Government Bill on the ground that if an appeal were taken to the Queen's Bench, the Judges would only give a decision on that particular case, and it would be of no value for guiding other cases. If their Bill, therefore, were not sent to the Committee he hoped at least it would be withdrawn. He hoped, also, the hon. and learned Member for Oldham would withdraw his Bill, and allow the whole matter to go to the Committee.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he also would recommend that both Bills should be simultaneously referred to the same Committee. They would thus best meet the convenience of all parties, do full justice to the case, and most effectually secure the object they all sought to attain. He was the more sincere in this advice, as he had himself on former occasions brought in a Bill on the same subject.

MR. BOVILL said, that in cases from Kent and Gloucestershire the Court of Queen's Bench had declined to entertain the jurisdiction of deciding cases which might guide the Courts of Quarter Sessions in saying whether the fees ought to be allowed or not. Therefore he thought the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State, to allow an appeal to the Queen's Bench in certain cases, would end in no decision being obtained which would be of the slightest use. He happened to be able to speak from experience, on a matter that had lately come before the Court of Queen's Bench on the propriety of holding an inquest, and in that case affidavits were filed at an expense of from £50 to £100, and it was the opinion of the Court that the coroner had acted properly. The Bill of the Home Secretary proposed that a case should be stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench; but what materials would there be for such a case? No question of law would be raised, and if it were not a matter of law or principle the Court of Queen's Bench would decline to adjudicate upon it, and would probably send down the case again to the Court of Quarter Sessions, that it might be determined whether the coroner had exercised a proper discretion in holding the inquest. With regard to the Bill of the Government, he thought it ought to be referred to the same Select Committee as that of the hon. and learned Member for Oldham. Everybody seemed to be agreed that it was important to retain the office of coroner, and the only question for consideration was to ascertain how the performance of his duty could be secured in the most efficient manner. The best mode of arriving at a satisfactory decision upon the subject was to refer the whole matter to a Select Committee, and he trusted that the Home Secretary would accede to the suggestion.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the debate had very much turned on the Bill that he proposed, but he wished the House to understand that the Bill was intended to remove a pressing evil, and it afforded a remedy for that which was admitted to be a grievance in a great number of counties. His belief was that it would afford a constitutional and effective remedy, and that it would not prejudice the question whether the coroner should be paid by salary or by fees. As it appeared to be a general wish that the Bill should not be proceeded with till the Committee had reported, he had no objection it should be postponed.

MR. PEASE said, he thought the general feeling throughout the country was in favour of the Bill of the hon. Member for Oldham, in preference to that of the Government.

MR. BUCHANAN remarked, that if a Scotch lawyer were asked the question, he would say that the sheriffs of counties in Scotland were as vigilant as the coroners in England, but the fact was it was a matter of reproach in Scotland that there were not sufficient inquests held, and the reason assigned was that there was no coroner who had his fee. He suggested that the Committee should include some gentlemen of legal experience in Scotland.

MR. COBBETT said, he was gratified by the discussion which had taken place, as his only object was to secure the efficiency of an important public officer. He was perfectly willing to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, as it appeared to be the general wish of the House.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words added.

Ordered,

"That a Select Committee be appointed, to consider the state of the Law and practice as regards the taking of Inquisitions in cases of death, and the election of and the remuneration now paid to Coroners; and whether it is expedient that any, and what, alteration should be made in the manner in which such remuneration is now made; and to consider the effect and operation of the Statutes now in force upon that subject; and to report thereupon to the House."

OXFORD UNIVERSITY BILL.— COMMITTEE.

House in Committee according to Order.
Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he had a series of verbal Amendments to move, the object of which was to insure that the scheme of the college and the scheme of the Commissioners should appear on an equal footing before the Judicial Committee of Privy Council. He would also suggest the propriety of some security being taken against the appointment of any of the Oxford University Commissioners to sit on the Judicial Committee of Privy Council when adjudicating upon the ordinance.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it was not usual, and would be inconvenient in any Act of Parliament, to limit the discretion of the Crown in the selection of the members of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council. But he had no hesitation in informing the noble Lord that in advising Her Majesty in the choice of such persons care should be taken to avoid the selection of members of the Privy Council who might have acted on the Oxford University Commission when the ordinance that was the subject of discussion was passed.

Amendments agreed to.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE TO FRANCE.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that those of their Lordships who had gone through the Correspondence relating to the proposed annexation of Savoy and Nice to France, recently presented to Parliament, would, no doubt, be aware that in one of the despatches Lord Cowley stated that an important conversation had taken place between himself and Count Walewski; that in such conversation Count Walewski had reminded him that on more than one or two occasions he had intimated to him that under certain circumstances—for instance, if the Duchies should be united to Sardinia—France would feel it necessary to annex Savoy. Lord Cowley acknowledged the correctness of that statement, but he proceeded to say that he did not think it necessary officially to notify that conversation in a despatch to the Secretary of State, but confined the mention of it to his private communications to the noble Lord. Lord Cowley further assigned, as a reason for that course, that these were questions likely to come before the Congress of the Powers which was to be held at Paris, and that he was unwilling, therefore, to involve Her Majesty's Government in hypothetical discussions of that nature. Lord Cowley might have been perfectly right in confining his intimation of these conversations to a private communication, but the reason which he gave for adopting that course was questionable. He was quite aware that there were times and cases in which it was desirable that a Minister abroad should have the power of writing to the Foreign Secretary with less restraint and reserve than was compatible with a public despatch; not but he thought that the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle) must feel that it was a power which ought to be exercised with the greatest discretion. Unless that discretion was observed clearly one of two consequences must follow. In the absence of communications which had a direct bearing on the subject of the papers submitted, and without which those papers were incomplete, Parliament could not be in a position to draw a fair and impartial conclusion. And, on the other hand, unless they insisted that the communications which passed between the Minister abroad and the Foreign Secretary should be such as could be produced in Parliament, he did not know how they could enforce that Ministerial responsibility which the constitutional practice of Parliament required. There might be good reasons for what was done in this particular case, and therefore if the noble Duke could assure him that in those documents to which he had especially referred there was nothing necessary to a full understanding of the papers laid before the House, nothing in them tending to modify the views which might be reasonably founded upon those papers, as far as he was concerned, he should be perfectly satisfied. He should, however, be glad to have a statement from his noble Friend that that was the case.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: The House will excuse me if I do not go into the question of the annexation of Savoy, or the conduct of Her Majesty's Government except as to one point, for that would be to anticipate the debate which is shortly to take place on the general subject; neither will I enter into any question as to the scope of private letters which may be addressed by a Minister abroad to the Secretary of State. I readily admit that it requires the exercise of discretion in both parties. But there are none of your Lordships at all conversant with the conduct of public business, who will not admit that anything which should tend to diminish free and unrestricted intercourse between those in high office and those whom they employ in distant missions, would be very prejudicial to the public service; and that, rightly restricted, the power of addressing the Minister at home or the Ambassador abroad in private letters is of great advantage, and enables the Minister to know much more of the details of what is going on than he could learn by means of public despatches, restrained by considerations which it is needless to point out. I do not think that in this instance the remarks of the noble Earl imply any blame to Earl Cowley for the letters he wrote, nor to the Foreign Minister for treating them as private. The noble Earl asked me whether these letters would alter the aspect of the case as appearing on the face of the papers already presented to Parliament. That is a difficult question to answer. It is a matter of opinion. It is possible, no doubt, that if the noble Earl saw the letters, he might take a different view from that which I take. But if the noble Earl asks me my opinion, I tell him that I believe Parliament has before it, frankly and fully stated, the whole of the case, from the time when the Government entered upon office down to the present time, and that the private letter would not at all alter or affect it. These letters give an account of conversations, in which, as Earl Cowley states, Count Walewski puts hypothetically a case assumed—that in such and such an event, France might consider she ought to have Savoy. It was not stated that there was any such proposition before the French Government. On the contrary, Count Walewski denied all intention of annexation, and he only reverted to the subject from time to time, hypothetically, as Earl Cowley states. These conversations were reported to the Foreign Minister; but, until the production of these papers, there was no reason to suppose that the solemn denial given by Count Walewski at an early period had been departed from. As soon as it was known that the subject was revived in the form of a definite project, the communications assumed an official character, and those official communications have been produced, and are on your Lordships' table. I can give no further answer, therefore, to the noble Earl than this—that I do not believe that the private letters would at all alter or affect the case on the papers presented to Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY: I cannot agree in the inference drawn by the noble Duke from the fact that the communications of the French Government declared no positive intention to annex Savoy. If I am not mistaken, the communications of Count Walewski amounted to a notification on the part of the French Government that if the English Government should persevere in taking a certain course, then that would compel the French Government to take a course which, at the first, they had disclaimed any intention of taking. If that is the real state of the case, the communication of these conversations ought never to have been confined to private correspondence. I am bound to say that I believe, in the whole course of diplomatic correspondence, there has never been an instance in which a communication from a foreign Government, of a possible change of purpose grounded on a change of course on the part of the British Government in a matter so important, has been suppressed: the result being that there is no official or parliamentary record of so important a fact. I cannot admit that a communication of that kind should be confined to private correspondence, and I protest against it as an unusual course.

EARL GREY: I concur with the noble Marquess, and think it is a subject of considerable importance. I admit that it would be unwise to throw restrictions on private correspondence between Secretaries of State and those who serve the Government abroad; it would be a restraint attended with extreme inconvenience and injury to the public service. But the condition upon which such private correspondence ought to be allowed is this, that no fact of importance should be reported to the Government in a private letter which ought not also to be recorded in a public despatch; and that no instructions on which any official servant of the Government is to act shall be sent in a private letter without its being also accompanied by a public despatch. It is absolutely necessary that any facts reported to the Government, and any directions or instructions given thereupon, should be officially recorded. My Lords, observe how serious are the evils which must arise from the contrary practice. In the first place, as has been pointed out by the noble Earl who originated the conversation, the constitutional power and control of Parliament is defeated. And if eventually the negotiation, or the conduct of any affair, leads to consequences which occasion a discussion in Parliament, it is depriving Parliament of its power of forming a proper judgment on what has occurred. Again, the Queen has a right, and it is her duty, to exercise a control over the conduct of the Foreign Minister, and no despatch of importance can be sent to a foreign Ambassador without receiving the sanction of the Queen. Now we know that the noble Lord the present Foreign Secretary, in a very remarkable instance, enforced this prerogative on the part of the Crown against his present chief in the Cabinet. Nor is this all. It is not the less important to make the whole Government responsible for what is done in public affairs. It is a practice, however, I fear, not new for the Foreign Minister to act on a different principle from that which is observed in every other public Department; and I believe a great many important matters have been improperly confined to private letters, instead of being recorded in public documents. What is the consequence? The members of the Cabinet find themselves, from time to time, brought into a situation in which they are obliged to choose between either making themselves responsible for measures which, if they had known what was going on, they would have objected to, or abandoning the Government perhaps in a season of difficulty. My Lords, this is no imaginary case. Such things have actually happened. And when, in any particular instance, it is brought to our notice that the wholesome rule has been departed from, it is fit that it should be brought to our notice, as it has been by the noble Earl on the present occasion. No one can deny the fact that the Foreign Minister of France told our Ambassador that, under certain circumstances, France might feel it necessary to take possession of Savoy. And that was a fact of very great importance, which ought to have been placed on record officially at the Foreign Office. It is no excuse to say that it was desirable not to involve our Government in any correspondence about it, for it would by no means follow, because our Ambassador reported it to our Foreign Minister, that therefore the Government would think it proper to take any further notice of the fact. Such a notification was undoubtedly made, and I must repeat that there ought to have remained at the Foreign Office a record of the fact. On the contrary, we find that for several months there had been no official record of such an important fact, and I must say that a great constitutional principle has been seriously infringed, and that great blame is attached to the Government for having taken such a course.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) had laid down the rule very distinctly as to private letters passing between our agents abroad and the Foreign Secretary; but although he spoke of the Minister abroad exercising a certain discretion he appeared to deny altogether the exercise of any discretion in the present instance. In point of fact, the course which should have been taken depended very much upon the manner in which the so-called communication was made by Count Walewski to Lord Cowley. Any one who had carried on diplomatic conversations must be aware how very difficult it was to know how to treat a communication made by the Minister of a foreign country of an informal kind, especially when the communication is made as an illustration of an hypothetical event. There was, however, one mode of testing the weight which Count Walewski meant to be placed upon the communication he made, and the amount of importance Lord Cowley should have attached to it. In all cases where an important communication was made by the Foreign Minister of one country to the Government of another a despatch was addressed by the Foreign Minister to the Ambassador at the other Court, stating his views, and thus ensuring their communication to the foreign Government in his own words and supported by his own arguments. Such was the rule, and it was rarely, and always with inconvenience, departed from. The reason for it was obvious; being simply that, were the views stated in conversation, the person to whom they were addressed might not attach the same importance to them as the Minister who uttered them. He must say, therefore, that Count Walewski not having followed that course, Earl Cowley was entitled to believe that the communication in question was not of such importance as it was now attempted to attach to it. The noble Lord spoke of a change of purpose on the part of the French Government; but as far as he (Lord Wodehouse) was aware no such change had occurred.

The matter remained as before. Count Walewski had on one occasion given an explanation of the condition of affairs, which was accompanied by a statement on the part of the Emperor himself; and afterwards the Count, in reference to the proposal for a Congress, made an observation as to what might take place in the event of a certain arrangement, which he thought could not possibly be adopted, coming into force. The noble Lord had alluded to a former difference between the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs and the present chief of the Government, in reference to the subject of despatches to Ministers abroad; but the conclusion to be drawn from that circumstance was, that the discretion of the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) might safely be trusted not to dispense with an official responsibility he had himself so strongly enforced.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, there can be no doubt as to the right of Parliament or the Crown in this matter. There is no question that the Parliament, as well as the Queen, has the right to be fully informed as to what has passed; and that the Queen must be informed before any despatches or orders are sent to our Ministers abroad. But I think the noble Earl (Earl Grey) went a little too far, and applied the rule somewhat too rigorously, when he alluded to a practice that he says has risen up, of Foreign Secretaries keeping their Colleagues in ignorance of what is going on. There is a difference between the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office (of which the noble Earl was formerly the head) as to the manner of transacting business. The Colonial Minister has plenty of time to answer despatches he receives, and to determine upon the course of action. That is not so with the Foreign Office. There is often extremely little time for action, or for reply. In these days much of the correspondence of the Foreign Office is conducted by means of the electric telegraph, and it is therefore obvious that if upon every point, even of importance, the Foreign Secretary were obliged to send round to all his colleagues, and inform them exactly of the communication he had received and what his reply was to be, it would be impossible to carry on the business of the Department. I agree with the noble Earl, however, that it is fit that the subject should be brought forward; and I cannot help thinking that on the present occasion there must have been some oversight on the part of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary; and I am astonished that he should not have required an official despatch for his own security. For my own part, I never considered myself, when I had the honour of filling the same office, I never considered myself safe unless my course of action was covered by an official record of the information on which I acted. I should have thought it to my own disadvantage to take action myself, and still more to give instructions to a Minister at a foreign court to be carried out by him upon private information, without having it reproduced in a public despatch, properly numbered and recorded at the Foreign Office. Therefore I am surprised that the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary should, in a matter of so much importance, have neglected to have the sense of Lord Cowley's private letters put into an official despatch, in order that he might at any time have been able to exhibit the grounds on which he took the course which he pursued. What has happened might have been expected. It was impossible that the fact of the private communication should escape Parliament; and the consequence is that in both Houses the noble Lord is censured, and he has not escaped some suspicion of having attempted to conceal something. The noble Lord has thus been himself the sufferer from the course he has adopted. But at the same time I must add, that it would be quite impossible to carry on the public business without private correspondence between the Ambassador and the Foreign Minister. An immense quantity of information can be imparted only in this manner—without it the Minister would be without any better information than all the world possessed; and it would be impossible to carry on the public business if that information were not rigidly kept secret. Its publication would very often involve the safety of individuals, and many other consequences which their Lordships could well understand.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, there is a point which has not been adverted to, but which is of great importance. There can be no doubt that on many occasions it is essential to the public service that communications of facts should be made in private letters; and perhaps, also, that instructions should be given in the same manner. But whatever it is necessary for the Minister or the Ambassador to communicate should remain on record in the Foreign Office. If it is important that the Minister for the time should have the information, his successor should have the same information. I happen to know, however, that it is not always the custom to leave these private letters at the Office, and when it is not so, the Minister who succeeds is in a very unfortunate position, deprived of information which he ought to possess. I remember that the Quadruple Treaty was formed in 1834; and when the Duke of Wellington came into office at the end of the year, he could not trace the existence of one single paper relative to that treaty, assigning the grounds on which it was entered into. So as to the serious events in China; when Lord Napier got into serious difficulties, which might have led us into a war, there was not a paper left in the office about them; and it was only by applying to the then Earl Grey for any private letters he might happen to have, that any information at all could be obtained on a matter of such serious moment. My Lords, I consider this practice, which I believe to be a common one, a serious defect in our public administration, and it is for the public interest that it should be corrected.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: My Lords, scant justice, or rather great injustice, has been done to my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office in the course of this discussion. It has been assumed all along that proposals were made through the medium of these private letters. I have already denied this, and have stated that these letters merely refer to hypothetical conversations. The noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury) says he always covered himself by an official communication. I own I am of opinion that that principle may be carried too far, and it is dangerous for the public interests that a Minister should be constantly looking to the possible "blue-book." If he means to carry out his duty honestly, he must frequently depart from that respect for the possibility of publication. The noble Earl implied that my noble Friend had exposed himself to the suspicion that he was attempting to conceal something.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: Not as my own suspicion, but as that of others.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: Quite so; but there cannot be the least ground for such a suspicion, for if my noble Friend had desired to do so he might easily have suppressed the fact that any private letters had passed, for he could have erased the passage in the despatch referring to them, and the Parliament could have had no knowledge of their existence. But my noble Friend proposed taking a more manly course, and he permitted the mention of these letters to appear, while he judged it useless to produce them, as they were merely mentioned as an hypothetical, and not a definite or formal proposal, as the noble Earl (Earl Grey) appeared to suppose.

EARL GREY: I never said anything as to a "definite" or "formal" proposal. I said that Count Walewski told Lord Cowley, and gave him clearly to understand, that in certain circumstances France would consider it ought to annex Savoy; and that this was a most important fact, which should not have been confined to a private letter.

THE EARL OF DERBY:—My Lords, without imputing to the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) any desire to conceal the existence of these private letters, I cannot admit that it would have been at all easy to suppress all mention of them, considering the nature of this correspondence. For, my Lords, how does the case stand? For four or five months the noble Lord remains, so far as concerns any official communications, in the full assurance and conviction that the French Government had abandoned the project of the annexation of Savoy. When the project again assumed a definite form, no time was lost by the noble Lord in communicating to the French Government the views of our Government upon the subject. But as soon as that communication was made there was another party concerned—the French Government and the French Minister; and when that remonstrance was made by the British Government, and Count Walewski replied,—“I told you that the proposal of the annexation of Savoy was abandoned. But it is equally true that this took place four or five months since, and during the interval I have, not on one occasion only, but many occasions, told you, on the part of my Government, that circumstances have changed, and that if all the proposals for the aggrandizement of Sardinia come to pass it will be necessary for France, having due regard to her own security, to take possession of Savoy.” My Lords, that was stated by the Foreign Minister of France to our Ambassador at Paris as the answer to an implied charge on behalf of our Government that the French Government had been guilty of a breach of faith. And that answer, so defending the French Government, so announcing the intentions of the French Emperor, so reminding the British Minister that their intentions had been communicated to him, not once, but repeatedly—that answer, my Lords, ought to have been made the subject of an official communication, and ought not to have been wrapped up in a private letter. My Lords, after that correspondence it would have been impossible for the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) to have suppressed the fact that there had been such letters; for, supposing the paragraph alluding to them to have been omitted (which would have been very unjust to Lord Cowley), the question would have been asked at once in Parliament whether, if those statements had been made to the British Ambassador at Paris, to which Count Walewski alluded, the Ambassador had communicated them to the noble Lord; and the answer, of course, must have been the admission of the fact, that such communications had been made by the French Minister to Lord Cowley, and had by him been communicated to the noble Lord in private letters. My Lords, I can hardly understand how the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office with his sense of honour or of truth, after these communications from Lord Cowley—knowing that everything was tending towards the very event pointed at, namely, the aggrandisement of Piedmont—that very event which was to lead to the annexation of Savoy—I say I cannot understand how the noble Lord could give the answer which he is represented to have given in his place in Parliament, at the commencement of the Session, referring to the communication in July, as if that was the actual state of things at the time when he spoke, and suppressing the fact that from time to time the French Government had been warning us that if certain events should take place which were then in actual progress and in course of active accomplishment, the idea of abandoning the annexation of Savoy would be considered as not binding; and that it would be deemed necessary, on the part of France, to pursue it. I repeat, my Lords, I cannot understand how, under those circumstances, the noble Lord could refer us to the communication made in July, as if that contained all the information that could be given—sedulously concealing from us all that had passed in the meantime to vary and alter the case. The noble Duke may argue that the noble Lord did not desire to conceal anything, but it is vain to urge that he could have concealed the fact; for even though all allusion to the letters had been suppressed, the fact must have come out, even more discredibly than it has done as it is. My Lords, I think the Government have had fair warning as to the course which the French Government intended to pursue in a certain event, and that Her Majesty's Ministers had no right to charge the French Government with having deceived them or kept them in ignorance of their intentions; or to tell us that they were taken by surprise when they found in January that a totally different course was to be pursued by the French Government from that which had been avowed in July.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he thought it must necessarily have been left to Lord Cowley to judge whether the communications made to him were such as ought to be embodied in a public despatch, and he thought the noble Earl had exercised a sound discretion in making them the subject of a private letter. It had been assumed throughout that the communications made to Lord Cowley were much more definite than they really were. If the French Government had intended to make such a definite communication as was supposed, they ought to have done it in the form of a despatch. He regretted that this discussion had arisen. The argument of the noble Earl opposite as to the formal and definite nature of the communication was unfounded. The whole thing was not only hypothetical, in the event of certain conclusions being come to with regard to the Italian war, but it was also hypothetical upon the meeting of a Congress; and it was fully understood by Lord Cowley that whatever might be the views of the French Government at that time, this and other subjects would be matters for consultation at that Congress.

NEW PALACE AT WESTMINSTER.—GREAT BELL IN THE CLOCK TOWER.

QUESTION.

ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would beg to ask the Chief Commissioner of Works, as they had not lately heard the solemn sounds that so often warned the House during the last Session, if he can afford the House any information as to the condition of the Great Bell in the Clock Tower, and if an early expectation may be entertained of its tones being again heard?

MR. HANKEY said, before the question was answered, he would remind the Chief Commissioner that the question he had put on a former evening relative to the Lions for the pedestal of the Nelson Column had never received any reply?

MR. COWPER said, that the Great Bell in the Clock Tower was in the unhappy condition of being cracked in five places—the first crack was twelve inches, and the second nine inches in length. He was not able to state the origin of the cracks, but thought he was safe in saying that either the hammer was too heavy for the tenacity of the Bell, or the Bell was too brittle for the weight of the hammer. He could not hold out any expectation that the wish of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich would be fulfilled, and that we should again in a short time hear the solemn tones of the Bell. As to the Nelson Monument in Trafalgar Square, Sir Edwin Landseer had received the commission for the completion of the Monument some eighteen months ago, and had decided upon the arrangement of the Lions, but he was not prepared to say at what period they would be completed.

POSTAL SERVICE IN WALES.

QUESTION.

MR. JONES said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Post Office authorities have it in contemplation to avail themselves of the facilities afforded by the Llanelly and Vale of Towy Railways to transmit letters to the Northern and Eastern parts of the county of Carmarthen, in compliance with the numerous petitions presented to them for that purpose.

MR. LAING said, that no such arrangement was in contemplation. The expense with which it would be attended was such as not to justify the Post Office authorities in availing themselves of the accommodation in question.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE TO FRANCE.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House any Correspondence with the Government of France relative to the Affairs of Italy and the annexation of Savoy, which has taken place subsequently to the date of the last Papers communicated?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he must beg to state that there was a further Correspondence on the subject alluded to by the hon. Baronet which he would be prepared to lay upon the Table on the following day, and which would be delivered to hon. Members on Saturday next. There was other Correspondence connected with the subject, which would be delivered at an early day. He might, perhaps, be permitted to take the opportunity of making an appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater. When his hon. Friend brought forward his Motion for Papers respecting Savoy and Nice, on a former evening, he (Lord J. Russell) stated that although it was not convenient to bring the subject on then on account of the Commercial Treaty, still he told him that he had no objection to the production of the Papers. The hon. Gentleman had since given notice of a Motion for Monday next. Now, on consideration, the Government thought it would be attended with injury and inconvenience to the public service if his hon. Friend brought forward that Motion at that time. Under these circumstances, he hoped his hon. Friend would not persevere in his Motion, but would withdraw it.

MR. KINGLAKE said, that after the appeal which had been made to him by the noble Lord on his responsibility as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, he would not, of course, feel justified in pressing his Motion on the attention of the House on the day which he had originally proposed. He was at the same time anxious to assure hon. Members that he continued to be as firmly convinced as he had ever been of the deep importance of bringing the subject plainly and distinctly under the notice of the House, and that no consideration would prevent him from taking that course when he found that there was an opportunity of adopting it without the probability of injury being thereby done to the public service. He should, under present circumstances, postpone his Motion until Monday week, and he might, perhaps, in conclusion, be allowed to say that he did not seek in bringing it forward to imply anything like censure on the policy in the matter which Her Majesty's Government had pursued. On the contrary, he thought, and he believed the greater number of Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House were of the same opinion, that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had conducted the negotiations relating to it in a very satisfactory manner.

CHINA.—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House all the Despatches which have passed between Her Majesty's Government and Mr. Bruce, our Ambassador in China, up to the present time?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would lay two Despatches upon the Table on the following day; there were some further despatches which he would lay upon the Table on an early day.

THE WHITWORTH GUN.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the offer of Mr. Whitworth's gratuitous services in aiding to adapt the Enfield Establishment to the production of rifles on his system has been refused by Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, whether he has any objection to state the reasons why; and whether any calculation has been made of the probable cost of the Whitworth Rifle if made at the Enfield Establishment?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he had looked back into some of the Minutes of the Committee which had sat on the subject of the Enfield and Whitworth Rifles, and had found that in November, 1858, Mr. Whitworth had proposed, not to the War Office, but to the Committee, to give instructions at Enfield with a view to enable rifles on his principle to be manufactured at that establishment. He had not been able to discover any record of a refusal of that offer, but he gathered from a Resolution at which the Committee had arrived that they had rejected it, and that their rejection had been based on the fact that they conceived the principle of rifling which was adopted by Mr. Whitworth required a different metal from that which was employed at Enfield—which was less strong than the homogeneous metal which he used—thus rendering the expense of his rifle £10, while that of the Enfield was only £2 17s. 6d.

CUSTOMS RESOLUTIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. HORSFALL said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he intends to propose for the acceptance of the House, Nos. 11, 12, and 13 in the Customs Resolutions, and Nos. 1, 2, and 8 of the Ways and Means Resolutions; and, if so, whether he is prepared to state with what modifications he intends to propose them?

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he would also beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman when he proposes to take the discussion with reference to the Drawback on Wine, and upon the Duty relating to Foreign Malt?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished, before the right hon. Gentleman answered these questions, to ask him when the Customs Bill will be in the hands of Members.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Customs Bill contained little or nothing beyond that to which the House in Committee had already assented. It would, however, be placed in the hands of Members as soon as possible, certainly before they were called upon to go into the discussion on the Resolutions. With respect to the time at which the discussion on the Malt Duty would be taken, he could only say that he did not know how he could make any particular arrangement on the subject. He did not think, he might add, that the question whether the Duty upon Foreign Malt should be 25s. instead of 26s., as the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) proposed, was one which was likely to lead to any lengthened debate. So far as the drawback on Wine was concerned, he was perfectly ready to admit that those who supported the views of the hon. and learned Gentleman should be afforded the necessary opportunity to state their opinions on the matter, while it was, at the same time, desirable that the decision of the House with respect to it should not be postponed for many days. As the business of the House at present stood, there were, beside the subjects which were to come on that evening, the Repeal of the Paper Duty and one or two other questions—the Chinese, for instance, on which it was expedient that the opinion of the House should at as early a day as possible be taken. He hoped, however, that those matters would be disposed of sufficiently soon to admit of the discussion on the question of the drawback on Wine being entered upon next week, even though it should be necessary to effect that object that the House should submit to the inconvenience of a morning sitting. In answer to the questions of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall) he had to state that Resolutions Nos. 11, 12, and 13, which related to Registration Dues and Warehouse Charges, would be laid on the Table to-morrow in their amended form. Of the other three Resolutions to which the hon. Member referred, and which were to be moved in Committee of Ways and Means, the first had reference to the charge on Dock Warrants, and the second to Contract Notes, and he hoped to be able to lay those also as amended on the Table to-morrow. The 8th Resolution had reference to the exemption enjoyed by Building Societies, and the Resolution stood in a different category from the others, because the financial consideration was not the only one involved, but the question turned rather upon whether in the existing state of Building Societies the exemption ought to be continued. He was not prepared to state that any positive determination had been come to by the Government on the subject, as other more urgent matters had prevented their giving the necessary attention to its consideration. But he hoped to be able to give a positive answer in the course of a few days. In case also he should find it necessary to persevere with the Resolution as it stood, he would take care that ample time was allowed for its discussion.

PAPER DUTY—QUESTION.

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the second reading of the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duties would be taken on Monday next, as the hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake) has withdrawn his Motion for that day.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that an arrangement, subject to the concurrence of the House, had been come to between the hon. Member for East Somersetshire (Sir W. Miles) and the Government, by which the Paper Duty could be taken to-morrow, if the question of the Treaty were disposed of that evening. If it were not, the second reading of the Paper Duty Bill could be taken on Monday next.

MR. HORSMAN said, that the Bill had not yet been printed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it would be in the hands of Members before the second reading was moved.

THE WHITWORTH RIFLES.—QUESTION.

MR. CORNWALL LEGH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the additional expense which Mr. Whitworth suggested with reference to the alteration of the rifles at Enfield to his principle, was not 5s. per barrel and no more. He asked this question because great stress had been laid upon the comparative cost of the two weapons.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that Mr. Whitworth had proposed that an attempt should be made to apply his principle to the metal used at Enfield for the purpose of manufacturing rifles, the adoption of which course would entail, according to that gentleman's own calculation an additional cost of only 5s. per barrel. The House would not, however, fail to perceive that where a large number of rifles were to be manufactured a considerably increased expense would be thus entailed. There is no evidence to show that this principle of rifling could not be applied to the Enfield with the metal now in use; and being of that opinion he had given directions that the experiment should be tried.

FOREIGN POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT. QUESTION.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Ministers, being all Protestant, whilst a large proportion of the Queen's subjects are Catholic, it is the intention of the present Government to observe faithfully the principle of absolute non-intervention, so far at least as regards the territories and sovereignty of His Holiness the Pope?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : Sir, I can assure my hon. and learned Friend that the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government is not in the least degree influenced by the consideration of what may be the religion either of the members of the Cabinet or of any number of Her Majesty's loyal subjects. It is founded on considerations of a much larger and higher order than any question of that kind. I have already stated on former occasions, that with regard to the affairs of Italy the principle which Her Majesty's Government have endeavoured to inculcate on other Powers has been to leave the people of Italy free to arrange their own affairs according to their own notions of what is best for their respective interests. That is the principle, Sir, on which alone we have interfered, if interference it can be called, to endeavour to exhort other Powers to act on that principle; and I am persuaded, if this principle be permitted to guide the conduct and course of other Governments, the people of Italy would in the end be enabled to arrange their affairs, so as to add to the prosperity and happiness of the people. Perhaps the House will allow me, before resuming my seat, to appeal to those Gentlemen who have Notices standing on the Orders for this evening, and who of course are entitled to that precedence which the rules of the House afford them over my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesex (Mr. Byng), who has given notice of an Address to Her Majesty on a matter of great interest to the House and the public. I should really be very much obliged to them, and I am sure the convenience of the House would be consulted, if they would kindly postpone the Notices which stand in their names previous to that of my hon. Friend, so as to enable him to proceed with his Motion now rather than at a later period of the evening.

MR. CAVE said, that as a young Member he was willing to leave the matter in the hands of the House. At the same time if the House wished to hear his Motion, he would consider it his duty to press it, being one in which time was of great importance, as the Treaty to which it referred might be ratified at any moment.

THE OYSTER FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he rose pursuant to notice to ask the President of the Board of Trade if it is intended to lay on the Table the result of any inquiries that may have been instituted respecting the complaints made and losses sustained by the Fishermen and others on the coast of Essex, Kent, and Sussex, in consequence of the French Government having called on this Country to enforce certain penal regulations limiting the period for taking Oysters in the Seas between England and France, including those parts of the Channel common to the subjects of both nations, being quite distinct from the Oyster Fishery exclusively reserved to France by the 1st Article of the Convention of August, 1839.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, in answer to the question of the hon. Baronet he had to state that inquiries had been made of the Custom-house Officers and those belonging to the Coastguard on the subject, and the reply was of such a character that they could not be conveniently laid on the table of the House; but he might state that there had been no recent remonstrances on the part of the French Government.

IRISH REPRESENTATIVE PEERS.

QUESTION.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to Statements in local newspapers that two of the Representative Peers of Ireland voted for a Candidate at the recent Election for the County of Cork, and whether such Statements are true or not?

MR. CARDWELL : Sir, my attention has not been called to the subject, and I have no information whatever in regard to it.

TURKISH MEDALS.—QUESTION.

MAJOR STUART said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War when the Turkish Medals are to be issued to the British Officers and Non-commissioned Officers who served with the late Turkish Contingent in the Crimean war?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he understood that some of the medals were received yesterday, and he hoped they would be distributed forthwith.

THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

QUESTION.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House Copies or Extracts of any Correspondence that may have passed between the different Departments of the Government on the subject of the Report of the Consular Committee of 1858.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL was understood to reply that he had no objection.

HER MAJESTY'S SHIP "CÆSAR."

EXPLANATION.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he rose to state that he had on a recent occasion, in the debates on the Navy Estimates, inadvertently mentioned Her Majesty's ship Cæsar as one of those on board of which there had been some disturbances. Since then he had received a letter from the captain of the Cæsar, expressive of his surprise and annoyance at this statement, and denying that it had any foundation in fact. He (Sir Charles Napier) therefore felt bound to say that he was very sorry he had made a statement which gave annoyance to the officers and crew of the Cæsar, and to state that no disturbances had taken place on board that ship.

THE SHRUBS IN THE PARKS.

QUESTION.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW wished to ask, Whether it is the intention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Works to restore the shrubs and flowers in the Green Park facing Piccadilly, and in Hyde Park from the Marble Arch to Kensington Gardens. He might state that the orders of that Board had been rather erratic of late, and that a great many thousand young trees had been rooted up and destroyed.

MR. COWPER said, he had to inform the hon. Baronet that arrangements had been made for planting both shrubs and flowers along the edge of Hyde Park and also along the boundary of the Green Park, and that the work would be proceeded with when the weather and season were favourable.

EAST INDIA (INDENTURED LABOURERS).

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, perhaps the hon. Member for Shoreham would allow him once more to make an appeal to him to follow the example of hon. Members who had postponed their Motions. It would be convenient to the House if the hon. Gentleman would accede to his request.

Mr. Monckton Milnes

MR. CAVE said, he had every desire to consult the convenience of the House, and as the hon. and learned Member for Bridgewater had withdrawn the Motion which he had placed on the Paper for Monday, perhaps the noble Lord would allow him to bring his Motion on upon that evening.

MR. DISRAELI asked the noble Lord if he would agree to the arrangement proposed?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Will not Tuesday do as well?

MR. DISRAELI: No. Go on, go on.

MR. CAVE: I would most readily have postponed this Motion, in favour of that of the hon. Member for Middlesex, had I not felt that in this case also every day was of importance. The Treaty with France, to which it refers, may be ratified, I understand, at any moment, and I do wish most earnestly that this House may have an opportunity of hearing what its nature is before it is too late. The discussion cannot occupy much time, and I will waste no words. I venture, therefore, to hope that I may have a patient hearing granted me, while I endeavour, as concisely as possible, to lay the case before the House. Soon after the emancipation of the slaves in the French Colonies, consequent upon the Revolution of 1848, results took place similar to those which had been experienced in our own plantations. We learn by a report from Martinique, to be found in the correspondence relating to the Slave Trade, ordered by the House to be printed last Session, that the negroes had manifested what I must confess to have been a natural repugnance to that agricultural labour which they had performed during slavery, and had retired in a great measure from the sugar estates, and that neither high wages nor coercive measures were of any avail in inducing them to return. The consequence was, the produce of those colonies fell off much in the same way as that of our own colonies had done, and the French, in the same manner as ourselves, looked about for some substitute for the labourers who had withdrawn. The French Government considered their colonies of sufficient importance to make their restoration a Government measure, and a most extensive scheme for procuring immigrants from the coast of Africa was set on foot. How it was conducted, the pages of the blue-book to which I have referred plainly show. The reports of our naval officers commanding on the African station speak in terms of the strongest reprobation of the cruelties of the system. Commodore Wise writes of these pretended free emigrants dragged along under the lash with their hands bound, and their necks secured to forked sticks. He writes of the system being apparently placed on a permanent footing at a notorious spot named heretofore Pirates' Creek, but henceforward to be called French Creek, where Government buildings were in course of erection on a large scale. Here, as well as upon the East Coast, the operations were sanctioned by officers in the French uniform. On the West Coast the independent territory of Liberia was not respected, as the protest of the president shows; and on the East, the untoward collision with Portugal soon arose which is fresh in the memory of the House, and which threatened at one time serious consequences, though eventually settled by Her Majesty's late Government in a way that gained them the warm acknowledgments of the Portuguese Minister. It is, indeed, well known that free emigration from Africa is impossible; that our own colonies are entirely prohibited, and rightly prohibited, from looking to that quarter at all for labour. These proceedings of France were, therefore, most embarrassing, because it was quite clear that we could not consistently maintain repressive measures on that coast if one Power was allowed openly to defy them. It appears that on Her Majesty's Government remonstrating with that of the French Emperor, Count Walewski at first denied the abuses which were alleged against the system, and afterwards, when these became too clearly known to be any longer concealed, the French Government, as far as I can gather from what has been said elsewhere, replied that it was all very well for us to prohibit immigration from the coast of Africa, who had India as the officina gentium, the labour mart to which we could resort, and that they are determined that their colonies should not go out of cultivation. This was not a conclusive reply, as China was open to her in common with other nations, and she has since resorted to it—at best it was a plea of necessity, the tyrant's plea which may form the excuse for any crime. It was not, however, without its force with Her Majesty's late Government. We were then at the close of the great Indian mutiny, and were anticipating a difficulty which has not occurred to any great extent, that of getting rid of the Sepoys who might surrender. Any embarrassment on this ground entirely passed away; and a very different feeling prevails with regard to the Indian subjects of the Queen. France has also, by her commencement of emigration in China, shown that she is by no means more scrupulous in her dealings with Asiatics than with Africans. Experience has since then told us that abuses are caused even by agents of different British colonies competing with each other, and Her Majesty's present Government have, I understand, now properly recommended that this should cease. How utterly inconsistent, then, to let in the competition of a foreign agent, who must be even less under control. Again, experience has shown us that with the increasing public works of India, there is an increasing difficulty in supplying our own colonists with the labour they require, yet we this very moment sanction the withdrawal of our labourers by a foreign power, and if we are to let in France, on the grounds upon which she demands it, might not the Spaniards, the Brazilians, the Americans, the Dutch claim to participate on the same grounds, as all complain of insufficiency of labour? Will the loyalty of our Indian population be increased by a residence of many years in a foreign and occasionally, perhaps, in a hostile community? But we are told that the Coolies themselves will benefit by this measure. The House knows the stringent, the jealous regulations with which the emigration of Indian Coolies to the British West Indies is, and is most properly surrounded. Unlike emigrants from our own shores whom we consider able to protect themselves, these people are watched and guarded like children. From the moment they agree to indenture themselves to a British colony, to the moment, when that compact fulfilled, they again set foot on their native India, emancipation agents in every port, stipendiary magistrates in every district, make them the objects of their special care. So stringent is the practice that the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), favourable as he is to Jamaica, thought it necessary to disallow an ordinance which deviated, though slightly, from the prescribed model, and our West Indian colonies had suffered from want of labour far longer than those of France, before we were allowed, even under these restrictions, access to the shores of India. We may be told that France will adopt our Passenger

Act, and that our consuls will act as immigration agents in her ports. But is it likely that so jealous a people will long tolerate this foreign interference? We may be told again that the French authorities will guarantee their proper treatment, but quis custodiet ipsos custodes? We learn by a despatch from the Governor of St. Lucia in the blue-book to which I have more than once adverted, that he was one day surprised by the appearance of the French war steamer Acheron, in pursuit of some free emigrants escaping from Guadeloupe, and with an account of others who had been drowned in the attempt. But if it be true that they will be well treated, why have a treaty to enforce it? and if they are not well treated, your treaty only gives you the guarantee of the French themselves, you gain no security you had not before; but you run the risk of stultifying yourselves by enacting terms you never mean to enforce. It has been said that some 40,000 of our people have been already smuggled into French colonies by Pondicherry, and that we cannot help this; we make the best of it by securing their good treatment; but is it not most humiliating to confess this? we cannot prevent a foreign Government carrying off our own subjects against our will. If it be so, let them go, but do not incur the additional humiliation of an ex post facto treaty to sanction it. And supposing that we should hear that these Coolies were badly treated, or that their liberty was refused, on some pretext. French Government agents, we find from this same blue-book, are very willing to believe in the desire of Africans to go to French colonies; they may be equally ready to believe and bear witness to the desire of the Indians to remain in them. Already more than five years have elapsed since the first went to the French colonies, and we hear of none returning. Should we make the restoration of these poor people a casus belli? The example of Spain shows that we should not. Spain, according to our own Consul's return, imports into Cuba slaves at the rate of 40,000 a year, contrary to treaty. Hundreds of thousands of Bozal negroes are living in slavery in that island, every one easily recognized as a man whose liberty is guaranteed by treaty between Great Britain and Spain, and we confine ourselves to ineffectual remonstrance. Should we be more peremptory with France? Then, again, we think to bind France by a fresh treaty, to do what she is already bound to do by an equally binding treaty she has chosen to break, and as in other treaties with the same Power we give in at once; she vaguely promises, she does not bind herself to abandon the slave trade, but holds out a pretext that she will give it up next year, in 1861. Now, if this African immigration is not slave trade, why stop it? If it is, it is piracy and murder, as this country has often declared; and are we asked to respect existing contracts to commit a certain amount of piracy and murder, after which they may possibly be abandoned or suspended? In the dark days of Spanish tyranny in the West Indies, Las Casas is said to have introduced negro slaves with a view to save the remnant of Indians who were perishing under excessive labour; he had at least reason on his side, for he substituted the stronger for the weaker, and strangers for the subjects of the King of Spain. We are doing the converse of this without the same excuse; we shall substitute the weaker for the stronger, and redeem the savages of Africa by the sacrifice of our fellow subjects. Besides, this Commercial Treaty with France, which we are asked to sanction to-day, is a strong reason against such a measure. When two nations are commercially linked together, should disputes arise, that nation whose trading interests and instincts are strongest, always gives way. This is the case with ourselves and the United States. In all our differences, whether the Oregon boundary, the bombardment of Grey Town, or the gun-boats on the Cuba coast, the Americans push their demands beyond all reason, because they say, "We have an ally in the midst of you. Manchester will not let you go to war with us." It will be well to carry this consideration to the case of France, and not embarrass ourselves with these stipulations about labourers which are sure to be fruitful in misunderstanding. Sir, I know how difficult, how impossible, it is for an obscure individual like myself, to revive any feeling in the House upon a subject to which in past days it would have lent the keenest attention, but my connection with some of our colonies has called my attention to it. I have not been reassured by what has transpired in "another place," nor by the reply of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for India, to the question I put to him on this subject. I have therefore resolved not to participate without a protest in what I fear will not redound to our national credit. It is, therefore, Sir, with all humility and diffidence, but with the fullest confidence in the justice of my view that I protest against the ratification of this Treaty. I protest against it on a ground which both sides of the House must admit—the ground of common humanity to our Indian fellow-subjects, and common justice to our West Indian colonists. I protest against it, for a reason which Her Majesty's present Government will most readily appreciate, that it is fraught with the greatest danger to our friendly relations with France. I claim the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House who take an interest in the future destinies of India. I appeal to the remnant of the once powerful West Indian body, and to the representative, if there be one left, of the old Anti-Slavery Society. I call upon every man of every shade of politics, who has any regard for consistency in legislation, to unite in resisting to the utmost this ill-advised and most unfortunate measure.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR, in seconding the Motion, said he believed that the first object which the Government had in view in entering into this Treaty was to put a stop to the French system of emigration instituted on the coast of Africa under the Mires Contract; and he readily admitted that he was glad that that system was likely to be brought to an end. But what he wanted to understand was, how the stipulations were to be carried out. It was perfectly true that England was to be allowed consuls in French colonies where she had now no consuls, whilst French agents would be permitted to reside in the Indian ports from which the emigration would be conducted; but he would ask the House to consider whether, after having entered into this Treaty, whatever its stipulations or articles, it was not likely that disputes and misunderstandings might still arise. What he feared was that a competition similar to that which now existed in China might grow up in the ports of India, and he prayed them not to take any step which would be attended with such an unfortunate result. The evidence before the House showed clearly that the emigration to the Mauritius and the West Indies had been productive of benefit not only to the colonies but to the emigrants themselves. That emigration was guarded by the severest restrictions, which provided for the mode of embarkation, the treatment of the Coolies whilst in the colonies, and their return home at the expiration of their term of service; and he trusted that in the proposed treaty such regulations would be adopted, as that the native subjects of the Queen should be protected from all ill-treatment or oppression. It was desirable that the House should consider what might be our position with such a touchy and sensitive nation as France in the event of the arrangements under the Treaty being differently interpreted; and he warned them that if this treaty were carried into effect we might be drawn into similar arrangements with the Dutch and the Spaniards, all of which might be the cause of most regrettable complications. He trusted, however, that such distinct and unmistakable stipulations would be agreed to as that, before the Treaty was signed, the emigration from the African coast would cease. He knew that it was to cease immediately on the east coast; but it was to last for another year on the west coast; and he must repeat the hope that some clear and well understood agreement would be come to upon the subject, which would leave room for no mistake.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I will not detain the House long, but it is right that I should give the hon. Gentleman such information upon this subject as I can afford. It is no doubt, a great question whether such a treaty as this should have been concluded, but upon the whole, I think that it was advisable to enter into these negotiations. The case was this:—A contract called the Mires Contract had been made, under which, although the Africans taken were nominally free, yet they were really kidnapped in precisely the same manner as slaves. All the evils of private war and hunting men down with the view of carrying them as slaves on board ships prevailed under this contract. When these facts were brought to the knowledge of the Emperor he declared that he did not wish this system to continue, but his Government declared that if it were abandoned they should expect some assistance from us in procuring labour for the French colonies. Negotiations were commenced upon that, when my noble Friend near me (Viscount Palmerston) was last in office, which resulted in an agreement by the terms of which France was to have the same facilities for procuring labourers for India as are now enjoyed by our own colonies. I must say a few words with respect to that plan. Many years ago, when I held the seals of the Colonial Department, there was a great question in this House whether Indian labourers should be allowed to be taken to the Mauritius. I persevered in introducing that system, and for many years I inquired after its operation. I always found that these Indian labourers, many of whom had been at the point of starvation in India, were well employed and humanely treated, and that not a few of them returned home with sums of money which were considerable for persons in their condition. Therefore the possibility of such a system being well conducted and producing advantage to the Indians themselves is well established. It is to be observed that, with regard to the introduction of these labourers into either the English or the French colonies, the first process is quite different from that of the slave trade. The first process in the slave trade is that the chiefs make war upon one another, there is a great deal of bloodshed and extermination of tribes, men are brought down to the sea coast manacled and placed in a sort of prison, and are afterwards embarked in vessels in which they are so much crowded that great mortality takes place amongst them. Now, in the case of this Indian emigration to the Mauritius or the West Indies the case is different. Provided the business is properly conducted, the emigrants are persons who voluntarily accept the service; there is no force or compulsion, still less any bloodshed, in the country from which they emigrate. That being the case, it was proposed to the French Government that our system, which had been successfully introduced into the Mauritius, and afterwards into the West Indies, should be extended for the benefit of the French colonies. I must admit that, while upon the whole I think it was right to enter into that negotiation, it is attended with some great inconveniences, and even dangers, which cannot be altogether provided against. In your own colonies you have officers who protect the interests of the emigrants, and you have governors who receive orders from the Secretary of State, and who are bound to see that no abuses take place. Of course there is a great difference when you have these labourers taken into a foreign colony, because although you may give strict orders to your Consul, and although he may make it his duty to represent any abuse, yet the governor is the officer of a foreign State, he gets his instructions from a foreign Minister of Marine and the Colonies, and he is not in any way under your control. At the same time I think it must be said that although it would be difficult for your Consul to follow out each individual case of abuse of power on the part of an employer, yet he could easily ascertain the existence of any great crying abuse, and it would be his duty to represent it to the colonial authorities. I confess, however, that our only remedy in the case of an abuse would consist in giving notice for the termination of the treaty. But that would have a considerable effect both upon the French Government and upon their governors in the colonies, because, as they must wish to have the benefit of this labour, they would take some care not to expose themselves to reproach, and not to have the treaty set aside. Our sole object in entering into this treaty was to put an end to the Mires contract, which, in the opinion of the Government and the people of this country, is almost equivalent to the revival of the slave trade. We asked that that contract should be put an end to at the close of this year; but the French Government has since proposed that it should remain for fifteen months after the signing of the treaty, and that it should then be terminated for ever. I can assure the House that great pains have been taken by Sir Frederick Rogers, who was employed for this purpose in Paris, under the superintendence of Earl Cowley, in arranging the articles of the treaty, which has been submitted for revision to the Colonial Secretary and the Minister for India. Every step has been much considered, but I should be giving the House an assurance which I do not feel myself if I were to say that every abuse has been completely guarded against. The treaty has not yet been signed, but, upon the whole, I believe the advantage of putting an end to a revival of the African slave trade is so great that it is expedient to go on with the treaty, which will be signed as soon as the French Government has consented to some proposals of ours. I may conclude by stating that I have no objection to the Motion of the hon. Member, provided he will consent to amend it by inserting the word "Extracts," as the correspondence itself is of a very voluminous character, to produce the Papers moved for by the hon. Member opposite.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to thank the hon. Member for Shoreham for having brought this subject before the House. It was his belief that if the people of this country had been consulted with respect to the treaty they would have expressed a strong feeling against it. He wished to know whether the sanction of the authorities in India had been obtained to the treaty, which he feared would do no good to the people under their rule. He also felt some disappointment that the noble Lord had not communicated more of its details to the House.

Motion agreed to.

Address for

"Copies or Extracts of Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of France in respect to legalising the exportation of Natives of British India as Indentured Labourers to French Colonies."

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that upon an assurance he had received from the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) that the Select Committee on the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act was inquiring into the subject, he wished to withdraw the Motion of which he had given notice, to the effect that the Committee should be instructed to take evidence as to the working of the system of protected voting in the Australian colonies, with a view to its effect in checking corrupt practices at elections in this country.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.

ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. BYNG said, he then rose to move an Address to the Queen on the subject of the Commercial Treaty with France. The House would feel that he presented himself under circumstances of no ordinary importance and difficulty. The responsibility attendant on a duty similar to that which he had undertaken would at all times be very great, but it had been seriously increased by the discussion that took place on Monday evening. At the risk of detaining the House for a few moments on a matter personal to himself, he could not refrain from stating that, if hon. Gentlemen on the other side had suffered any inconvenience from the shortness of the notice he had given, no one could more deeply regret that circumstance than himself. But he might remind the House that a fortnight ago notice was given of a Motion of a very serious character. It was given, he believed, very nearly at the same hour at which he gave his on Friday night, but there was this difference between the two cases, that whereas the notice given on the 17th February by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli) only appeared in the Votes on Saturday morning, he thought it respectful that he should give public notice of his Motion at the same time, in order that those Gentlemen who had left London night, if they did not receive their Parliamentary papers, see it in the public journals. He also took the earliest opportunity of sending a copy of his Motion to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks and the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) and he hoped, therefore, the House would acquit him of any intentional disrespect. He was glad to think that, whether or not his opinions or his arguments would meet with the assent of the House, he was, at all events, treading that night in the steps marked out by precedent and constitutional usage. He found that on the 21st of February, 1787, Mr. Blackburn, the Member for Lancashire, and Captain Berkeley, the Member for Gloucestershire, respectively moved and seconded an Address to the Crown, expressing the approbation of the Commons of England of a treaty of commerce which the reigning Sovereign had entered into with the King of France, and within his own recollection, when in 1856 a treaty of peace was concluded between Her Majesty and the Emperor of Russia, the right hon. Gentleman in the chair, and the right hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. H. Herbert) were severally the exponents of the feelings of the House in their loyal and dutiful reply to the gracious message from the Crown. Under ordinary circumstances, when a treaty like the present was concluded, it was difficult to separate its political from its commercial bearings. On this occasion it was not only difficult, but simply impossible to do so, and therefore he did not wish to shrink from discussing the political as well as the commercial elements of the Treaty. He should have felt satisfied a fortnight ago with using the language employed by Earl Cowley in the correspondence which had been laid on the table, and expressing the hope that the generous and philanthropic views which had actuated Her Majesty's Government in concluding the Treaty might meet with their reward by proving the means of drawing closer together the bonds of amity between the two countries for whose benefit the Treaty had been contracted, but he now was obliged to go somewhat further. The House knew that he was not in the secrets of the Government, and that all he said, therefore, was but the simple expression of the opinions of an independent Member of the British Parliament. If he had thought for one moment that the Government intended to pursue any other course of policy abroad than that which was far less the opinion of any set of Ministers than the predetermined will of the country—a policy which during the last few months had been marked by dignity and moderation—he should not have undertaken the duty which he had risen to discharge, but he firmly believed that no change was contemplated in that respect. He knew that definitions were difficult, he was sure they were dangerous; but if he were asked to define what the foreign policy of this country ought to be, he should say it should be a combination of dignified forbearance, calm conciliation, and friendly intercourse with all nations. It was our duty to embrace every fair opportunity of extending our commercial and trading connections with other countries. With regard to peace we should use every means in our power to preserve it unstained and unsullied. With regard to war, he would bid them bear in mind the old motto on the Spanish sword—"Do not draw me without reason, nor sheath me without honour." Let this country respect treaties, let it not refuse its good offices when solicited to offer them, but, above all, let it not interfere unnecessarily and unwarily in the internal affairs of other nations. He believed that a policy of that kind would secure respect abroad, and he felt certain that it would acquire confidence at home. At the same time, while England pursued that line of policy, there was no reason why it should not on all legitimate opportunities endeavour to extend its trading and commercial relations with other countries, more especially when, as in the present instance, such a course would go far to wipe out old prejudices and ancient grudges. There was a subject connected with foreign policy of a painful character and of such importance that he did not wish his feelings with respect to it to be misunderstood for one moment. He would willingly have postponed any observations with respect to the annexation of Savoy to a more legitimate opportunity, but, as he believed that the Motion he was about to make involved to a certain degree an expression on the part of the House of confidence in the Ministry, thus much he would say, that he believed in respect to foreign policy the honour and best interests of England were in safe and trustworthy hands. To say more would be inopportune. He would now pass on to the subject that was more immediately inviting their attention, and first, he would ask the House to consider what had occurred during the last eight nights of debate on the Commercial Treaty with France. He had heard with some surprise the statement made by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire that the course taken by the Government with respect to the Treaty was neither right nor fair as regarded the House. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Government should first have invited the House to express approbation or disapprobation of the Treaty on a Motion of an Address to the Crown, and that if that Motion were decided in the affirmative the House should have proceeded to discuss, and reject or accept, the various items connected with the Customs' duties. The House, however, had given its vote against the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, and they had had lengthened debates on a number of points involved in the Treaty. He (Mr. Byng) had been surprised to find that the very course which the right hon. Gentleman recommended was denounced by the leader of the Opposition in 1787. Mr. Fox declared that of all ways the proceeding by Address was the most unconstitutional and dangerous; that it tended to deprive the House of its legislative functions, tied up the hands of Members, and tended to annul all those forms which our ancestors had devised to secure freedom of discussion. The course pursued on the present occasion was not obnoxious to any of those charges. The Chancellor of the Exchequer laid on the table of the House the provisions of the Treaty of Commerce at the same time that he made his financial statement. Time was allowed the country to deliberate on the propositions; deputation after deputation waited on the right hon. Gentleman, and all the great trading and monied interests of the country were consulted. Many amendments were proposed; many deficiencies were detected, and after the discussions which had taken place he believed that the House was in a position, with a due regard to the public interests, to pronounce an affirmative or the reverse upon the proposition he was about to submit to it. He could not help being struck by what occurred during the debate on the Motion of the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Du Cane). The question was very fairly raised by that hon. Member, but upon that occasion some of the Conservative Members, for South Lancashire, Liverpool, Cornwall, Northumberland, the Potteries, and other places, declined to follow the hon. Gentleman; and he therefore drew the inference that those Gentlemen were convinced of the beneficial character of the Treaty, and that they wisely preferred what they believed to be the interests of their constituents and of the country to any advantage to be gained by a party victory. In glancing at the Treaty he would not endeavour to over-estimate its advantages, or undervalue its corresponding disadvantages, but if he were asked why he supported the Treaty he should say, because it involved on the part of this country the almost entire removal of protective duties, and that simplification of the Tariff so long and urgently asked for. With the permission of the House, he would quote a few figures in order to show that the country had been advancing rapidly in this direction during recent years. Two hundred years ago there were 1,630 articles charged with Customs' duty; in 1787 there were 1,425 articles charged with duty; in 1826, 1,280 articles; in 1841, 1,163 articles; in 1845, 1,052 articles; in 1853, 466 articles; in 1859, 419 articles; and in 1860, when the present Treaty would come into effect, if the proposals of Her Majesty's Government were adopted, there would be only forty-four articles charged with duty. He likewise valued the Treaty because, in the first place, it constituted on the part of France an abandonment of prohibition, and, in the next, it established a great reduction of the import duties on articles of English produce and manufacture. He had heard it stated during the late debates, and probably he should hear again that night that a bad bargain was being made for the people of this country. If it were a question of how much one party would give and how little another would take, that objection might have some weight, but he denied that these negotiations were entered upon in the spirit of mere barter or bargain. This was not, in a literal sense, a treaty of reciprocity, but it was one of mutual benefit. Through this treaty the people of England said to the people of France, "We have seen past years of privation and distress; but recent years have been marked by unexampled prosperity in our commercial undertakings; this shows that the policy on which our legislation is now founded is wise and just in principle, and, as we wish other nations to be prosperous as well as ourselves, we invite you to meet us in the spirit of free trade; we do not ask for a bargain or barter, in making which everything must be weighed with exact nicety, and where the slightest preponderance would vitiate the fairness of the proceeding, but we ask you to remove prohibition and reduce protective duties, meeting us in a spirit of free trade, and we venture to predict that our convictions, which are strong on this subject, will become yours also." And how did the people of France answer this appeal? They said, "We recognize the justness of your arguments, and your condition justifies your statements; but these views are novel to many of us and unpalatable to others. Give us time, therefore, and we will endeavour to meet you in the path of commercial progress, and honourably and faithfully endeavour to carry out all our engagements." Paradoxical as it might appear he thought the mere fact that the Treaty did not excite on either side of the Channel any great enthusiasm was a proof of its impartiality. While in this country persons were heard in certain quarters grumbling with the Government for giving up all and getting too little, French manufacturers were complaining that 30 or 25 per cent ad valorem duties would hardly enable them to compete with English manufacturers. But what was the opinion of Mr. Pitt in 1787 with respect to the mutual advantages conferred by such a treaty as the present? Mr. Pitt said:—

"It was ridiculous to imagine that the French would consent to yield advantages without an idea of return; the Treaty would be of benefit to them; but he did not hesitate to pronounce his firm opinion, even in the eyes of France, that, though advantageous to her, it would be more so to us. The proof of this assertion was short and indubitable. She gained for her wines and other produce a great and opulent market; we did the same and to a much greater degree. It was in the nature and essence of an agreement between a manufacturing country and a country blessed with peculiar productions that the advantage must terminate in favour of the former; but it was particularly disposed and fitted for both the connection. Thus, France, was, by the peculiar dispensation of Providence, gifted perhaps more than any other country upon earth with what made life desirable in point of soil, climate, and natural productions. Britain was not thus blessed by nature; but, on the contrary, it possessed, through the happy freedom of its constitution and the equal security of its laws, an energy in its enterprise and a stability in its exertions which had gradually raised it to a state of commercial grandeur, and, not being so bountifully gifted by Heaven, it had recourse to labour and art, by which it had acquired the ability of supplying its neighbour with all the necessary embellishments of life in exchange for her natural luxuries." [Hansard, Parl. Hist. xxvi., 394,]

Every word uttered by Mr. Pitt in 1787 applied to the present Treaty, with this qualification, that at the present time the people were even more anxious than formerly that the inventive genius and mechanical industry of the two countries should be directed not to their mutual destruction, but to their relative improvement. Those who complained that France did not march in the steps of free trade with the same alacrity and rapidity, which we now displayed, ought to remember that England had arrived at her present convictions only by slow and painful degrees. We, too, had passed through the various stages of prohibition and protection; and if our neighbour in banishing the former still clung to the latter, we should endeavour to lend them a helping hand. On this point Mr. Buckle, in a well-known work, used some remarkable words. Speaking of free trade, he said:—

"It should always be remembered, as a proof of the backwardness of political knowledge, and of the incompetence of political legislators, that although the principles of free trade had been established for nearly a century by a chain of arguments as solid as those on which the truths of mathematics are based, they were to the last moment strenuously resisted, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that that was conceded the necessity of which had been proved by the ablest men during three successive generations."

It would be neither just nor right on his part if he were to abstain from noticing what he considered the errors of omission and commission in this Treaty. He could assure the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) that he sympathised in the feeling which had induced him to give notice of an Amendment to that Motion, and that he deeply regretted that, upon an occasion when the commerce of the country was to receive a material development, the shipping interest would still be subjected to harsh and injurious restrictions. It should be remembered, however, that this was a Treaty of Commerce, and not of navigation, and although it would affect the indirect trade, the direct trade, as he understood the Navigation Laws, would not suffer. Thus, an English ship going with an English cargo to a French port, would stand on precisely the same footing as a French ship; but if a Dutch or American ship went to France with a cargo of English produce, the differential duties in such a case would be levied. He sincerely hoped, with his hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay), that this state of things would not last. Another objection taken to the Treaty was of equal importance. He confessed that when he first read it he regarded the 11th Article with concern and apprehension. But the more he had considered the subject, and the more he had received information from competent authorities, the more had those feelings of concern and apprehension been removed. He now believed that in case of war the 11th Article would have no force with regard to the antecedent rights of other countries. What was the opinion of the Lord Chancellor on our undertaking to impose no export duty on coals?—

"As to the prohibition, this is merely intended by both sides commercially, and for commercial purposes it is most fair. If war should break out with France, the prohibition has no operation. It has no effect upon belligerent or neutral rights."

He (Mr. Byng) would, with deference, go further than this, for it seemed to him that, supposing we were at peace with France, and war were to break out between France and a friendly Power, which Power complained of our export of coals, as thereby furnishing France with munitions of war, we should not be able to let that Article of the Treaty continue in force. But, besides this, his feeling of regret at the existence of the 11th Article had been considerably diminished by the fact that ours was not the only country from which France derived its supplies of coal. The Belgian collieries were of large extent, and France might, in case of need, draw considerable stores from the shores of the Black Sea. One argument used against the Treaty on this subject had somewhat astonished him. It was said that we ought to retain the power of prohibiting the export of coal because the veins of coal in England only contained sufficient to last us for 400 years. That reminded him of a passage in a witty author respecting the people of Laputa, who, though they enjoyed many advantages of soil and climate, were described as being perpetually tormented by the fear that, at some time or other, the rays of the sun would be extinguished, and neither light nor heat would be received from this source. But supposing it were proved that the 11th Article were so injurious to the interest of England, was it absolutely binding on the Government? From the statement made by the Foreign Secretary on this point he gathered that the clause was capable of modification and of alteration, and that it would be in the power of the Government almost to reject it, if they thought fit to do so. Passing from these objections, he would ask the House these questions, "Do you believe this Commercial Treaty to be right in principle? Do you believe that, if fairly and honourably carried out, it will conduce to the advantage of the two contracting parties—that by its operation trade and commerce will be extended, and the material and industrial resources of both countries developed—that it has been entered into in a spirit of mutual conciliation and good-will, with a firm hope that it will produce between the people of the two countries an alliance more stable and permanent than any which can be formed between Sovereigns and Governments? Do you believe that it will knit together the two nations in one common bond of friendship and interest, and that the Treaty is one which will bear the scrutiny of time and the judgment of posterity?" If the House could return an affirmative answer to these propositions, he asked their co-operation in this Address. They had all, no doubt, consulted the precedent of 1787, and studied the debates on that occasion. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) had taken a technical objection to the words of the Address he was about to move, but it really breathed the same spirit of loyal attachment to the Throne as the Address to which he had referred, and the House of Commons was animated seventy years ago by the same hope which, he felt certain, now animated men of all parties around him—namely, that whatever treaties Her Majesty might ratify they might tend to the happiness and glory of Her Majesty and to the prosperity of her dominions. Before concluding he had another duty to perform. If it were true, as had been said, that that man was a benefactor of mankind who made two blades of grass spring up where but one grew before, he was not a less wise and useful citizen in his generation who gave up time, health, and fortune, and the yet more precious treasures of a gifted intellect to carry out what he believed to be for the benefit of his country. Such a man we had seen. We had seen him receive the greatest reward to which in this country an honourable ambition could aspire,—the reward of seeing every day the successful results of his arduous efforts in the great contest of free trade against protection and monopoly. Not content, however, with this, he had sought another and a wider field of action, in the wish that other countries should possess those benefits which, under Providence, had accrued to his own from a policy of unrestricted competition. Differences of opinion there might be respecting this Treaty; on the one hand its advantages, and on the other its disadvantages, might be over-estimated; but he (Mr. Byng) believed that there would be but one opinion as to the wise and patriotic part which had been played by the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), and if the Treaty produced the happy results which many anticipated, it would ever be a source of pride and gratification to the Commons of England that it had been negotiated and, in the main, concluded by one of their own number. In conclusion, he would respectfully appeal to hon. Gentlemen on the Government side of the House not to allow individual discrepancies of opinion to prevent their joining with him in this Address. To those who sat opposite he would hold a different language. He would ask that great historical party—the Conservative Gentlemen of England—to approach the discussion of this great question in a spirit worthy of the occasion, and that when recording their votes to-night they would all, in the words of the prayer which was daily read at their table, "lay aside private interests, prejudices, and partial affections." He trusted it would never be said again that there was a desire on the part of any one in that House to stifle discussion, for it was impossible that discussion could there be stifled. He would call upon hon. Members to reflect upon the vast interests which were at stake, and to give such a vote as they could look back to in future times with pride and satisfaction. If they objected to the Treaty financially, commercially, politically, morally, or socially, then let them return an indignant negative to this proposal. If they believed that in the negotiations the honour and dignity of the Crown or the interests of the nation had been sacrificed, then let them move an Amendment. If they thought that the Government had trifled with the interests of the country or had failed in their duty, let them displace the Ministry, and although he believed the country would not ratify such a judgment, even if pronounced by that House, yet the people would understand the manliness of such a step. If, however, hon. Members believed—as, in his opinion, a great majority of them did believe—that the Treaty would conduce to the best interests of England and France, he asked them to approach the Sovereign with the Address which he was about to propose, and to express with him a hope that, under the blessing of Providence—without which the efforts of the wisest statesman would fail—the two great nations of England and France might be still more closely united by the common bonds arising from identity of interests and reciprocity of intercourse, and thus prove, as they had heretofore proved, to be the pioneers of civilization and progress in all parts of the habitable globe.

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to assure Her Majesty that, having considered the Treaty of Commerce concluded between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, this House begs leave to approach Her Majesty with their sincere and grateful acknowledgments for this new proof of Her Majesty's desire to promote the welfare and happiness of Her subjects :

“To assure Her Majesty that we shall proceed to take such steps as may be necessary for giving effect to a system which we trust will promote a beneficial intercourse between Great Britain and France, tend to the extension of Trade and Manufacture, and give additional security for the continuance of the blessings of Peace.”

MR. BAINES said, he had the honour to second the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex, which had been proposed in a speech of so much ability, judgment, and good taste. He (Mr. Baines) felt it a deep satisfaction to join his hon. Friend in asking the House for its definitive approbation to a Treaty which had been formed to cement the friendship and advance the prosperity of the two greatest nations in the world. He felt that Her Majesty had in that exercise of her prerogative conferred another great boon upon her subjects; and it was right that the House should express its grateful acknowledgments for an act which he believed would be mentioned in history as one of the memorable events of Her Majesty's bright and happy reign. His hon. Friend, representing the metropolitan county, had expressed the mind of his constituents upon this Treaty. He (Mr. Baines), coming from another part of the country, was there to declare the opinions of his constituents regarding this great compact. He might speak, he believed, not only for the great town which he represented, as possessing a considerable variety of important branches of industry, but for all the great branches of industry carried on in the counties of York and Lancaster, and the northern and the midland counties. He believed that those engaged in the cotton, woollen, worsted, and linen manufactures, in the leather manufacture, in the porcelain and earthenware manufacture, in that of cutlery and hardware, in fact, in all the great branches of English industry, regarded the Treaty as opening a new market for their products, whilst, at the same time, they considered it a new pledge for peace. In the year 1855 he was a witness of two great and striking spectacles in the city of Paris. One took place in the Champs de Mars, and the other in the Champs Elysées. That in the Champs de Mars presented the spectacle of 60,000 French troops of all arms drawn up, and Her Majesty the Queen of England riding in an open chariot, attended by the Emperor and the marshals of France, through that vast host of armed men. That was an interesting spectacle, and he felt proud of his Queen. But he also felt proud of the French, for he felt that his Sovereign was as safe among that large body of gallant men as if she was surrounded by her own guards and in the midst of her own capital. The most pleasing thought presented to his mind by that great spectacle was, that it was not merely an alliance of friendship between two Sovereigns, but that it was an indication of an alliance of a very important kind between two great nations. It was, however, merely a political alliance. He then went to the other spectacle, the exhibition in the Champs Elysées; and there he was led to see that the political alliance was not supplemented by a commercial alliance, for there he found the manufactures of his own town and his own county displayed, indeed, for show, but not permitted to be sold. They were not allowed to be introduced into France by the Commercial Code of the country. A special licence was granted for the introduction of a few articles, by way of sample to the French manufactures, but as a general rule they were excluded. This was a great defect, for it showed there was not a perfect alliance between the two countries. The present Treaty had been concluded for the express purpose of remedying this evil. No one in that House would deny that commerce was the best guarantee of peace. He would show how extraordinary was the defect that now existed with regard to commercial interchange between the two countries. If they looked at the amount of that intercourse, they would find it disgracefully insignificant compared with the vast amount of the industry and trade of England and France respectively. The exports of British and Irish produce and manufactures in 1859 amounted in value to £130,440,000; but the proportion sent to our nearest and wealthiest neighbour was only £4,744,000. But there was also an inequality between our imports from and exports to France, which it was the duty of Government, if possible, to remove. The imports from France into the United Kingdom, in the year 1858, amounted to £13,271,890, and in the same year the exports of British and Irish produce to France amounted only to £4,863,131. The exports to France were little more than one-third of the imports from France into this country. But a great part of those exports consisted of raw produce or of articles in the first stage of manufacture, for example:—Wool (sheep and lambs), £701,090; coal, £578,232; iron, wrought and unwrought, £533,876; copper do., £372,628; tin, unwrought, £68,175; yarn, cotton, £53,393; linen, £84,223; silk, £143,236; thrown silk, £372,675; woollens, £196,975; making the total value of raw or partially manufactured goods exported £3,164,603 out of £4,863,131, the total amount of exports from England to France in 1858. He begged, in the next place, to call attention to the following statement of the exports to France in 1858 of manufactured goods:—Cotton manufactures, £229,058; hardware and cutlery, £99,115; lineens, £67,260; machinery, £260,142; silk manufactures, £42,166; woollen, £256,212; total manufactures, exclusive of yarn, £953,953. From that return it appeared that less than one million's worth of their manufactures were exported in that year to their nearest neighbour. He begged, in the next place, to call attention to the following statement of exports of British and Irish produce in the year 1859:—To France, £4,744,103; United States, £22,611,283; Germany, £11,777,162 (exclusive of Austria); Australia, £4,939,199; Holland, £5,379,794; Russia, £3,493,016; Turkey, £3,752,458; Brazil, £3,686,353; Egypt (Mediterranean), £2,195,882. It was most evident that the amount of mutual and beneficial intercourse between the two countries of England and France was miserably below what it was calculated by nature to be, and which it might be, to the infinite advantage of both countries. Allusion was made by his hon. Friend who preceded him to the admirable and unanswerable speech of Mr. Pitt, in defence of his Commercial Treaty with France. In a passage in that speech it was remarked, that while France excelled England in her natural productions, England excelled France in her manufactures, thus showing how desirable it was that an exchange of productions should be entered into between those two countries. The treaty of Mr. Pitt, affirmed by such enormous majorities worked well, and until the breaking out of hostilities the trade was continually and rapidly on the increase. But since that time they had had experience of two contrary kinds. They had the experience of twenty years of desolating war, by which the two countries were afflicted, by which mankind was injured, and by which civilization and Christianity were dishonoured. And they had had another sort of experience in England, and that was the experience of forty years of commercial reforms. Those forty years of commercial reforms were about to be closed by the Treaty before the House, which threw down almost every barrier that was interposed to prevent the establishment of perfect freedom of industry and consumption between England and all the world. Of course it did not throw down all the barriers in regard to France, but it was a great advance to perfect freedom on the part of that country. Had not their experience in England of the working of free trade sufficiently convinced them that they might take this step, and encourage France and other countries to follow their example? Had not all the interests deprived of protection been benefited? They took away the protection from their manufactures, from their commerce, from their colonies, from their agriculture, and from their shipping; and was there a single trade deprived of protection—bating partial and temporary exceptions—that was not much more extended and flourishing than when protection existed? Then what had been the results to different classes? To the landlord the removal of protection had brought an increase of rent-roll as well as securer rents—to the farmer a more abundant produce and a larger income—to the manufacturer a great extension of his operations—and to the merchant and tradesman the removal of protection had brought a great advance in prosperity. Great social and constitutional effects had also resulted from the removal of protection. They had a population much more contented than they had when protection existed. The dangerous complaints of class against class—of bread-eater against bread-grower had entirely ceased, and they were enabled in consequence to enlarge the basis of the Constitution. The noble Lord, the Member for the City of London, had the singular honour and felicity, as the reward of his long course of consistent patriotism, to be able to present himself in that House, holding in one hand the Treaty of Commerce with France, and in the other the Reform Bill for England. He should regret if it were thought by the manufacturers of England that they had unworthy competitors in France. They would have in the French manufacturers worthy competitors. The enjoyed in France the advantages of nature and of art—they had sunnier skies, clearer streams, great knowledge of chemistry, a natural and cultivated taste, patient industry, and a prolific invention. And if there should be any of the manufacturers of England so conceited as to think that they could easily bear away the palm, he would tell them that they might go to France and look at the productions of the French manufacturers with infinite advantage to themselves. He had asked an eminent manufacturer whether he thought he should be able to send his goods to France under the duties now to be levied, and he thought he should; but he added that it was not to be supposed that the French manufacturers would remain where they were now, but that competition would stimulate them to new exertions and greater improvements. Hitherto the French manufacturers had not had that stimulant, and improvement had consequently been much more rapid on the part of the British manufacturer than on their part. Was there any reason, however, for us to despond? No. In England they had advantages of the most substantial kind which would enable them to compete with their livelier, more ingenious, and more tasteful rivals in France. They had in the first place accumulated wealth and capital, which—being charged with a lower rate of interest—was

place of spinning by rollers, of the steam-engine, of the power-loom, of railways, and of the telegraph. They had also labour of a kind the most valuable in the world. There was no labour equal to that of the English labourer in point of activity, energy, and endurance. They had also a principle of self-reliance on the part both of manufacturers and artisans that was not equalled in any country of Europe. They had perfect freedom of commerce and of institutions. And, lastly, they had an impregnable-insular position opening to them all the commerce of the world, and protected by an invincible navy against any hostile attack. He was one of those who would maintain that their navy should always be the first in the world, and should be equal to every demand that might be made upon it in defence of the honour and interests of England. He assured the House that the great population among whom it was his lot to dwell, were animated by an earnest and true wish to cultivate a spirit of friendship and harmony with the French people, and to bury in oblivion the feelings which lingered in the recollections of by-gone days, when the two countries presented towards each other an attitude of antagonism. He believed the Treaty met the general approbation of the people, and that no party which should attempt to defeat it would find favour with the country. In conclusion, he might be permitted to remark that the utmost reach of political philosophy and all the results of historical experience just brought them to appreciate the old, simple, and Divine injunction, which might be attached as a motto to every commercial treaty, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

Mr. W. S. LINDSAY: Sir, reference has been frequently made to the Treaty of 1787, but when we compare that Treaty with the Treaty which we are asked now to affirm, I must say that that Treaty of 1787 is a Treaty of Reciprocity in the strict sense of that word, as regards Commerce and Navigation. In the course of this discussion we have often been invited to accept the Treaty now under consideration, as furnishing good ground for warranting the continuance of peace between this country and France; and I am one of those who think that anything which tends to facilitate intercourse between nations, also tends strongly to the binding of those nations together. But we must not forget that the Treaty of 1787 tended to make the ties much stronger between England and France than this one is likely to do, and yet within three or four years after it was ratified a fearful war was commenced between the two countries. Although this present Treaty fails as a Treaty of Reciprocity, and falls very far short of that of 1787, nevertheless I feel bound to accept it, and feel also bound in gratitude to the Government, and especially to my hon. Friend Mr. Cobden, through whose exertions the Treaty was obtained, to use my best exertions to carry it through, and upon these grounds :—It does not effect, most certainly, all that I desire, and in truth it is very far short of what I desire ; but it places England in a better position than she is in now, and it will give increased sources of employment to her people, and enlarged markets for her commerce ; and as it places us in a better position than we have hitherto occupied, I give it my hearty concurrence and support. But I rose more particularly to direct the attention of the House to Article 3 of the Treaty, and to speak more particularly to the Maritime view of the case in our dealings with France. If honourable Members will turn to the Treaty they will see by Article 1, that on British manufactures imported into France the duty shall in no case exceed 30 per cent, and so forth ; and then, in Article 3, reference is made to the differential duty respecting French shipping ; and looking at that Article 3, we should naturally draw the conclusion that the Article was levelled against English shipping ; I was under the impression myself at first that it was levelled example, which are subject to differential duties in that trade—would have been able to come to our ports and load our manufactures, and proceed with the cargo to a port in France. Under these circumstances it was necessary to make a provision, that this Treaty should not interfere with the differential duties which now exist as between France and foreign shipping, I will, with permission of the House, endeavour to state how we stand with regard to the Navigation Laws of France. They divide themselves into four distinct heads. First, the direct trade between this country and France. In that direct trade the ships of England and France can load the manufactures or produce of England without differential duties of any kind whatever, except in reference to some paltry matters on both sides, which ought to be removed from the path of free trade. Then there is the coasting trade of France. That trade is confined entirely to the shipping of France ; that is to say, if any foreign ship should take a cargo of goods from Havre to Bordeaux, she would be liable to confiscation, both goods and ship. Then there is the indirect trade, so far as regards the colonies and possessions of the respective countries, and the trade between them and the mother-country—that is to say, the trade between the French possessions and France, the trade between our East Indian possessions and France, and the trade between those colonies and possessions and England. The shipowner of France, as far as we are concerned, can enter into this trade with perfect freedom, as well as into our coasting trade. He can go to any of our possessions and load on the same terms as the English now do for the ports of England, or, by the laws of his own country, he can of course load for France. Now, British ships cannot load in the ports of Australia or India for France. They may load, indeed ; but the differential duties on most articles imposed by France are so heavy against British ships, and consequently in favour of the French ships, that British ships are entirely prevented from loading from our possessions for ports of France. Then there is the indirect trade again, so far as regards the trade between foreign countries and France—that is to say, the trade between America and France, or China and France. By the Treaties of reciprocity which France has, the ships of America can leave the ports of America for France on the same terms as French ships, but English ships cannot do so; in fact, the duty is so heavy that it is entirely prohibitory. Reference was made the other night to what has been stated in the Moniteur as being a great boon which the Emperor was about to grant to English shipping. At present the duty on cotton in French ships was the same as in American ships, while the duty on cotton in English ships was $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb., whereas, by the change about to be made the difference would be reduced to $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per lb. on cotton in British ships carrying it, say from New Orleans to Havre. A farthing a pound, however, was a prohibitory duty as much as $\frac{1}{2}$ d., for the farthing amounted to just 50 per cent on the gross amount of freight on the cargo between New Orleans and Havre. Therefore, to reduce the charge from $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to $\frac{1}{4}$ d. is no advantage at all, for the lower amount entirely prevents us from entering into that trade. I should wish to direct the attention of the House to one or two other points connected with this matter, and I would ask, "Has France gained by these restrictive duties?" If the system is unjust to us, it is more unjust towards the people of France—because it is a remarkable fact, that while the general Commerce of France has been increasing at a greater rate almost than any country in Europe, their shipping has remained almost at a standstill. I referred to McCulloch's Commercial Dictionary the other day, and was astonished to find that from 1827 to 1836, the trade of France increased by 10,000,000,000 francs; from 1837 to 1846 it increased 15,000,000,000 francs; and from 1847 to 1856 the export and import trade of France increased by no less than 22,000,000,000 francs, and this was the "Special Commons" of that country; that is to say, it consisted of articles imported for their own use, or articles of their own manufacture exported. Yet while all this wonderful increase has been going on in their commerce, the shipping of France has been at a standstill, for in 1830 they had 14,852 vessels, and seven less than they were before. It is true we of a larger tonnage the whole tonnage is only 1,000,000 tons what we own, and birds of the tonnage New York. In 1787 Domingo 527 ships, men, whilst in 1857

she had only 407 ships engaged in the whole trade of all her colonies and possessions, and these ships employed only 6,000 men. If, therefore, anybody had reason to complain of the narrow-minded policy of France, the people of France had most reason to complain. But we also have reason to complain, for while we throw open our ports to the shipping of France, and our coasting trade to the shipping of France, and whilst French ships are allowed to enter our ports on the same terms as our own shipping now enter them, France has made not the slightest concession to us. But what I am more anxious to direct attention to is, that if this Treaty, which I trust will be confirmed—is to produce the results we anticipate, it is utterly and absolutely essential that there be some material change in the Navigation Laws of France, and it is more necessary to make such alteration for the people of France than for those of England. I say not one word about the injustices of the law, which stipulates that we shall not take the produce of our own Colonies in our own ships into the ports of France, but I will endeavour to show that it is essential that France should make some change in her Navigation Laws. As I have said, the ships of France and England may take the manufactures of England to the ports of France; but, before many years are gone, the whole of that trade will be carried on in steamers. There will be large quantities of wine and silk coming from France, and large quantities of cotton goods—chiefly of the better sort of fabrics, I am told—going from England to France. But they will not be all going to one port. The cargo will be too valuable for any one place to take it, and it will be necessary for the vessel to proceed to two or more ports of France. An English ship at present can go to Liverpool and load a cargo for Havre, but she could not load a cargo from Havre to Bordeaux, for the moment it appeared that she was going from one port of France to another with cargo, the French authorities would stop her, and confiscate both ship and cargo. But the wines and silks of France will not in all cases be paid for by the manufactures of England; in many cases they will be paid for by the sugars and rice of India or the coffees of Ceylon. And how will the case stand then? The French merchant who has sold his wines to London has to receive payment in sugars from Calcutta, but he will not be able to take those sugars

to France in English ships. He will therefore be working at a great disadvantage. Now, Sir, I have on the paper a notice—I fear I must call it an Amendment, though I do not mean it as such, but only an addition to the Address—I suppose, however, in accordance with the rules of the House, it must be considered to be an Amendment. I feel myself placed in a somewhat awkward position, for I am anxious to see this Treaty ratified, because I think that the people of this country, and the ship-owners of England will be considerable gainers by it, as it will increase that particular trade in which they and the ship-owners of France are alone interested. But while I am anxious to see this Treaty of Commerce confirmed, I, at the same time, feel that some change must be made in the Navigation Laws of France, and I feel that it is but justice to the shipowners of England that some change should be made. Now, I am in this position: My great anxiety is to carry a Resolution of this House which will convey to the Emperor of the French the feeling of this House in regard to his Navigation Laws. I do not ask that the Emperor should place the ships of England on the same terms as we place the ships of France, but I ask that the trade of the colonies and dependencies of the respective countries may be placed on the same footing as the direct trade now is. I have stated the grounds upon which I ask this, and I have stated the necessity there is for it; but so anxious am I to confirm the Address to Her Majesty, that I am afraid to put my Amendment to the House, for fear I might prevent the ratification of this excellent Treaty, and if I press my Amendment to a division, and that division is against me, it will go to the Emperor of the French that we do not want a change in the French Navigation Laws. MR. PEACOCKE said, he was ready to join issue with those who predicated that immense advantages would be derived from the Commercial Treaty with France. He opposed the Treaty, in the first place, because he did not believe the commercial relations of England with foreign countries ought to be made the subject of commercial treaties; next, because he thought no duty ought to be remitted of which the remission could not be defended on its own merits. If the Treaty had been negotiated by a Conservative Government, what, he would ask, would have been the language of the hon. Member for Birmingham? He would have denounced the Government as the enemies of the great cause of commercial freedom; he would have taunted them with being false prophets, and intimated that the buccolic intellect was unable to appreciate the great truths of M'Culloch and Ricardo; he would have contended that by negotiating this Treaty they had thrown back free-trade principles for a period of twenty years. And this Treaty had really, he believed, stopped the advance of free-trade principles in France. The Government of England had attempted to obtain commercial concessions from France by granting still greater. Was that the way to propagate free trade principles in France? He thought, on the contrary, that if we were not to haggle and bargain with the French for the purpose of obtaining commercial advantages we should be more likely to induce them to adopt the principles of free trade. They would otherwise say that our faith in those principles was shaken, and that we had come to the conclusion that though excellent in theory they were ineffective in practice. He was opposed to commercial treaties in general, but he objected in a special manner to that under discussion, as tending to fetter our legislative action for a period of ten years, and deprived Parliament for that period of the free control over our financial code. No duties ought, he contended, to be abolished, the remission of which could not be defended on its own merits, and to that rule the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in reference to the wine duties certainly formed an exception which the right hon. Gentleman had failed to justify. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in his correspondence with Earl Cowley had admitted virtually that the remission was made for the purpose of obtaining concessions from France. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had, indeed, argued that those duties stood up like a brazen barrier between the poor man and a glass of wine, and that if they were only removed wine would become the beverage of the humbler classes. That, however, was a view of the question which was merely speculative and problematical; all we know for certain is, that wine is the beverage of the rich and tea the beverage of the poor; and it seemed to him, he must say, far from being a sound financial policy, at a moment when a deficiency of nine millions and a-half in the national exchequer existed, to cast away 2,000,000 of revenue for the sake of an hypothesis. Looking at the Treaty, however, upon its own merits, the view he was disposed to take of it was that it was an excellent Treaty for France. It was said, indeed, to be calculated to confer reciprocal advantages upon both the nations who were parties to its stipulations; but, for his own part, he could see very little of that reciprocity which some hon. Members seemed to suppose would be the result of its operations. France, under its provisions, would receive duty-free coal—an article which to her was of great importance for purposes of war; but how did she deal with the other products of our industry? While we consented to reduce or entirely to abolish duties, which we had hitherto levied on her staple products, she would continue to impose upon ours a duty of 30 per cent. If there was any reciprocity here it was unintelligible to him, and it was equally unintelligible on a former occasion to a Minister who enjoyed no inconsiderable reputation, who on a similar occasion, when the Dutch nation wished to treat our commerce after a similar fashion, sat down, and to our Minister at the Hague wrote in cypher his opinion of the matter in the following well-known lines:—

"In matters of commerce the fault of the Dutch
Is giving too little and asking too much;
With equal advantage the French are content,

which had been sufficiently dealt with by his hon. Friend who had just sat down. The operation of the Article of that Treaty which related to coal, which was at the present day almost as much a muniment of war as saltpetre or gunpowder itself, had been argued on the supposition of this country going to war with France. But he would ask what would be the consequences if France were to be engaged in hostilities with the United States or any other foreign Power? Why, the other Power would seize our transports, public feeling would be roused, and the result of our abiding by that Article, under those circumstances, might be that we should be dragged into a contest with such foreign Power contrary to our wishes, and in direct opposition to our best interests. But it was said the Treaty would tend to foster and extend friendly relations between the French and English people. Now, he, for one, was not sure that it would so effectually lead to the attainment of that object as some hon. Gentlemen seemed to suppose. The three great interests in France were the army, the priesthood, and the manufacturing classes. How her army was affected towards this country we had learnt from the addresses of the French colonels. The sentiments of her priesthood we had ascertained from the writings of M. Veuillot in the Univers. The manufacturing classes remained; whose industry existed only by the monopoly which they enjoyed. It was well known that under a change of fiscal system great distress must arise under the best circumstances. Let them consider what must be the effect of great distress in the manufacturing districts of France? We all knew what it implied in this country; starvation in the cottage and disorder in the market-place. When such distress had to be suffered in France, and when the people were told that it was owing to the importation of English goods, was that likely to produce in the minds of the manufacturing classes in France a feeling of favour towards England? For his own part, he was of opinion that the effect of the Treaty would be to unite in one common bond of hostility to England the three great interests which he had named, and, believing that to be the case, as well as regarding it to be false in principle, considered in its provisions, and calculated to produce disastrous consequences, he had no alternative but to enter his protest against the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex.

Mr. CLAY said, he rose to express his approval of the course which the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) had pursued in not pressing his Amendment upon the present occasion. The hon. Gentleman had, in adopting that course, he thought, consulted in the best manner the interests of those whose cause he had espoused, inasmuch as his Resolution, if it were passed at all that evening, could be carried only by a small majority, whereas upon a future occasion it might reasonably be expected to go forth with all that weight which attached to the unanimous decision of the House of Commons. Having said thus much upon that point, he might be permitted briefly to tender his thanks to the Government for having negotiated a treaty which would, he believed, be productive of very beneficial results. It afforded, he might add, no small indication of the favour with which that treaty was generally regarded that, so far as he could ascertain, it was highly approved by his constituents in Hull, who were, he would not say neglected in its negotiation, but, at all events, whose particular interests were not directly or immediately consulted by its provisions. The hon. Member who had just spoken, however, condemned the Treaty as making a bad bargain; but he (Mr. Clay) would not look upon it in the light of a bargain at all, for he could not help thinking that every concession which we pledged ourselves to make by virtue of it might very well be defended upon its own merits. It tended to render the path of free trade more easily trodden by the ruler of the French nation, and to make it almost impossible for France herself to stop short in the career which she had so suspiciously begun. Other countries, seeing the advantages which such a policy conferred, would be induced to follow her example, until at length principles from the adoption of which England had already derived so much advantage would come to be prevalent throughout Europe. Seeing that such would be likely to be the result, he could not hesitate to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex.

Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he could not understand how the Treaty could be regarded otherwise than as a bargain between the two countries by which it had been entered into, and, while prepared to admit that few hon. Members in that House were more interested than himself in the success of that bargain, yet he felt that he could not, on political grounds, even more important than its commercial consequences, give to it his support. As

Mr. Pitt had been quoted, he would take the liberty of quoting another authority, which would have even greater weight with the noble Lord the Minister for Foreign Affairs—he meant Mr. Fox—in order to justify him in viewing this question from a political point. In 1787 Mr. Fox said:—

“The object of France was to put us off our guard, to lull us into security, to prevent our cultivating other alliances, to lessen the dependence of foreign States upon us, to turn all our views to commercial profits, to make it the private interest of individuals rather to acquiesce in any future project of ambition which France might engage in rather than come to a rupture with her.”

If anything could prove the truth of Mr. Fox's remarks, applicable as he held them to be to this question and the present crisis, it would be, with reference to “commercial profits and private interests,” what he should call the un-English observations that fell the other evening from the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright). He did not think the hon. Member would have uttered the sentiments he did but for the interests involved in this Commercial Treaty. The noble Lord himself, when on a former occasion he was understood to palliate the possible annexation of Savoy to France, had no doubt also in his view the importance to this country of carrying through this Commercial Treaty. And he would observe that he approved of the language of the noble Lord as exhibited in the Despatches, but he regretted that he did not go further, and avail himself of the opportunity, knowing of the desire of the French Government as to Savoy, to throw greater obstacles in the way. The Treaty of 1787 was constantly referred to, but the greatest difference existed between the two cases. In 1787, Mr. Pitt had a surplus of £1,500,000, while we in 1860 had a deficit of £10,000,000. In 1787, Holland occupied the same position with reference to the two countries of England and France that Savoy now did, and there were mutual armaments. It was proposed by France to interfere in the United Provinces. And what followed the carrying of the Commercial Treaty? It was proposed by France that there should be a mutual disarmament. But, now, if the proposed Treaty meant anything it did not mean disarmament, for with a Treaty which was to bind the two countries in terms of mutual amity and alliance, we had almost double war Estimates, and were, besides, forming volunteer corps all over the country. There was no use in blinking this question.

Why, then, armaments—why, then, volunteer corps? They were occasioned by the ambitious views of France, which were exciting a spirit of mistrust and suspicion throughout the country. He did not wish to say anything that might give offence to the Emperor of the French, nor did he find fault with anything he had done since he came to the throne, but he must say all his protestations had been falsified by the result. The coup d'état, the occupation of Rome, the war carried on for an idea, and the prospective realization of that idea in a form which must add to the mistrust and suspicion of Europe, were instances in point. Throughout France the prevalent impression was that political considerations chiefly influenced us in the formation of this Treaty. It was only yesterday he read in the Revue des Deux Mondes the following statement:—

"It is not exaggeration to say that the Treaty of Commerce, in place of cementing an alliance between the two nations, is more likely to lead to war. It had been wiser for England never to enter into it, but there is time to reject it, and Parliament would evince great wisdom and foresight in declining the fatal gift. Its rejection would be the source of immense joy to France, and the two nations would be placed in better relations towards each other."

It was distinctly asserted that the two things—the Treaty and the annexation of Savoy—had gone on together, and that the noble Lord was influenced in giving way on the annexation question for the sake of the Commercial Treaty. On the Continent the two questions could not be separated. The observations which the noble Lord had addressed to the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake) precluded him from going into the foreign part of the question further than to say that in the state of distrust which now prevailed, to link ourselves for the next ten years with a country in the ruler of which we had not perfect confidence was a very great blunder, which might lead us into serious difficulties. Within two years of the treaty in 1787 the revolution broke out in France; and we might still find ourselves in very difficult relations with that country—all the because we were made a degree party to those French Emperor might we were perfectly free with him, the Continent to be so. In the end ourselves deserted by that we had clung so long and of which we had sacrificed so much—deserted without a single ally or an adequate national defence.

Mr. W. EWART said, he must deprecate the system of quoting partial extracts from partial reviews. The hon. Member who had just sat down had alluded to the volunteer movement as if it were evidence of a secret hostility to France. But nobody who had looked into the question had any other view of it than that it was a great national movement arising from a feeling that the defences of the country were not sufficient. He believed that the Emperor of the French himself, if his opinion could be obtained, would say that we were doing that which was right on general grounds. A more unfortunate quotation than that made by the hon. Member from Fox never fell from the lips of any man, when they recollected what Pitt, who was deeply versed in the subject, said on the same question. Pitt was before his age in political economy. He was the disciple and the friend of Adam Smith. It was said and believed that Fox had never read the works of Adam Smith. He had no respect for political economy; nor had Burke given deep attention to it, though so great a political philosopher. He felt inclined to give his earnest support to the Commercial Treaty now proposed, because, if not in conformity with the simple forms of free trade (which prescribe independent action, without a treaty), it was based upon free-trade principles. It might be said let France reduce her duties spontaneously as England had done, but that she had not done so was no reason why they should reject the very same thing because it came before them under the guise of a Commercial Treaty. There were two especial reasons why he should give the proposal his warm support—first, because it was eminently a measure of peace; and, secondly, it was a measure of extended commerce, a continuance of that policy which began in the days of Mr. Pitt, was advanced by Mr. Huskisson and Sir Robert Peel, and which his right hon. Friend now asked the House of Commons to confirm. He thought it only just to the Emperor of the French to state that a Commercial Treaty with this country was no new idea of his, for what was now his policy as an Emperor had also been his policy when President of the French Republic. When, in 1852, a Committee of the House sat upon the question of the wine duties, a French nobleman, the Baron de Oléant, who was also a large wine-grower, was examined before it. In his evidence he stated that he had recently had an interview with the President of the Republic, and that it was the wish of the latter to obliterate hostile feeling between the two nations, and that the best treaty of commerce would be mutual intercourse between them. The two main points with respect to the present Treaty were the wine question and the free admission of articles of French manufacture. With regard to the first of these points one hon. Gentleman stated that the English people had no taste for the wines of France—that they were not suited to the English palate. It might be that our people would not like the vin ordinaire, much less the piquette, but he would maintain, on the strength of the Report of 1852, and of that which Lord Chelsea had drawn up for Lord Cowley, that many of the wines of France, particularly those produced in the region extending from the mouth of the Rhone to Bayonne, were well fitted for English consumption. He denied that French wines were unsuited to the English taste and climate. Any reader of Chaucer would remember the allusion to Bordeaux wine in the Pilgrimage to Canterbury. But it was needless to cite old authorities; French wines would have continued to be the prevailing wines, had it not been for the measures of prohibition adopted by our Legislature. In the reign of William and Mary an Act was passed declaring the importation of French wines and other goods a common nuisance, and providing means for putting a stop to it. But the wants of mankind would always defeat the ingenuity of the Legislature; and accordingly they found in another Act, passed he believed, in the second year of Queen Anne, complaining of French wine still coming in, and that it was not “staved, spilt, burnt, or destroyed,” as had been ordered by the previous enactment, and more rigorous means were taken to secure its exclusion. Next came the Methuen Treaty which confined us to port—and when that was first negotiated petitions were presented against it. Among them was one from the afterwards port-drinking University of Oxford, signed by a large number of Members—among others by Dr. Aldrich, the celebrated Dean of Christ Church, the author of the Logic, of Pockwater Quadrangle, and of the well-known Merry Christ Church Bells. To show that the people of England even now were not impervious to the use of French wines, he would call attention to the evidence given before the Committee of 1852 by Mr. Tower and Mr. Short, which showed that what he might call the lower middle classes relished the use of wines, and if that were the case under the operation of restrictive laws, what might not be expected when wine came into the country under a system of free trade. But it would be idle to open the door to the importation of French wines if means were not at the same time provided for distributing them among the people, and particularly for bringing them down to a lower stratum of society; and on that account he greatly approved the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for extending the system of granting licences. Many persons, now denied the use of wine, might then have the privilege of enjoying it. Why, to put a case, might not a poor governess cheer her solitary meal at a confectioner's shop with a glass of wine. With respect to other articles of French manufacture they would, he thought, by their superiority of design, greatly improve the taste of the manufacturers of this country. It was a remark of Adam Smith's that there were no persons were much interested in the removal of prohibition as the landed interest, since they were the general consumers of imported goods. He trusted now that their peculiar monopoly was removed, and they were enrolled, so to speak, in the category of Free-traders, hon. Gentlemen opposite would come forward boldly, and, as in the time of James I., demand the abolition of all monopolies. As a measure of peace he supported this Treaty with the greatest cordiality. He protested strongly against the notion that there was any natural enmity between France and England, and he would refer those who had any idea of this sort to the language of Mr. Pitt—“The doctrine that France must be the unalterable enemy of England,” said Mr. Pitt, “is strongly to be deprecated. To suppose that any nation should be the unalterable enemy of another is weak and childish. It has no foundation in the experience of nations, or in the history of man. It is a libel on the constitution of human society.” As a friend of peace, he rejoiced that the Treaty had been signed. It was said by a poet of the last century, not now so much read as he deserved:—

"The Gaul, in days of antique story,
Saw Britain link'd to his now adverse strand;
No cliffs between, sublime and hoary,
He trod, with unwet foot, from land to land."

He trusted that though the two countries were no longer linked together by material bonds, they would long be bound to each other by mutual feelings, by mutual interests, and he hoped hereafter by mutual freedom. He congratulated his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the success of this peaceful enterprise, of which the glory indeed was great, but of which the good was greater than the glory. He hoped that to the last hour of his life his right hon. Friend would have the satisfaction of knowing that he had conferred an inestimable benefit not only on his own country but on all mankind.

MR. MAGUIRE: I wish, Sir, as an Irish Member, to state the reasons why I give my most cordial support to the Commercial Treaty with France, and the Budget of which it forms a part. I do not agree with those hon. Gentlemen who apprehend that serious political inconvenience will follow from this Treaty; but, on the contrary, I firmly believe that it will not only be productive of highly beneficial results to England and to Ireland, but tend to secure the continuation of peace and the growth of friendly and amicable relations between this country and France. No doubt, Sir, there is an apparent inconsistency in a war budget and a peace treaty—in enormous Estimates for military and naval preparation, and a treaty, on the base of mutual interests; but it is an inconsistency for which the Government and Parliament are scarcely, if at all, responsible. The Government, acting with the concurrence of Parliament, have really done nothing more than act in obedience to those feelings of alarm and suspicion which seem to pervade all classes in this country with regard to the present or the ultimate policy of the Emperor of the French. Nevertheless, it is not by new and improved rifles, or by Whitworth and Armstrong guns, or by launching additional line of battle ships, or even by studding the coast with impregnable fortresses, that we can obtain that confidence and security at which we naturally aim—we can only do so effectually by endeavouring to enlist the sympathies of the mass of the French people in favour of mutual kindly relations, and thus strengthening the union between both countries. I do not believe that now, when we are spending £30,000,000 on our armaments, we are one whit nearer the end which we have in view—namely, security and confidence—than we were when our expenditure was only £20,000,000; nor do I think that, by the gallant display which was yesterday made in the streets of London, we are likely to enlist the sympathies of the French people, so as to influence the policy of the Emperor in the direction of an honest and enduring peace. I hold, then, that this Treaty will prove more efficacious than the most costly armaments, inasmuch as it will unite the two nations by the strong tie of a common interest. I place no trust in the Emperor—but that is not the question with which I have now to deal. What the House is now to consider is this,—how can we lead the people of France to see that their interests are so much in favour of friendly relations with this country, that it will not be in the power of the French Government to cause a wanton rupture with our Government and people. It is not right or fair in us to blame the Emperor for not having gone farther than he has done in the present treaty; for it must be borne in mind that he has had to deal with the most obstinate and impracticable people in the world, the monopolists and protectionists. Not very long since the same class were to be found at this side of the Channel, and in this House too. I remember the time when I was strongly influenced by the apprehensions expressed by a large class of my own countrymen, the gentry and the farmers of Ireland, who cried out—"Oh, if Protection is gone, Ireland is lost for ever;" but I learned wisdom by experience, and the first vote I gave in this House was in favour of free trade. It was the last formal battle that was fought on this floor between protection and free trade, and I sustained the banner of free trade, if not by my voice, at least by my vote. What have been the results of free trade for Ireland? Formerly there were many gloomy prophets, of the Cassandra class, who predicted all manner of terrible things, especially the ruin of the agricultural interest, as well as the trading and commercial, should the principles of free trade be applied to Ireland. These gloomy predictions have been utterly falsified by the result, because Ireland has gained enormous advantages from the policy inaugurated by Sir Robert Peel. It has been said of this Treaty, assuming it to be one in the direction of free trade, that England would have all the advantage to be derived from it, while Ireland would have none. Well, I am here, as an Irishman, to give my emphatic denial to that assertion. Ireland, I assert, has gained enormously by free trade; not, indeed, so much from any great advantage which she has derived from increased manufactures, as from the higher prices which she has obtained for the produce of her soil. Prices are now paid for some articles of Irish produce, and even in the Irish market, such as were not paid in the time of the great French war. I hold in my hand the accounts from the last Cork butter market, dated March the 5th; and what were the prices in that, the greatest market in Ireland, through which butter to the amount of a million and a-half of money passed during the last year? It was £6 10s. a hundred for the first quality, and £5 15s. for the third quality—these are war prices in time of peace. If I look to the price of wheat, what do I find? Why, notwithstanding the free importation of foreign bread stuffs, it was about 50s. a quarter—which is a much larger price than the Protectionists had ever hoped to obtain for it under the free-trade system. Free trade, I repeat, has done enormous service to Ireland; it has saved thousands and thousands, nay, without exaggeration, hundreds of thousands, of human lives. I well remember the state of things in 1848, when the price of Indian meal, and that not of the best description, was £21 a ton; and I remember, to my knowledge, one parish of the county of Kerry in which, in the same year, there was not an ounce of food for sale for nearly twenty-four hours, and in which the Indian meal that was afterwards brought in was sold at the rate of £34 a ton—the same article that has since been imported at £6 10s. and £7 a ton. I shall only state another fact to show how, in the hour of her direst distress, Ireland was saved by free trade and open ports. A certain district in the West of the county Cork exported, the year before the famine, somewhere about £70,000 worth of produce—that is, sent it to the Cork market, to be afterwards shipped to England. On the following year, instead of sending out a single shilling's worth of what it produced, it had to bring in food to the value of nearly £100,000. But for free trade, but for open ports, the people of Ireland would have been slain, not by thousands, or hundreds of thousands, but by millions. Has free trade done injury to the Irish gentry or to the Irish farmer? I assert not. While free trade has given new energies to the people of Manchester, Leeds, and Glasgow, it has benefited Ireland through her agriculture, through her commerce, through her ships employed in the coasting trade; for she it is that supplies the hungry mouths and craving stomachs of the English consumers. Ireland, therefore, gets a larger price for her produce; and the farmers of Ireland—though in a short time they will, upon a particular question, claim justice at the hands of this House, and I trust they will obtain it—were never in a more flourishing position; and the Irish landlords never had their rents better paid. Why was this?—because there is active enterprise and remunerated industry in all parts of this country, and therefore the ships which sail from Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Waterford, and Wexford, are filled with the produce of Irish fields, Irish farms, and Irish dairies. This is the principal reason why I support a free-trade Budget, and a Treaty in the same direction. It has been said that England is to have all the immediate advantage to be derived from this Treaty. Indeed, an hon. Friend of mine, the Member for King's County (Mr. Hennessy) unwittingly, and of course, unconsciously, endeavoured to deceive the House the other night, by attempting to show that Ireland would have but a very small share in the advantages of the Treaty, or in the contemplated remission or repeal of duties—proposed in the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I hold in my hand an able article from the Irish Quarterly Review, in which the writer clearly proves that Ireland does not get credit for the whole of the amount she contributes to the Imperial Exchequer. In fact, it is conclusively shown that she paid, in the year 1857-58, a million more than she is supposed to have done. She gets no credit for the duty which is paid in England on articles which are consumed by her people; and this evidently gave rise to the notion that in the remission of duty on foreign importations she would derive little, if any, benefit. The hon. Member for the King's County mentioned one article amongst others—currants—and he quoted it in order to show that Ireland would derive only the four-hundredth part of the advantage which England would derive from the proposed remission of duty. The returns from the Custom-house are quite fallacious with respect to the share of duty paid by the Irish consumer; because while the total amount of duty paid on currants to the British customs was £300,992, according to the last returns, the proportion paid by Ireland, or into the Irish Customs, was but £720; thus representing the one-four-hundredth part of the consumption represented by the English duty. Now, if we take the relative populations of the two countries, and consider that the population of Ireland is at least six millions and a-half, it will be seen at once that no figures could by possibility be more fallacious, or no statement more absurd. The explanation is simply this—not that the Irish people do not use currants, in the proportion that they are used in other parts of the United Kingdom, but that the wholesale grocers of Dublin, Cork, Belfast, and other principal towns, generally dealt with merchants in London, Liverpool, or Bristol, who imported the article and paid duty for it in England. It is thus that England gets credit for more duty than she really pays, and that Ireland obtains less credit for her contributions to the common Exchequer. As an instance in point, I may state, what I believe to be the fact, that an immense quantity of refined sugar is annually imported into Cork, scarcely a shilling of the duty on which is paid into the Customs in Ireland, but has been paid in Plymouth and other English towns. The same may be said of large quantities of unrefined sugars. So it is with other articles. Referring to the item of ladies' wearing apparel, including silks, gloves, and artificial flowers, I will show how absurd is the alleged contribution of Irish duty on those articles. For instance, England is represented as having paid £20,452 duty on artificial flowers made abroad, principally in France, while Ireland is set down as only paying £2! And in the article of gloves, while England is represented as paying duty to the amount of £53,314, Ireland does not get credit for a single penny; and yet it is well known that there is a considerable demand for foreign gloves in that country. But then there is the great item of silk manufacture, on which England paid a duty of £295,034, while Ireland is represented as having paid but the infinitesimal sum of £31. As an Irishman, I admit it is not a matter to boast of, but it is the fact, that Irish ladies are fonder of dress than even the ladies of England. I know not whether to attribute this taste for magnificence to their alleged Eastern origin; but I can assert that—to say nothing of the cities, even in poor country towns in Ireland one might often see ladies sweeping the streets with robes that would grace St. James's or Versailles. What is the explanation of the discrepancy in the two accounts—in the large sum for England, and the infinitesimal proportion for Ireland? This—that the duty on these articles had been paid by the great houses in London, who sold them duty-paid to the houses in Ireland. It is then not just to say that in all the proposed remissions of duty on foreign articles, of whatever nature, that Ireland will not enjoy her full share of advantage. I am not afraid of any injury being done to Ireland by the free importation of foreign butter. I believe that the honesty and fair dealing of the Irish maker and the Irish market will more than countervail the cheap rogues of the foreign maker and importer. The foreign maker sends in to this market a fraudulent and inferior article, adulterated with various compounds; whereas in Cork, for instance, the greatest of the Irish markets, those who govern that market are bound by the most solemn obligations, of honour as well as of self-interest, to maintain the sacredness of their brand—so that the butter marked 1st quality, 2nd quality, and 3rd quality, will really be 1st quality, 2nd quality, and 3rd quality, as it is represented to be. [Mr. DISRAELI: That is part of the Budget; we are speaking of the Treaty.] It surely is a part of the same subject, the Treaty being a provisional portion of the Budget. There has been much and unnecessary apprehension as to one article provided for in the Treaty—coal; but that apprehension appears to have very nearly died out, and no one will be bold enough to attempt to galvanize the skeleton into momentary life. What is the fact? France does not want our coal for purposes of war and invasion; she requires it for manufacturing and domestic purposes. By her canals and her railways she can supply her war-steamers with an abundance of suitable coal; but if she required other coal for war purposes, what more easy for her than to purchase it, the difference of price being an item unworthy of consideration in the Imperial expenditure. I ask, is it of no advantage that England finds in France an additional and extensive consumer of her coal? Coal is extracted from the bowels of the earth by human labour, well remunerated; and is it of no advantage to England that she should have additional employment for her working classes, and additional demand for her ships in sending it to a foreign country? The right hon. Gentleman, the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside) endeavoured the other night to alarm Irish Gentlemen on the subject of Irish linens. I must honestly confess that I am personally unacquainted with the question myself; but if I am ignorant, I am at least humble, and I have, therefore, consulted some of the very highest authorities as to the operation of the Treaty on the linen trade of Ireland. Amongst other authorities on this subject, I sought information of the hon. Member for Lisburne (Mr. Richardson), who has, perhaps, the largest interest of any man in Ireland in the prosperity of the trade, being himself personally engaged in the manufacture of the article on the most extensive scale. The right hon. Gentleman sits on the Opposition side of the House, and is not a supporter of Her Majesty's Ministers, and perhaps might strain a point to go against them; and yet he, and other Gentlemen conversant with this great Irish interest, admitted that, under the Treaty, Irish linens could be sent into France so as to be able to compete fairly with the linens of Belgium, that an increased trade in linen yarns would be its certain result—and Irish diapers and Irish damasks would be able to beat all competitors out of the field. But perhaps the best proof of how the Treaty has been received in Ireland, and how it is likely to develop trade and manufactures in Ulster, may be given by the statement which has been made to me a few moments since, in the lobby, by the largest shipowner and one of the most enterprising men in Ireland,—namely, that it is now in contemplation to get up a company, or to establish a line of steamers, to carry on commerce direct between the North of Ireland and France. I support this Treaty because I believe its advantages to France will be great, while its advantages to England will be no less. I hope to see the day when we no longer shall have war Estimates in the time of peace. If the benefits resulting from this Treaty will be at all equal to those which are anticipated from it by its friends and promoters, no Minister will have the courage to stand at that table and ask for the enormous amount of money which has been asked for this year for naval and military expenses. Those Estimates, which press so grievously on the industry and the means of the mass of the country, must be materially reduced in consequence of friendly relations between the two countries. I say these Estimates must be reduced; for if there be brought about a good feeling between the two nations, of what other Power have we any apprehension?—what other country is there to menace the repose of this?—from what other potentate is there the slightest danger to your security or your liberty? Why is it that friendly relations are so steadily maintained between the United States of America and England? Is it because you and they are of the same blood, or of the same race, or of the same religion? No, it is because there is such extensive commerce between the two countries, and their mutual interests are so interwoven in the bonds of peace, that neither the government nor the people at either side of the ocean would venture to break them. I wish to see the same relations between this country and France; and I believe that once the Treaty is concluded, and in fair operation, the pressure of taxation will become less year by year; and that this country will yet bless the name of Richard Cobden, who has promoted this noble scheme of amity and friendship, which will, while doing vast good to France, also do vast good to England. If France does not at once break down all the barriers of protection, it is to be hoped she will do so eventually, when once she has fully tasted the advantages of free trade. France, it must be remembered, is only now taking that step which this House took a few years ago with such alarm and misgiving, and in time she will follow our example. I differ from the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Peacocke), who asserted that three great classes in France were anxious for war with England—the army, the clergy, and the people. Soldiers, no doubt are ever anxious for war, as a means of distinguishing themselves in their profession; but I deny that the clergy of the great Christian Church of France are anxious for war and the effusion of blood. They may resent undue interference on our part with matters that deeply affect their Church, and even religion—they may, and they do, resent taunts, and gibes, and calumnies, too frequently resorted to by the press and the platforms of this country, and even uttered in this House—they may resent the stupid and bitter malignity which is veiled under the forms of diplomacy; but they are anxious for the maintenance of peace, because they know that Christianity and civilization flourish in times of peace and not in time of war. As to the people—the masses of France—they must be benefited by whatever reduces the cost of the principal articles of daily consumption; and when they find that the Treaty with England will ensure to them cheapness, and, at the same time, more abundant employment, they will not be willing to quarrel with a people with whom it is their best interest to live in peace. As an Irishman, I heartily applaud this scheme, and I earnestly trust that it will be carried out to the advantage and satisfaction of this country, and of that great country with which we are now for the first time, for many years, endeavouring to establish, on a sure foundation, friendly and kindly relations.

MR. RIDLEY said, that as one of the representatives of a district which would be materially affected, he rose for the purpose of giving his hearty support to this Treaty, and to the financial measures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer which were connected with it. He believed that in doing so he was acting in accordance with the wishes of the vast majority of his constituents. He thought the House might look upon the speech of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) as an indication that they should have a unanimous assent to the Address from the representatives of the United Kingdom of England and Ireland. He was one of those who did not look for reciprocity in this or any other Treaty, but he looked at it as a great step on the part of France in the right direction and in favour of free trade, which we so much wished to extend. As a treaty of reciprocity it was no doubt open to cavil, but he had received a vast number of letters from persons engaged in manufactures, who stated that though they did not see any immediate or large advantage to their own particular trades, nevertheless they gave their entire assent to this Treaty and the principles upon which it was founded. Besides the iron and coal trades there were other trades in the north which would derive advantages from this Treaty. There were large proprietors of chemical manufactures who were of opinion that this Treaty was only wanting to complete the perfect following out of their manufactures, by admitting them at a low rate of duty into the French markets. With respect to coal, he believed there was considerable misapprehension existing as to the effect of this Treaty upon that trade. As regarded the extent of the coal-fields of England, a well-informed authority had assured him that at the rate of 80,000,000 tons a year, there would be a duration of 1,975 years. This was exclusive of the coal-fields under the sea. In working coal and preparing it in a large or round state for ordinary sale, a considerable proportion of small coal is produced, for only a part of which is there at present a market. The rest is wasted, being for the most part uselessly burnt at the pit's mouth. In the case of some single large collieries this waste is going on at the rate of 500 to 600 tons per day. The surplus thus destroyed was estimated to amount to nearly 2,000,000 of tons annually in Durham and Northumberland alone, and constitutes a pure sacrifice of a valuable material. This small coal will be exported to France, and the extra demand on her part for coal from us will be met, for some time at least, by the supply of a material now unproductive to our country. It was said France wanted coal for purposes of war; but the truth was she wanted them much more for the purposes of commerce. Coal, some held, ought to be considered contraband of war, but by the same rule so ought the cloth and leather with which the soldiers were clad. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) that the shipping advantages between the two countries ought to be mutual, and that our Government ought to impress upon the Government of France the necessity of altering their navigation laws. He should hold the same language even if the Shipping interest was in the most flourishing condition; because the more extended the application of correct principles of commerce, the greater the benefit to ourselves and the world. At the same time he did not think it right to resort to the system of reciprocity clauses. He was therefore glad that the hon. Member still intended to bring forward his Motion, with regard to the differential duties as a substantive Motion. Perhaps he was too sanguine in his estimate of the political effects of the Treaty; yet he could not help expressing a firm conviction that it would tend to the permanent interests of peace. They were in the habit of thinking that if a revolution broke out in Paris, revolution must also break out in Berlin, Vienna, Naples, and Rome. Then, he asked, why should not the reverse be the case when France sets a good example? Why should not other States pursue a free trade policy, and the advantages be made general throughout Europe? Foreigners pointed to our numberless statutes and asked us why we did not adopt the Code Napoleon. He thought it would be well for us if we did, but when we consented to this Treaty we could return a triumphant answer by pointing to the shortness and simplicity of our tariff.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST said, he had anxiously waited to hear an enunciation of the policy to be pursued by those who sat on the front Opposition benches with regard to the Motion before the House, but he had waited in vain. He had felt it his duty to support the financial proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because it was a continuance in the course of wise financial policy which was inaugurated by Sir R. Peel, which had conferred many financial benefits upon the country, and to which we should be wise to adhere. He fully coincided with the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Ridley) with respect to the extent of coal, and with the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Magnire) that the French Emperor had no need of coal for the purposes of war, but for the purposes of commerce. He (Lord A. V. Tempest) wished to see the commerce of France and England carried out to its widest extent, and he sincerely hoped that the commercial alliance between the two countries would promote their mutual prosperity and create feelings of sympathy and goodwill between them. Such were his wishes; but his expectations did not go so far; he was not so sanguine. He trusted that he should not expose himself to the charge of inconsistency if he attempted to give his reasons for opposing the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex. Great Britain might enter into commercial arrangements with France, but that did not necessitate a State treaty. He had recorded his vote in favour of the propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he might, he trusted, with the fullest consistency, say that this was not a time to agree to the Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Byng). He deprecated the approval, by the House of Commons, of that Motion, affirming, as it did, the existence of terms of amity and friendship between France and England, when the course, he believed, the Emperor of the French was determined on pursuing with regard to Savoy and Nice was entirely opposed to the sentiments and wishes of this country. Should this be so, he thought the British House of Commons was entitled to say even to the Emperor of the French—"Thus far shall you go, but no farther." There were only two speeches hitherto made on the subject of the annexation of Savoy which expressed the sentiments of the people of this country—the speeches of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield and the hon. Member for Horsham. He had heard they were indiscreet; but his opinion was that they were true. If he wanted an argument against the Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Byng) he found it in the despatches of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He particularly wished the House to give its attention to the noble Lord's Despatch of the 28th of January, in which he said:—

"The Emperor cannot fail to have present to his mind the alarm and anxiety which prevailed in Europe during the past summer; the arming of Prussia and the German Powers; the hopes of revolution excited; the rumours of alliances, offensive and defensive, which agitated the public mind. The Emperor can well recall that period; for he stated how much of glory he was content to forego, how much of noble aspirations to disappoint, in order to give satisfaction and peace to Europe. It is to be hoped and desired that the present tendency should be to soothe the troubled waves and restore calm to the agitated atmosphere. But the question of the annexation of Savoy would be regarded not so much as composing past troubles as raising the elements for new storms. Natural frontiers—the Alps and the Rhine—the repetition of the history of long and bloody wars—the commencement of a new struggle between France and Europe—such are the ideas which would pass through men's minds at the announcement of such an acquisition. Let the Emperor recall the noble words in which he gave forth at Milan a sentiment not less just than becoming the Sovereign of so great an empire. In addressing the Italians, His Imperial Majesty said, 'In the enlightened state of public opinion the moral influence that can be exercised contributes more to grandeur at the present time than barren conquests, and that moral influence I seek with pride by contributing to render free one of the fairest portions of Europe.'"

It was a "barren conquest" that the Emperor of the French was seeking now. He cared not for protests, and meant to annex Savoy. The time had come when he might throw off Count Walewski's mask. Was that a time to express continued amity with the Emperor? You might be on visiting terms with a person, but that was no reason for being his affectionate friend. Let the people of this country be on visiting terms with the Emperor of the French, but do not let them throw themselves into his arms. He trusted that the House would pass the financial propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, since they would be beneficial to the interests of the country; but, he considered these propositions as not necessitating the acceptance of the Motion before the House, which he knew would be accepted in Europe as the tacit submission of England to the French Emperor's aggressive policy. He for one, was not willing to shake hands with a man who had got a glove on, and that an iron one. He begged to propose an Amendment, embodying his views, which, however, he should be happy to withdraw if some Member of greater weight than himself would put a Resolution on the subject into the hands of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. BOVILL seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,—

"To leave out from the words 'Majesty that,' in the second line, to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House approaches Her Majesty with great devotion and respect, but while fully appreciating the advantageous results to be obtained by this Country from an increased commercial intercourse with France, and while fully estimating the European benefits attending the friendly relations between Great Britain and France, this House respectfully declines expressing an opinion on the Treaty Her Majesty has concluded with the Emperor of the French, until such time as the final intentions of the Emperor of the French with reference to the project of annexing Savoy and Nice to the French empire be made known to this Country,'—instead thereof."

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. SLANEY said, he hoped the noble Lord would forgive him if he did not enter into a discussion of the Amendment which he had proposed to the House, but simply say that he should vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex. He thought the Treaty would be the means of giving great advantages to this country and the country opposite to them. It would be the means of giving extended employment to great masses, both here and in France, and would, by degrees, bind together in the bonds of amity two peoples who had been too long in the habit of considering themselves as natural enemies, so that in the course of time they might be as one nation. In the first debate which they had had on this subject, they had heard some points quoted from the works of Mr. Arthur Young. Now, to that gentleman the landholders of this country owed a deep debt of gratitude, and in regard to France, he showed that she could produce for this country wines, olives, and silk—articles which this country must require, and which the South of France would supply in large quantities if a sufficient demand sprang up to induce the people of France to cultivate their production; and such a demand would necessarily lead to a much larger employment of labour. In exchange for these things England could send the products of her looms and her manufactories. A point had been put forward to alarm our manufacturers, and it was said the French people would be able to undersell them. He (Mr. Slaney) wished to call the attention of the House to the fact that in this country we had one very great advantage. We had the advantage of possessing immense capital, extensive credit, and admirable facilities of communication. The French, on the contrary, could never expect to have anything like the capital which was necessary for the establishment of large manufactories, in consequence of the compulsory division of property which took place every generation. The operation of that law would prevent the increase of capital, and thus there would be a tendency in the people to turn their attention to the cultivation of their soil. They could supply us in abundance with the natural products of their soil—olives, silks, and wines—and we, in return, could send them the productions of our looms, our mines, and our forges. Besides, the French would send to this country articles of beauty and taste, matters in which the people of this country were deficient. In the hope that these exchanges would be for the advantage of each nation and for the good of all mankind, he should cordially vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex.

SIR HUGO CAIRNS: Sir, I do not rise to express dissent from the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex. I should regret very much if that Motion were not carried. The rejection of the Motion would be the overthrow of the Treaty, and, for my part, I do not desire that the Treaty should be overthrown. But if my assent to the Motion were to be held to imply that I believe this to be a Treaty wise in its provisions, well-considered in its details, or such a treaty as the trade of the country requires, and has a right to expect, the opinion which I entertain of the Treaty would be very much misapprehended. And it is in order to prevent that misapprehension that I do not wish to give a silent vote on the present occasion. I desire to disclaim at once an opinion which I know is held by very high authorities who object to a commercial treaty merely because it is a commercial treaty. I make no such objection. I know that commercial treaties are liable to lead to inconveniences and embarrassments, and no one could give a more forcible description of their dangers in this respect than was given in the course of the last Session of Parliament by the two noble Lords who sit on the Treasury bench. But to say that a commercial treaty can never be justified would, I think, be to apply, in an extreme and violent manner, a perfectly good abstract and general rule. A commercial treaty must depend for its justification upon the circumstances of the case and upon its own provisions. I am also ready to confess that any arrangement which will have a tendency to draw closer the commercial intercourse between this country and France is eminently desirable. Everything that has been said—and much has been said to-night—of the relative capacities of France and England for the interchange of their products, and, on the other hand, of the very limited trade which has hitherto been carried on between the two countries, we all know and feel to be true. I recollect the anxiety which was felt by many of the commercial classes in 1840 and 1841, when efforts were made to obtain a reduction of the French import duties on English goods, and I remember the regret with which the failure of the efforts to obtain that reduction was accompanied. I know that in 1852 those efforts were again renewed, and that they only terminated with the removal of the Government from office by whom they were being made. I am ready, therefore, to go with the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Byng) in giving credit to the present Government for their desire to increase our commercial intercourse with France, but I cannot concur with him in the admiration which he feels for the bargain they have made for us. I own I was much surprised the other night to hear the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. B. Osborne) say, that in this Treaty there was no bargain whatever, and that if he thought there was a bargain he would not support the Treaty. I should be sorry if the hon. Member were to withdraw his support from the Treaty, but I must ask him this question, if there is no bargain, what is the use or object of the Treaty at all? What is the meaning of the engagements on the part of Her Majesty and of the correlative engagements on the part of the Emperor of the French, if there is no bargain? What is the meaning of the instruction given to the negotiators, that provided they could obtain certain concessions they might consent to the reduction of certain duties, if there is no bargain? And, again, if there is no bargain, what is the meaning of that Article which says that the Treaty shall not be valid until the House of Commons has sanctioned what is virtually the price we are paying for the Treaty? My objection to the Treaty is, not that it is a bargain, but that it is a very bad bargain for us. I am aware there are certain branches of trade which have persuaded themselves and which endeavour to persuade others that they constitute the whole trade of the country. It does seem that, under some impression of this kind on the part of the negotiators, arrangements are made in the Treaty which are satisfactory to those particular branches of trade; but that large and important branches of the trading industry of this country are entirely overlooked, or their interests neglected in this Treaty, is capable of very easy proof. We had expected to hear to-night from the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) the grounds on which he was prepared to propose an Amendment to the Address; but as the hon. Member has deferred his Motion to a future day, I may be allowed, perhaps, to mention one fact which bears on the subject of it, and which only the other day came within my own knowledge. I was shown the quotations of shipping freights now current at the Mauritius, where both English and French ships are putting on board the produce of the island. The English ships are loaded to discharge at English ports, and the freights they are obtaining vary from 10s. to 20s. a ton. Loading side by side with these English ships are some French ships, and the latter are loading to discharge at French ports, but with liberty, if so ordered, to discharge in English ports. The French ships have consequently the advantage of a double market, and are obtaining a freight of 45s. a ton, or 150 per cent higher than the highest freight given for English ships. Now, observe what will occur when this Treaty comes into operation. France is going to increase largely the importation of cotton. The desire of the owner in America of a cargo of cotton probably would be that the ship in which the cotton was put should, on coming to Europe, call for orders at Cork, and then, according to the state of the market, should unload either at Liverpool or at the port of Havre. If the cotton was on board a French ship, that could be done, but not so (except at an increase of charge) if it was on board an English ship; and the consequence would be that the whole of the carrying trade, as far as cotton was concerned, would be thrown into the hands of the French shipowners. Now, I desire to state precisely the amount of blame I attribute to the Government on this point. I know what their excuse is. They say that this is not a treaty of navigation, but of commerce. Be it so; but if it be a treaty of commerce, and not of navigation, how comes it that there is inserted in it an article which is an article of navigation, and not of commerce? If the negotiators had a right to insert that article in a treaty of commerce, had they not also a right to ask for and urge a reduction or abolition of these differential duties? Then comes the further question. Did they ask and press for the abolition? They might have asked for it and been refused, and then there would be no help for it; but, at all events, the shipping interest would have had the satisfaction of reflecting that their interests had not been overlooked. But what I complain of is that no suggestion was made to the negotiators to keep those interests in view. Of themselves, too, they appear to have made no effort to obtain an alteration of the existing system in this respect, and without remonstrance or struggle the French shipping have obtained for the next ten years an indirect and passive assent in the English Treaty to these obnoxious and exclusive privileges. I now come to the way in which a very important manufacture of the country—all important to Ireland—is dealt with in this Treaty—I refer to the linen manufacture. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he introduced this Treaty, described with great accuracy the importance of this manufacture, and mentioned how, when the French import duties were low, the linen manufacture rapidly increased in this country, but received an immediate check when the French duties increased. Considering the importance of the manufacture, I think we might have expected to have found some proof that its importance was appreciated and its interests attended to during the time of the negotiation of the Treaty. The negotiation with respect to the linen duties appears to me most singular. I find in the first despatch on the subject of the Treaty from our Ambassador in Paris to the Foreign Secretary, special mention made of the linen duties. Earl Cowley wrote to this effect:—A proposal has been made to establish a treaty of commerce. That proposal is favourably entertained by the French Government; and I desire to know whether the English Government will authorize the gentleman who has made the proposal here to carry it out. What was then proposed was this. Earl Cowley said that Count Walewski explained that British manufactures generally were to be admitted into France at a maximum duty of 30 per cent, but that the duties on linen and articles of that kind were to be reduced from 30 to 15 per cent ad valorem. That was not a mere proposal of the English Government, but it was one entertained by the French Government; yet afterwards this proposition drops out of sight, and the Treaty appears with a maximum duty on linen manufactures, not of 15 per cent, but of 30 per cent; and I do not find that it ever occurred to the Government to call attention in any of their despatches to this change, and to demand an explanation. Now, I ask whether the plenipotentiaries who negotiated the Treaty were really aware what the present duties on linen manufactures going into France are, and what is the amount of duty they can bear with any hope of an extension of trade. The present duties are not ad valorem, but after an inquiry I find that the duties on linen and linen yarn imported into France may, on being commuted into ad valorem duties, be stated thus—with respect to the medium and fine kinds of linen, which constitute the principal manufacture of Ireland, the average of the duties would come to something like 30 per cent; but, taking the fine qualities alone, which are really the only qualities exported to any considerable extent to France, the duty would be about 20 per cent. The case with respect to linen yarns is remarkable, there being at present a large export from the north of Ireland to Cambray and other places in France. I find that the duties payable upon the fine yarns are not only not 30 per cent, but 15, and 10, and 5, and even so low as 4, 3, and 2 per cent. It has been said by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) that, even with a maximum duty of 30 per cent, a linen trade might be done with France which would supplant the French manufacture. In answer to that I may observe that those engaged in the linen manufacture in Ireland have considered this subject, and a meeting representing the linen manufacturers of the whole of the north of Ireland have stated their view with respect to this maximum duty of 30 per cent. The manufacturers in question state that they consider the duty of 30 per cent, as proposed by the French Government, or even a duty of 25 per cent, totally prohibitory as regards the great bulk of linen yarn, and linens, and that even with a duty of 10 per cent the French manufacturers, with an unlimited supply of machinery and coal, could successfully meet British competition. They state another fact worthy of observation. They say that with respect to the ordinary kinds of linen manufacture, you may take two-thirds of the price as representing the cost of the raw material, and one-third as representing the labour, charges, and capital employed in making the article. As regards the raw material, they say that France can supply herself as cheaply and as well as, or more cheaply and better, than this country; therefore the ground of competition is narrowed to the remaining one-third of the price, which represents the cost of manufacture. Consequently they contend that if a duty of 30 per cent be imposed it is virtually a duty to that amount upon one-third of the value of the article, and therefore a duty of exactly 90 per cent on the total value. A duty of 10 per cent would thus prove a protection for the French manufacture equal to 30 per cent. I ask if those who negotiated this Treaty really turned their attention to what the circumstances of the case were with regard to the linen manufactures? I ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board of Trade was consulted on this subject? The Board of Trade is the repository of a great deal of information on this head of the industry of the country, because in 1840-41 that department was engaged in the arrangements then proposed for a reduction of the French duties on the import of linen. In 1840, the French Government, and even the French manufacturers themselves, said they would be satisfied with an import duty of 10 per cent on linen, provided England would allow the free exportation of machinery into France. Now, we know that though machinery was not at that time allowed to be exported free from this country, all restrictions on its exportation have been since taken away. Moreover, the Board of Trade has since 1840 been in constant communication with the linen manufacturers, who have urged them to remonstrate with the French Government and to endeavour on account of the remission of the duties on machinery to obtain a reduction of the duty on Irish linen to the same amount as that on Belgium linen—12 per cent. Then, how is it that the Board of Trade did not, through the proper Minister of the Crown, give expression to the negotiators of the assurances of the linen trade that a maximum duty of 30 per cent would be nugatory and useless. I think we find in the circumstances of the negotiation an explanation of this difficulty. The first communication that was made by the Government respecting the Treaty was, I find, on the 17th of January, and the whole Treaty was concluded at Paris on the 23rd of January. So that there was really no time for the Board of Trade to interpose or be consulted by the Government on the subject. It is not surprising, therefore, that there should be a feeling on the part of the linen trade that their interests have been very much overlooked in the negotiations. They feel it to be a mockery to tell them that you have secured this great boon to the linen manufacturers, that, whereas they can now send their manufactures into France at a duty of or under 30 per cent, linens will not be charged more than 30 per cent, and this mockery is felt to be all the more cruel when they find the Foreign Secretary telling them that “the intention of the Emperor of the French is to introduce a moderate rate of protective duty, and that he is going to change the prohibitory system into one of practically open trade.” Surely no one will say that a duty which I have calculated to be equivalent to 90 per cent is “a moderate protective duty,” and that it gives us practically an open trade in linens. But we have been told by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this Treaty merely stipulates for a maximum duty of 30 per cent, and that he has hopes the French Government will carry out a further reduction. I am not sure whether I understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer correctly or not, but I think he went so far as to say there were hopes that a return would be made by France to the moderate duty that existed some years ago on linens. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER indicated assent.] I am glad to hear that there is a prospect of this, and I need hardly say that I will rejoice at it exceedingly when it is accomplished; but I must state candidly the view which I take of the matter. If it be the case that the Government of France say they are prepared to reduce the duties on linen manufactures to the old state of things why was it not put into the Treaty? If they say they are prepared to do it now, surely they must have been equally prepared three or four weeks ago. If this was their temper and tone, surely a slight remonstrance or request on the part of our Government would have procured the reduction, and relieved us from trusting to indefinite assurances that may never be realized. But I will state why I must hesitate before I can feel at all sanguine as to the realization of this prospect. In the first place, I cannot account for the way in which the 15 per cent originally proposed was changed to 30 per cent, and that having been done, I very much doubt whether we shall have any reduction of the 30 per cent now. In the next place, I have seen in the French papers a very singular memorial from a body of French linen manufacturers to the Minister of Commerce, in which they state that this duty of 30 per cent is the very least which would be a sufficient protection, and they beg him to be firm and not go below it; and that, as they understand there is going to be a commutation of duties by a subsequent convention, they beg him to over-reach, if possible, (for it comes nearly to that) the English Government, and by means of the commutation make the duty, if possible, higher than 30 per cent. I quote from memory, but that is the substance of the proposal they make. The reply of the Minister of Commerce was in general terms, but it was anything but indicative of that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has led us to expect. He said to them, in effect, "You may be perfectly tranquil; you may rest quiet, assured that France will always take care of her manufactures, and you may rely upon it that you shall have full and ample protection." That does not, in my opinion, look like a further reduction of the duties on linen. But the interests of the linen trade have been still further neglected. There is no doubt that France is the greatest consumer of linen of any country in the world; but the next greatest consumer is Spain. There is no part of the world in which a Spanish settlement or colony is made in which a demand does not spring up immediately for linen manufactures. In this Treaty you have favoured France with a reduction of the duty on wines, and you give the same favour to Spain. It may have been that Spain would have refused to give you any return for the advantages conferred upon her; but what I want to know is, how you explain the fact that you never made any application to the Government of Spain on the subject—that you never proposed to Spain to give you, in return for the boon you were prepared to offer her, a reduction of the duties on linen. I say this on the authority of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, for he told us that the Government had not thought it their duty to make any communication whatever to the Spanish Government on the subject of a relaxation of duties. We are now told that the Government is quite willing to enter into negotiations with Spain, but the time for negotiation with Spain is past, for she has now got the boon which a few weeks ago would have seemed to her the highest you could offer. I do not say that if Spain had refused, you were on that account bound to refuse negotiations with France; but, at all events, it was worth trying whether she would consent to a reduction of her duties or not. This leads me to show that you have by this Treaty placed a great difficulty in the way of future negotiation with the Spanish Government. By your arrangement with regard to the duty on wine, you have virtually established a differential duty against Spain. You have made one Resolution specially applicable to wines of a certain low strength, and the effect will be that your reduced duties will be more favourable to France than to Spain. I find that the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, in one of his despatches, takes credit for the way in which the duties are thus arranged. In his despatch to Earl Cowley, of the 17th of January, the noble Lord says—

"A scale thus adjusted would, it is hardly needful to observe, be eminently favourable to the introduction of wine from France, as the lower wines from that country would enter at the duty of 1s."

The noble Lord, therefore, does not deny that a differential duty is thus virtually imposed in favour of France; on the contrary, he rather takes credit for it. I say, then, that this creates a certain difficulty in negotiating with Spain on the subject, and it forms one of my grounds of complaint against the Government as to the manner in which this Treaty is framed. But a still more singular instance is supplied by the reduced duty on spirits. The noble Lord proposed, in the first instance, a duty of 10s. upon French spirits, and this was afterwards reduced to 8s. 2d. What were the grounds upon which the noble

Lord said that 10s. would be a proper duty? He began by stating in his instructions to the negotiators of the Treaty that the object of the Government was to make "an equitable adjustment of burdens as between commodities which more or less compete with one another in the general market;" and said that in the opinion of the Government 10s. per gallon was the lowest price to which "for any British purpose" they could propose to reduce the duty upon French brandy. But then he added—

"If, nevertheless, you should find that by making a concession beyond even what I have named you can obtain from the Government of the Emperor satisfactory arrangements for an early reduction of duty upon some important commodities, you are authorized to engage to reduce the duty on brandy from 10s. to 8s. 2d. per gallon."

Well, this is one of the most singular transactions in negotiation that I ever heard of. We have heard of robbing one interest in order to pay another, but I never before saw so unblushing an instance of such a robbery. "I admit," says the noble Lord in effect, "that the manufacturer of British spirits as against French brandy is entitled to a duty of 10s. For any British purpose that is a proper duty, but if you can obtain some concession—not in favour of that, but of any other trade—you are authorized to sacrifice the British manufacturer, and reduce the duty, which ought to be 10s., to 8s. 2d." Accordingly, without any further communication on the subject, the British negotiators did reduce the duty, and the question I have now to ask is, what was the "early reduction of duty upon some important commodities" which they got in return before they were authorized to lower the rates on French brandy? I have looked through the Treaty, and there is not a single article the early reduction of the duty on which is insured, except coal. But in his letter of instructions the Foreign Secretary told our Plenipotentiaries at Paris that he did not care a straw about coal, for he says—

"An allusion is, indeed, made by Count Walewski to British coal; but such is the market for that commodity, both in this country and abroad, that no public interest would be excited upon the question, whether the duty charged on it in France is to be high or low, or whether the remission is to be immediate or postponed."

That, therefore, was not the concession in return for which the Plenipotentiaries were authorized further to reduce the duty on French brandy. What concession, then, did the Government get? As far as I can ascertain, we have nothing to show in return. Let me remark here, that the observations made in this House respecting the article of beer require a further answer than they have yet received from the Government. When France was stipulating for the introduction of her wines, why was not some correlative advantage sought for in the admission of our national beverage into France? The Government reply, "We still hope by negotiations to induce the French Ministry to admit our beer on easier terms." Well, I must say that I never knew a case so replete with hope. This is the answer we receive on every occasion. But has any change come over the mind of the French Government since the Treaty was concluded, upon which such a hope can be founded? I want to know whether the question was asked while the Treaty was being negotiated, and whether you then met with a refusal. For want of success the Government is not to be blamed; but I do blame them if I find that they have not asked for concessions which they ought to have demanded from France. Now, look at the question of the raw material, upon which the English manufacturers in part depend for their supplies, and at the way in which this is dealt with by the Treaty. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, if I may humbly say so, laid down a most admirable principle at the commencement of his despatch—namely, that the task which the Government thought devolved upon them was to make "an equitable adjustment of burdens as between commodities which more or less directly compete with one another in the general market." Now, there is no burden with which a trade or manufacture can be weighted comparable to the burden imposed by difficulties in obtaining supplies of the raw material. I will take three instances; and, first, that of silk. The hon. Member for Shrewsbury (Mr. Slaney), in describing the picturesque zones into which France is divided, spoke of that which yields the mulberry tree on the leaves of which the silkworms feed. Now, the Treaty, as we know, provides for the import of manufactured silk into England from France free of duty. The Government knew that we had an important silk manufacture in England which depends upon France for a certain amount of raw material, on which a heavy export duty is levied. Again, I ask, was any attempt made to reduce the export duty on that raw material? If there was, no trace of it appears in the papers now before the House. No instructions seem to have been given to the plenipotentiaries, and I do not find in the communications between them and the Home Government a single word which refers to this subject. Another raw material upon which I will say a few words, is cork, upon which an interesting conversation occurred in Committee. I do not mean to say that we are dependent upon France for cork; but at the time we were negotiating a Treaty, one result of which would be to admit manufactured corks free of duty, it became advisable that the Government should see from what country the raw material was to be supplied. That country, as they were aware, was Spain. Were the Spanish Government asked whether they were willing, in return for the reduction of the wine duties, to relax their export duties on cork? Lastly, there is the article of rags. I assume that at the time of negotiating the Treaty the Government had determined to take off both the import and the excise duty on paper. It is true that since the discussion of the Treaty began we have been told that the French Government has intimated its intention to permit the export of rags. I am glad to hear it; but the question is, what was the amount of consideration bestowed upon this subject in the Treaty? If France is willing now to remove the prohibition upon the export of rags, she must have been perfectly willing at the time the Treaty was negotiated; and why was not a clause inserted securing us a free export of rags as a matter of right, instead of leaving it as a matter of future hope and indulgence? The French Government deal with us very differently. They, for example, are anxious to have coal in abundance. Do they trust to assurances from the Government here that no difficulty will be thrown in the way of the export of coal? By no means. They ask for a distinct undertaking that England will not prohibit the export of coal during the whole period of the Treaty. I think it might have occurred to our plenipotentiaries, "Here is France asking us not to prohibit the export of an important product. May we not in return ask her to allow the free export of raw materials which are wanted in England?" That leads me to consider the 11th Article of the Treaty. Up to the present moment we have not had from the Government any explanation of their views respecting the effect or the object of this Article. I know that my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General favoured us one night with a view upon the law of the question; but I do not hope to hear the Government endorse that view, because in "another place" those who represent the Government pronounced an opinion exactly opposite to his, and I conclude that my hon. and learned Friend was only treating us on that occasion with one of those interesting disquisitions in which no one is more happy than himself. Setting aside law and technicality, however, let us look at the substance of the case. I do not know whether the Government are of opinion that the 11th Article engages not to prohibit the export of coal to France alone, or generally; but it is quite immaterial for my purpose which meaning they attach to the Article, because we know that in practice you cannot prohibit the export of coal with success unless you prohibit the export of it totally. Therefore, if we forego the right of prohibiting the exportation of coal to France, we practically forego the right of prohibiting its export to any country. Explain the Article whichever way you like, it amounts to a surrender of a power now possessed by somebody to prohibit exportation of coal. I now ask, what is the power now possessed to prohibit the exportation of coal? I say the Sovereign of this country has no commercial power to prohibit exportation of coal, but the Sovereign has a power reposed in her by Parliament, as a great political trust, to prohibit the exportation of coal on the ground that it is or may become a material suited for the purposes of warfare. If that be the political power possessed by the Sovereign, I want to know what right had Plenipotentiaries negotiating a Treaty of Commerce to agree to a surrender of a political power which had no relevancy to commerce? I want further to know this—in the papers laid before the House there is not one particle of correspondence between the Plenipotentiaries and Her Majesty's Government as to this 11th Article. Whether it was inserted in Paris by the Plenipotentiaries, or whether it was communicated to them from this country, does not appear; but the conclusion must be that it was inserted in Paris. I do not find that it occurred to Her Majesty's Government to ask what was the object of that Article, whether for political or commercial purposes; or whether it was an article that was much insisted upon by the French Plenipotentiaries, but the power seems to have been passed away in silence.

The aspect of this subject has changed during the discussion. When the Treaty was first laid before us we thought that this was an Article to which much importance was attached by the French Government; but we have been since assured by Her Majesty's Government that in fact the French Government does not attach importance to it, and is quite willing to concede or to modify the Article; but that, on the other hand, Her Majesty's Government has informed the French Government that they do not desire any alteration. I do not wish to pre-occupy the ground of the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), who intends to propose an addition to the Address upon this point, but I submit to the House that this has become a simple domestic question. It is a domestic question between us and Her Majesty's Government, the French Government being aside, they being willing to modify the Article, but Her Majesty's Ministers being unwilling to do so. It is, then, for Her Majesty's Government to show why England, against the wish of France, insists upon inserting in a French Treaty a clause, which surrenders a high political power entrusted, under an Act of Parliament, to the Sovereign of these realms, simply to please Her Majesty's Ministers. I hope the House will express its opinion that this Article ought not to be inserted in the Treaty; but I do protest, for the sake of precedent and order, against the notion that seems to be entertained by the Government, that a power of this kind, which is reposed in the Sovereign by Act of Parliament, can be surrendered without the consent of Parliament, which conferred it; and I likewise protest against the idea that also seems to be entertained, that, if the sanction of Parliament to such surrender be necessary, that such sanction can be obtained in any other way than by an Act of Parliament. I say Parliament cannot give its sanction except by means of an Act of Parliament; and therefore, if I am right in that, I shall desire to know whether the legal advisers of the Government, as a body of legal advisers, will commit themselves to the opinion, that the power now possessed by Her Majesty to prohibit the exportation of coal is a power that she can surrender, or be advised to surrender, without the assent of Parliament, which created the power. I have now gone through the points of the Treaty upon which I desired to comment. I venture to submit that, in those respects I have mentioned, this Treaty, when we are considering the amount of credit to be given to those who framed it, is a one-sided, imperfect, and halting Treaty. I have been much struck by an observation made by Mr. Pitt when he entered into the Treaty with France which we have heard mentioned so often. Mr. Pitt speaking in February said, with natural pride, "Here is my Treaty, which was published in September, which has been in every one's hands since then, and canvassed throughout the length and breadth of the land, and yet there has never been a single remonstrance addressed to the Government or to Parliament on the part of any trade in the kingdom against the provisions of the Treaty." Can Her Majesty's Government say the same for this Treaty? Has the shipping interest made no remonstrance? Has the linen trade, the spirit trade, the brewers, the silk trade, the cork trade, the paper trade—have they made no remonstrances? I must say, although I hear an hon. Member opposite (Mr. W. Ewart) speak of the glory that would enure to those who negotiated this Treaty, I doubt whether the same lustre will attend the negotiators of this Treaty as attended that of Mr. Pitt. But I do not think the Treaty of Mr. Pitt is exactly a parallel. A better analogy, it seems to me, can be found in those heroic legends of which the right hon. Gentleman opposite is so distinguished an illustrator. This is the Treaty of Glaucus and Diomed. It is "gold for brass—the value of a hundred oxen for the value of ten." I think it will go down to posterity described as a Treaty open to that observation much more than as a treaty to be placed side by side with that of Mr. Pitt. I may be asked, if these are the views I entertain as to the details of the Treaty, why I do not oppose the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex. I answer at once, I think that, halting and imperfect and one-sided as this Treaty is, much greater injury and risk would be incurred by defeating or resisting it than by giving it effect; and I for one am not prepared to take the responsibility of impeding the execution of the Treaty. But I must be permitted to express a hope that never again shall we have to consider a treaty under circumstances similar to the present. There is not merely a responsibility attaching to those who would impede or thwart the Treaty; there is also a responsibility attaching to those who enter into a treaty of this kind, requiring, as to some of its terms, the assent of the House of Commons, and who then propose the Treaty for the consideration of the House in such a way that there can be no free or unbiassed discussion of those terms. I ask, have we been or are we in a position to discuss the terms of this Treaty, to criticise them, or to remodel them fairly or freely as such terms ought to be discussed? What has been the argument of the Government? When any hon. Member made objection to any part of this Treaty, the answer was, "If you touch that clause of the Treaty, you defeat the Treaty entirely; we cannot answer for the consequences if you interfere with any provision that may seem to you to be objectionable. It may eventually result in destroying the Treaty." And not only has Her Majesty's Government held that language, but I regret to say that something even stronger has been put forth in another quarter. No sooner was the attention of the House of Commons called to the Treaty, and no sooner had some suggestions been made by various hon. Members as to the exportation of coal, than we saw published in the newspapers a letter from a gentleman of great eminence, who is supposed to have been if not a plenipotentiary to make the Treaty, at least one of the negotiators of it. In that letter, which was evidently written for publication, M. Chevallier says, speaking of the 11th Article, "its rejection would be an unfriendly act and taken as such in France, and a cry would be raised of 'Perfidious Albion!'" and that would be the case even if the Article were to be struck out with the consent of the French Government." That is language not very agreeable for the House of Commons to hear at a time when it is supposed to be engaged in calm deliberation upon the Articles of the Treaty. I recollect an observation that was made about two years ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer under somewhat analogous circumstances. We were then discussing a measure of law which excited very great interest in a foreign country, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer then said, "It is hard for this country to be called upon to discuss questions connected with the amendment of our own laws under menace and terror of a foreign Power." But it is not merely that we have been called upon to discuss the terms of this Treaty under the pressure I have described, but we have been called upon to discuss all the financial arrangements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer under exactly the same pressure. A Motion was made in this House by my hon. Friend the Member for Essex (Mr. Du Cane) going the whole length of the financial propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. What were the arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in opposition to that Motion? He said, "If you carry this Motion you do that which is incompatible with the Treaty." I admitted the force of the argument so much that I did not feel justified in giving my vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Essex, although I approved much that was contained in it; but I felt that there was a risk in adopting the Motion which I should not like to incur. But I say that, whereas in former days the Budget was, of all measures, one which was essentially domestic in its character, and one which this House might discuss without any risk of interference from any Foreign Power, we have this year literally been discussing the Budget with this Treaty round our necks. I will say, in conclusion, that I am most anxious to augur everything that is favourable from passing this Treaty; I am willing to hope that all that its warmest admirers expect to result from it will be realized; but I do say, if those advantages do not result from it—if it should turn out that the benefits sought to be derived from it are insubstantial and illusory—that the price we are paying for drawing closer the bonds of amity between France and England should not have the effect of drawing closer those bonds—if it should prove in the result that this Treaty, concluded almost as rapidly as the treaty of Villafranca, is as speedily forgotten—if it should turn out that the financial projects of the Government, of which this Treaty has been the cover and the strength, should leave behind a regret for the revenue we have lost, and a feeling of irksomeness at the imposts we have to bear, it will be then remembered, and remembered to the prejudice of its authors, that this measure was presented to the House of Commons in a form and under circumstances which precluded to all free and unrestrained discussion.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: Sir, I am glad to hear from the hon. and learned Gentleman that, satisfied with criticising the Treaty, he intends to vote in favour of the Address which has been moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesex. He says he will throw no impediment in the way of this Treaty; he is a friend to commercial treaties ; he does not object to a bargain in the abstract ; he only objects to a bargain which is not so good as it might have been. I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman there are many things in reference to our commercial relations with France beyond this Treaty which it would be very desirable to obtain ; but, at the same time, I think what we have obtained is good in itself, is worth receiving, and will confer great benefits on the people both of England and France. The hon. and learned Gentleman is friendly to commercial treaties as a rule. I do not quite go that length myself, but I will not reject an opportunity of encouraging our commercial intercourse with France simply because the attainment of that object is sought through the medium of a commercial treaty. The hon. and learned Gentleman is friendly to commercial treaties, but I cannot help thinking he would never be successful in negotiating such a treaty with any foreign country if he proceeded in the way he thinks Her Majesty's Government ought to have proceeded with reference to the one now under consideration. The hon. and learned Gentleman would have had us enter in negotiating the Treaty into minute adjustments of every particular duty ; he thinks, for instance, we should have gone into all the different classes of yarn and linen, attaching to each the particular duty to be charged on its import into France, before any treaty was agreed to. I think if any person were to attempt to negotiate a commercial treaty on the principle of settling such minute adjustments of duty in every instance, he would probably fail altogether. If the hon. and learned Gentleman had acted as the negotiator of the Treaty now before the House, I do not think he would by this time have got through the linen duty. He says the Board of Trade made no representations on the subject of the linen manufacture ; that it could not have considered the importance of that manufacture, or it would have used its influence to obtain a better arrangement in respect to that important article with the French Government. I had the honour, not long ago, of receiving a deputation from Belfast in reference to the linen trade, which was introduced by the hon. and learned Gentleman ; and what did those gentlemen say ? They said, if the French Government would only put them on the same footing as the Belgians they would be satisfied. I say they will be put on the same footing as the Belgians from June 1861. The treaty obligations existing between France and Belgium prevent the arrangement taking effect earlier than that time ; but the first moment it can take effect the linen manufacturers of Belfast are to have an arrangement which they state will be satisfactory to them. It is not to be assumed that because the maximum of duty is mentioned in the Treaty, every duty now below that maximum is to be raised to the maximum. In the supplementary arrangements contemplated the duties below 30 per cent will not be raised, but those above that amount will be reduced. It is unfair to tell the linen manufacturers of Ireland that, with respect to some classes of linen now paying 2½ per cent on being imported into France, the duty may be actually raised to 30 per cent. I think I may say nothing of that kind will take place ; I am sure that all the correspondence in reference to future arrangements breathes an entirely different spirit. With regard to coal, that being a legal question, I do not profess to offer any opinion upon it. I think it had better be left to be discussed by itself on the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman). But I have been told that anything that could be done in England, before this Treaty, according to international law, in reference to prohibiting the export of coal, may still be done ; and that no other surrender has been made except the surrender of the right to prohibit the export of coal in a commercial sense. On the question of spirits the hon. and learned Gentleman quoted a passage in the correspondence between my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and Earl Cowley, in which it is stated that 10s. on foreign spirits would be the most desirable duty for the English revenue ; but that the negotiators might agree to 8s. 2d. if some early reduction could be obtained on some article to be introduced into France. And then, asks the hon. and learned Gentleman, what early reduction did we obtain ? I can tell him that one of the early reductions obtained was that on this very article of linen. The reduction of the duties on British linen going into France was brought nearer by a considerable period—namely, to June 1861, and it was one of the early reductions obtained by the concession in regard to spirits.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, in the first letter from Earl Cowley to the noble Lord

[First Night.]

(Lord John Russell) the 1st of July, 1861, was stated as the date.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: I have not the despatch by me at this moment, but I think I am correct; at all events the reduction of the import duty on linens going into France would have taken effect at a more distant period but for the concessions made with regard to the duty on spirits. Again, iron and machinery were also to be admitted at an earlier period in consequence of that concession. The hon. and learned Gentleman used the expression that this agreement for a smaller import duty on French spirits was a sacrifice of English manufacturers of spirits for some political object. The hon. and learned Gentleman, I am sure, has unintentionally misrepresented the case, because it was always intended and always understood by the French Government that a sufficient difference should be maintained between the duty on foreign spirits and that on British manufactured spirits to cover the disadvantage under which the British manufacturer was placed by being under Excise survey. No intention, therefore, could exist of sacrificing his interest. No doubt, he was to lose a protective duty, but under no conceivable circumstances was he to be put on any terms of inequality with the French manufacturer. With regard to the question of wine, the hon. and learned Gentleman has given utterance to substantially the same sentiments which were expressed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir S. Northcote). He seemed to think this Treaty placed a differential duty on wines of Spain, and gave those of France an advantage, and that we had placed ourselves in a very difficult position, if we were hereafter inclined to propose a commercial treaty for the admission of British manufactures into the former country. It must be remembered that this arrangement is one which does not in the least arise out of the Treaty, but is made solely in reference to our own laws relating to spirits; and, as I am informed, it will be found much easier to get into consumption a quantity of spirits through the importation of Spanish wines at the duties proposed by the Treaty, than to attempt the same operation through the importation of French wines. Therefore, in that sense, with a view to the consumption of alcohol, you are to some extent favouring Spain at the expense of France. I cannot see any ground of complaint whatever in this arrangement with regard to wines. I think the case is not a French question merely, because the greater portion of the German wines, I am informed, will have the advantage of this lower rate of duty, as containing less than 18 degrees of alcohol. The hon. and learned Gentleman has really gone into so many minute details that it is extremely difficult to follow him; but on the question of shipping I will take leave to make a few observations. Those who have sent memorials to the Board of Trade on the subject of the third Article and of the differential duty have all, without exception, suggested that, unless something could be done for the shipping interest, this Treaty ought to be rejected altogether. My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), and the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir H. Cairns) have not taken that view of the question; and the petitioners seem to be under a misapprehension on the subject of the Treaty. I have read their memorials, and I find an idea prevailing that in some way or other British shipping will be placed in a worse position than before, and that the Treaty will give some kind of sanction for a period of ten years to restrictions which might otherwise have been removed. I contend that this Treaty does nothing of the kind, but that, so far as it affects the British shipping, it will confer advantages upon it. In the trade between England and France ships of both nations are on a footing of perfect equality: by increasing that trade British ships must be benefited. What is the state of the case at present? Of the French direct trade with the United Kingdom, sixty-nine per cent is carried under the British flag; twenty-eight per cent is carried under the French flag; and three per cent under the flags of other nations. This is the trade to which the Treaty relates, and to no other, and it is this trade which may be expected so largely to increase by the mutual interchange of products and manufactures. It is clear that if British ships can enjoy sixty-nine per cent of the carrying trade there is nothing in any French regulation which prevents them from deriving full advantage from it, and any increase of that traffic arising from the Treaty must obviously confer an important advantage on British shipping. But, further, I find that the trade between England and France forms something between one-third and a half of the whole foreign trade of that country; of this the English vessels enjoy seventy per cent, or, in other words, between one-third and one-quarter of the whole foreign trade of France. To raise the general question of differential duties bearing on the indirect trade with France is to enter into something quite apart from this Treaty. The hon. and learned Gentleman, I think, has talked of imports from America into France. No doubt, it would be very desirable if British ships could carry goods from the United States to France on the same terms as American vessels; but this Treaty has nothing to do with creating facilities of that kind—it is simply to facilitate the carrying of British produce into France. The same argument applies with regard to the Mauritius; I respectfully submit that when you introduce these topics into a discussion on an Address on this particular Treaty you are really travelling from the question before the House. But, as this subject has been mentioned, let me see the extent of this great grievance. I should be glad if the navigation laws of all countries were entirely abolished. In this country we have removed all restrictions; and there are very few nations, with the exception of France, Spain, Portugal, and to some extent America, which have not reciprocated our liberality, and given us freedom of navigation. It is said that at the Mauritius we are kept out of something very well worth having by these differential duties. I presume that a certain quantity of sugars are consigned to this country, which for the most part find their way in English bottoms, which I presume cannot be regarded as disadvantageous to British shipping. But I have a return before me showing the extent of the colonial trade of France; and let us see how much we should acquire if every French ship were prevented from carrying produce from any of our Colonies to France—a consummation that the hon. and learned Gentleman, I think, will scarcely hope for. I find that in 1858 the trade between France and the British Colonies in Asia, Africa, and America, amounted to 119,216 tons of shipping in the year. The trade of Great Britain with foreign countries, under all flags, was 14,438,000 tons; and between the United Kingdom and her Colonies was 4,306,426 tons. So that all you would gain would be admission to a trade of 119,216 tons of shipping in addition to the trade of 18,000,000 into which you now enter. I venture to say if British shipowners had all this trade, of which they say they are now deprived, they would feel it to be an addition of comparatively trifling importance. I do not say it is not worth having; but I think more importance is attached to these restrictions than they deserve. The whole French trade with the British possessions in India and the Mauritius is only 81,000 tons. It really appears to me you are attaching great importance to small matters, and, by continually pleading small restrictions, are attempting to raise a prejudice against a great and comprehensive measure of commercial freedom, with which I am quite certain the country and the constituents of the hon. and learned Gentleman are satisfied. There is one remarkable fact with regard to English and French shipping which I cannot help mentioning. In the year 1858, of the French ships in the ports of France engaged in the foreign carrying trade—I do not speak of the coasting trade—British vessels in those ports formed two-thirds of that tonnage:—that is, for every nine French ships in the ports of France engaged in the foreign trade there were six British engaged in the same trade. All these ships must have obtained employment, notwithstanding the restrictions that remain. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) was anxious to propose his Resolution as an Amendment to the Address. I was one of those who endeavoured to dissuade the hon. Gentleman from doing so. I imagine he did not attach much importance to the advice, because, being a Member of the Government, he thought I was not quite to be believed on such a subject. He rather listened to me with a degree of distrust I have not been accustomed to see. But I really advised the hon. Gentleman to take the course I should have thought best had I been in his position. When the noble Lord at the head of the Government offered him an opportunity of bringing forward his Resolution as a substantive Motion, and told him he would support it, I could not conceive the hon. Gentleman would have a moment's hesitation; and I am quite convinced he has now taken the most judicious course for the promotion of the cause he has so ably advocated. I have no doubt when he brings forward his Resolution again—I do not say in the exact words in which it now stands—that it will obtain the general support of the House. The hon. and learned Member for Belfast concluded his speech with some observations about the French export duty on rags. He said the negotiators of this Treaty had paid no attention to the question of export duties levied by foreign countries on the raw materials of manufactures. I dare say they did not; I am not aware it has been the custom to enter into such considerations when dealing with the import duties of this country. I venture to say there is scarcely a single article or manufactured article the duty on which you have reduced or repealed that does not contain some ingredient that is liable to some restriction as to its export from other countries. What would be said if any one objected to the importation of corn and grain from France because the French Government prohibits the exportation of guano? You repealed the duty on leather, though the French Government puts a duty on the exportation of raw hides. If you were to act on the principle of repealing Customs' duties only with regard to foreign export duties, you would be in a difficulty every time you dealt with a manufactured article. I do not think the argument has any force; I believe it will be found impolitic to make your import duties depend either on the existence or the removal of export duties on raw materials in other countries. No doubt it is most desirable that all these export duties should be removed by foreign countries, and I was extremely glad to hear the noble Lord announce to the House that the French Government intended to remove the prohibition now existing on the exportation of rags from France. But the negotiators of this Commercial Treaty would have been to blame if they had gone into the consideration of such export duties in reference to every article with which they were going to deal. In fact, we must look to the general principle of these measures; the negotiators were about to deal with a great measure of principle, much of the details of which has yet to be completed. Had they allowed themselves to travel into considerations beyond the broad principles of the Treaty, they would have failed altogether, and the House would not have had the Treaty before it for discussion. I hope the House will give its unanimous vote in support of the Address the hon. Member for Middlesex has submitted to us. I cannot conceive that the noble Lord who has moved the Resolution relating to Savoy will obtain any support. I cannot believe that he will go to a division. Why we should refuse to increase our commercial intercourse with France because some territorial question is under discussion I cannot understand. There is nothing in the words of the Address to which any hon. Member can have any serious objection. I can scarcely conceive even the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) objecting to it. Even if the Treaty be as bad as he says it is, at any rate our intention is good. The very existence of the Treaty is a proof of a desire on the part of the Crown to promote the welfare and happiness of the people. No one will deny that such a treaty must promote a beneficial intercourse between Great Britain and France, and tend to the extension of our trade and manufactures. We all hope and trust that such will be its result. We do not ask you to say it is mathematically demonstrated; we ask the House simply to congratulate the Crown on thus proving its desire to promote the well-being and happiness of the people of this country, and to express a hope that the measures proposed will increase our commercial intercourse with France, to the advantage of both nations.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he sincerely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in hoping that the discussion of the Treaty would not be mixed up with any other topic. The noble Lord the Member for Hastings (Lord H. Vane) had raised the question of the annexation of Savoy to France; but in considering the Treaty they should confine themselves to its relations to the financial and commercial system of the country, and not go into any other subject. He had scrupulously abstained, during the discussion of the Treaty, from throwing any impediment in the way of the changes proposed, but he did not consider himself precluded from freely criticizing the Treaty as presented to the House, and for which the Government asked not only their assent but their applause. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had much disappointed him, as he had expected to hear a more satisfactory answer to some of the points that had been started. The objections the hon. and learned Member for Belfast had made to the Treaty had not been answered at all. He (Sir S. Northcote) would consider for a moment the reasons why a Commercial Treaty with France had been resolved on at all. It had been described as an instrument framed to induce the people of England and France to consent to alterations in their financial systems which, without the Treaty, they would not be willing to adopt. It might be said that if we had not entered into the present Treaty, the Emperor of the French would not have been enabled by any other means to persuade the French Protectionists to accede to the change in the commercial policy of France which he desired to introduce ; but he should, upon the other hand, contend that it would appear as if the English Government had had recourse to a Treaty in order to induce the House of Commons to accept financial arrangements which under other circumstances it would have rejected. Now, looking upon the advantages which the Treaty was likely to confer upon the English people, he was perfectly willing to admit that the throwing open of the trade with France was a step in advance, and made a breach in the prohibitory system which had in that country hitherto prevailed. He could not, however, help thinking that that step might have been taken, and that breach effected, without the necessity of having recourse to the present Treaty for the purpose. He was of that opinion, because he was, as every hon. Member must be, well aware that the Emperor of the French was a consistent advocate of free trade, and that he had endeavoured to obtain the adoption of its principles on more than one occasion. The last move, however, which he had made in that direction had so alarmed the French manufacturers, that they had extorted from him a pledge to proceed no further in the course upon which he had entered until the year 1861. Now, that being so, it was evident that when the year 1861 should have arrived, the Emperor of the French would have been prepared, consistently with what he deemed to be the good of his people, to extend to us concessions, perhaps, still greater than we had succeeded in obtaining from him by means of the bargain which we had just concluded. The argument, therefore, that the Treaty was of great importance because it effected a breach in the prohibitory system of France, did not, in his opinion, possess so much weight as some hon. Gentlemen seemed disposed to attach to it. It was, however, said to be likely to be productive of great advantage to this country in other respects ; but from the justice of that view he must beg leave to dissent. By the third Article, for instance, we stipulated that the rates of duty which were mentioned in the preceding articles were to be independent of the differential duty in favour of French shipping, and it was argued that we need give ourselves no concern about that stipulation, inasmuch as the Treaty applied to direct and not to indirect trade, and as in the direct trade British vessels stood on equal terms with French vessels. But, if that were so, why, he should like to know, had the third Article been introduced into the Treaty at all ? It had not, most assuredly, been inserted in accordance with our request, but at the suggestion of the French Emperor, who, he took it for granted, must have some object in view in procuring our assent to such a stipulation. In endeavouring to discover what that object could be, he (Sir Stafford Northcote) found that we had entered into a treaty of navigation with France in 1826, which was terminable at a year's notice. Now, if that treaty were put an end to, what would be the result ? Why, that the differential duties in favour of French shipping would be revived in the direct trade, and the Emperor of the French would have it in his power to point to the Treaty of 1860 as declaring that the duties therein named were independent of those differential duties altogether. He wished to call the attention of the House to Article 11, which provided for the exportation of coal to France free of duty, and which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade contended had been introduced into the Treaty in a commercial sense. Now, it was perfectly clear that that Article had not been framed at the instance of the English Plenipotentiary, but must have emanated from the Emperor of the French himself. With what object, then, it was but reasonable to ask, could its introduction into the Treaty have been sought ? The question was one upon which he thought some light was thrown by what had taken place when he had filled the office of Secretary to the Treasury last year. A proclamation had at the time been issued with respect to the export of goods which were contraband of war, declaring that all those by whom such goods were exported would not only expose their property to be captured by foreign vessels, but would render themselves liable to penalty under the operation of the municipal law and what was called the South American Act. That proclamation had caused great alarm in certain quarters, and several persons had communicated with the Treasury for the purpose of ascertaining whether coal came within the terms of the prohibition, alleging that they had entered into contracts with the French Government for the supply of large quantities of that article for the use of the French navy. If the export of coal had then been prohibited it was quite clear that the interests of France in prosecuting the war in which she was engaged would have been materially interfered with, and yet we had by the present Treaty consented to surrender a right which we might have found it advantageous to exercise last year, and to the exercise of which we might at some future period find it beneficial to have recourse. It was argued, however, that a prohibition on the export of coal from England to France would not prevent the French from getting a supply from Belgium and other countries in the event of a war. But supposing that the war was one in which Belgium was also interested, and that it was desirable to cripple France, what would be the consequence? Why that they would be unable to do so in consequence of the Treaty? The view which he took upon the subject was one which he could not help thinking was not merely hypothetical, and one which received something like confirmation from the celebrated conversation which had been reported in The Times newspaper as having taken place in December last between two distinguished persons—an Englishman and a Frenchman, whom general report pointed out to be the Emperor of the French and Mr. Cobden. In the course of that conversation the Englishman was represented as having asked whether no information could be given him with respect to the large stock of coal then being laid in by France. The answer to that question was as follows:—

“ I will continue with the same frankness. Some months back your Tory Ministry was so much opposed to the war in Italy that everything announced its wish to place itself on the side of Austria. It was even on the point of causing coal to be considered as contraband of war. Now, our navy used only English coal. The Minister had then to occupy himself with that semi-hostile attitude of your Ministry, and to look about for the means of supplying, in case of need, the French fleet with French coal. It was his duty not to leave our supplies at the mercy of your Government.”

Now, coupling what had taken place when he was in office with what were admitted to be the necessities of the French navy with respect to the supply of coal, he thought it was perfectly clear that the intention of introducing into the Treaty the 11th Article was to preclude us from taking those steps to prevent the exportation of coal which we might have taken last year. If that were not the meaning of the article in question, what end was it intended to answer? In a commercial point of view it was of no earthly value, as the Emperor of the French was perfectly aware; so that we had been—he would not say entrapped into its insertion in the Treaty—but induced by France to accept it for her own particular objects. The Treaty had many good points in it, but it crippled and fettered us for a period of ten years, and left us powerless to alter or modify our course, whatever circumstances might occur to induce us to do so. During the last ten years a great change had taken place in the principles which regulated our commercial policy; he hoped the same principles would continue to prevail; but could they assure themselves of that, and how could they justify themselves for now tying up their successors in a new Parliament, which was to be elected on a totally new principle by stipulations of this sort? The Chancellor of the Exchequer told him the other night that he was proposing to tie up the hands of a reformed Parliament. Nothing could be more absurd than to attempt to fetter Parliament by any legislation of that House because one Parliament could always reverse the proceedings of its predecessor; but there was one way in which the hands of Parliament really might be tied,—and that was by a Treaty which binds the honour of the Crown, is accepted by Parliament, and cannot be got rid of. When a Treaty was so loosely drawn as this—when its details had received such cursory attention as from the speech of the President of the Board of Trade this Commercial Treaty obviously had received—when they were really putting themselves very inconveniently in a position from which they could not withdraw—when they were unable duly to consider it—when they could not discuss the details of the Budget, hampered as they were by the provisions of this Treaty, he could not help raising his voice against the adoption of the course which had been prescribed for them. He really blushed for the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night when he was obliged to propose a differential duty in favour of French corks in order to get out of the difficulty which seemed to arise out of the French Treaty. He was prepared to take off the duty altogether from corks; that was a question of free trade; but then came in the Treaty question, and lest the Treaty should be jeopardized his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer actually proposed a differential duty in favour of French corks, contrary to every principle of his whole commercial policy;—there could not be a more convincing proof of the extremely undignified position in which they were placing themselves. There was an expression in the Address they were called upon to vote which was rather a singular one. It professed, in the first place, to assure Her Majesty that the House had considered the Treaty of Commerce concluded between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, and then the Address went on to assure Her Majesty that "we shall proceed to take such steps as may be necessary for giving effect to a system which, we trust, will promote a beneficial intercourse between Great Britain and France." And now, what was the meaning of that word "system?" He supposed it was an error for the word "treaty." [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: It is the word used by Mr. Pitt.] He did not know what Mr. Pitt's Treaty or Mr. Pitt's system might have been, but, as the word was designedly introduced, they were obviously giving their assent to much more than a treaty; they were called on to give their assent to a system. What system? The system of mixing up their financial arrangements with treaties with foreign countries—a system which was to bind them to cut off, by an arrangement with a foreign country, large sources of revenue, and put them in a position in which they would be obliged to go on in a course from which it would be utterly impossible to withdraw, and which would cost them a great deal more than they had yet any idea of. What would be the effect of reducing those duties on luxuries? Would there not be a great pressure placed on them to take off those on tea, sugar, and other articles of prime necessity? He believed the argument would be found irresistible. They had relieved the rich from the heavy taxation on wine, silks, and other articles of luxury, and at the same time they were retaining the duties on the necessaries of life. One duty after another would fall, and the more they narrowed the number of articles on which they imposed duties the greater would be the pressure to take them off, and the greater the difficulty of maintaining the duties on those articles. The Liverpool Financial Reformer was in a state of perfect ecstasy with this Budget, considering it as a step, though a feeble one, towards the perfect freedom of trade, which, it stated, could not exist so long as there remained any duties of Customs or Excise on exports or imports. This was the great lever with which the Liverpool Financial Reformer was to work for the accomplishment of all it desired. He did not see how, logically, they could stop short in the course they were now invited to enter upon—of striking off all, or almost all, the remaining duties of Customs and Excise. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Hear, hear!] His right hon. Friend cheered, but what was to come in their place? Were they to have direct taxation; and if so, was the Chancellor of the Exchequer prepared with an unexceptionable scheme of direct taxation? His course would then be intelligible. But what he did was this; having impressed on them that our system of direct taxation was not satisfactory, and having also in former years expressed his strong sense of the difficulty or impossibility of altering it, he now asked them to postpone the whole question of its settlement till another year, and in the meantime to pursue a course which must lead to the destruction of all indirect taxes. Seeing then that the House was now called on to take a gigantic step in this direction, under circumstances which would commit the country to a course from which it would be impossible to recede, he felt himself unable to join in the very cordial approval they were invited to give to this Treaty.

MR. HORSMAN said, he rose to move the adjournment of the Debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped there would be no objection to disposing of the Amendment of the noble Lord; then, the right hon. Member for Stroud might proceed with his Amendment tomorrow.

MR. WALPOLE said, he wished to call the attention of the Government to this fact, that, supposing the question put and the Amendment of the noble Lord negatived, the words proposed to be left out would stand part of the question. Might not the words of the Address be improved in one respect? His hon. Friend who last spoke (Sir S. Northcote) called the attention of the House to the word "system," which the Address pledged the House to promote. Now, that was a very ambiguous term. Some people might suppose it meant the system of free trade; others the reciprocity system. He thought what was meant was the system mentioned in the Treaty—namely, the doing away with prohibitive duties on the part of France and the reduction or abolition of revenue duties on the part of England. What he suggested was that, instead of the word "system," they should use the word "treaty," which would have the effect of pledging the House to take such steps as they should think best fitted to give effect to the Treaty, so as to promote commercial intercourse between the two countries.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he thought "system" was the more appropriate word, but there would be no objection to insert the word "treaty." To make the alteration, however, it would be necessary for the noble Lord to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, these difficulties often occurred in Committee, and there they were got over by putting only the first few words of the clause. If the first half-dozen words of the Address were put, and the question then resolved in the affirmative, any alteration might be made afterwards.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment by leave, withdrawn: Original Question again proposed.

MR. HORSMAN moved the adjournment of the Debate.

EAST INDIAN INDENTURED LABOURERS.

ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that as Her Majesty's Government had consented last night to lay on the table of the other House copies of all Correspondence with the French Government relating to the importation into the French colonies of labourers from British India, he presumed there would be no difficulty in laying the same papers before their Lordships, and he would, therefore, move for them at once. He concluded that, as the Government had thus shown their inclination to allow Parliament to form a judgment on the provisions of the Treaty before it was concluded, they would not have the least objection to postponing the conclusion of the Treaty at least for some little time after the papers had been laid on the table. The noble Earl then moved an address for

"Copies or Extracts of the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of France with respect to legalising the Exportation of Natives of British India as Indentured Labourers to French Colonies."

LORD WODEHOUSE said, there would of course, be no objection to produce the Correspondence; but he must remind the noble Earl that it had never been the custom of the Crown in negotiating treaties to consult Parliament as to whether a Treaty should be concluded or not. He could not, therefore, give any pledge like that which the noble Earl seemed desirous of obtaining.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he could not understand for what other purpose the papers had been granted before the conclusion of the negotiations. Of course, after the Treaty was made, the papers were generally laid on the table to enable Parliament to judge whether the Government had acted well or ill; but it could not be of much use to produce them before the Treaty was made if their opinion was not to be expressed until it was too late to be of use.

Motion agreed to.

PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT OF TUSCANY.

ADDRESS FOR INSTRUCTIONS TO BRITISH CHARGE D'AFFAIRES AT FLORENCE.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY, in rising to call attention to the conduct of the Provisional Government of Tuscany, and to move for papers connected with the subject, said he had two motives for reverting to a subject which, perhaps, he ought to apologize to their Lordships for having brought so frequently before them. The first was, that if the Piedmontese officials continued to act with the same precipitation which they seemed now inclined to display, if he were to delay even for a few days, the event, to which he wished to call attention, would become un fait accompli; and the second was that, until he read the Correspondence which the Government had recently presented to Parliament, he had no idea how soon they had thrown off the mask of neutrality, and how soon they had assumed the chaacter of partizans. He was far from wishing, by the form which he had given to his Motion, to have it supposed that he was inclined either to encourage or to extend that system of interference in the internal affairs of foreign nations for which the career of the noble Viscount at the head of the Government had been so long remarkable, whether as departmental chief or as the superintending mind. In this case, however, he held that Her Majesty's Government must be responsible for the position which they had taken, and that the anomalous Governments of Central Italy could only be treated as their creations. We all knew the great satisfaction with which the whole civilized world hailed the somewhat sudden conclusion of the late disastrous war. There was hardly a man who did not feel that a great weight was removed from his mind, as no one knew how far that war might extend. But it now appeared that to the general satisfaction there was an exception; for within a week after the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office announced to the House of Commons the conclusion of peace they found him in communication with the Chargé d'Affaires at Florence, recommending those in power to act in opposition to the provisions of the treaty by which the belligerent Powers had bound themselves. The first overt act was on the 19th of July; but after the experience of last night he did not know whether before peace was concluded Lord John Russell had not in private letters to Mr. Corbett inculcated the means to thwart the provisions of the treaty. From the experience they had had, particularly in reference to Savoy, he was rather afraid that the noble Lord had adopted a course which, when chief of his present leader, he was the first to deprecate. He could not pretend to decide that it was the first communication, but on the 19th of July Lord John Russell wrote to Mr. Corbett, that it was much to be desired that a Legislative Assembly should be convoked in Tuscany in order to decide upon its future. That, he contended, was decidedly a measure in direct opposition to the conditions of the treaty of peace, and entailed upon Her Majesty's Government the responsibility of what had since occurred. It was in his opinion, the first step which led the mind of the Emperor of the French to the annexation of Savoy. The hurry was so great that the directions given by the noble Lord were acted upon immediately afterwards by the Provisional Government of Florence during the Presidency of Signor Boncompagni. Signor Boncompagni was Commissary General to the King of Sardinia, and therefore had no more right to issue orders for an election in Tuscany than to issue Speaker's writs for the election of Members of the House of Commons. From the very first, therefore, the noble Lord, by his precipitate conduct, had placed the stamp of illegality upon all the proceedings. On the 18th July the noble Lord must have had some suspicion of the kind of influence that was going on there, for upon that day he desired Mr. Corbett to warn the Provisional Government against making themselves a party to anything unjust, to any violent and arbitrary proceedings inconsistent with the freedom of election. Mr. Corbett's answer was not very consolatory. On the 6th August he said that threats had been used not only against the Grand Ducal party, but also against the Republicans themselves. This was the answer of Marchese Ridolfi, who mentioned the name of a leading Republican the Government had imprisoned. This indiscriminate oppression of all who are not of the Piedmontese party, it was thought must be satisfactory to the English Government. It was unnecessary to weary their Lordships with the details of the electoral law of 1848. But, however much the Tuscans might have regretted the suppression of constitutional government, he had never heard a single Tuscan deny that the electoral law of 1848 was in its very nature most partial. It was established during an incipient revolution; and it was intended to give nearly all power to the towns, to public employés, to professors of the University, and to the small shopkeepers. On this point he must say that if there were any country in which the rural population ought to have great weight Tuscany was that country; for in Tuscany the rural population was the most enlightened and the most independent part of the community: yet those were the people whom a stranger, Signor Boncompagni, excluded from a voice in the elections. It was unnecessary to refer to the intimidation, because the system founded on the electoral law of 1848 was now interrupted; but there was an important fact which showed the inaccuracy of the information which was communicated to Her Majesty's Government by their agent. On the 10th of August Mr. Corbett wrote:—

“A very large majority of those entitled to vote have taken part in the elections, probably as many as three-fourths."

But Signor Galleotti, the Secretary to the National Assembly at Florence, showed in a pamphlet, written in defence of the system, that only about half the constituency voted. The number of voters on the list is 63,000, those who voted over 35,000—by what process of arithmetic Mr. Corbett makes this amount to three-fourths, it is difficult to say, but his estimate is given to Parliament in these papers. The original constitution of the electoral body, who were to have the privilege of voting on the question which was to decide the future of the country, was intended to apply to 1-25th of the population; but the fact was that only one in fifty registered their votes. Could any one say that that was a satisfactory mode of taking a vote upon which depended the constitution of the State and the future of the people? On October the 24th, Mr. Corbett expressed himself very curiously as to the feelings of the country.

"The greater part," he wrote, "of the nobility and upper classes, and all the intelligence of the country, are opposed to the restoration of the Grand Ducal Government."

Now, from his own recollection, he could mention the names of numbers of the first families in Florence whose opinions were the very reverse of those stated by Mr. Corbett. As to the intelligence of the country, how could Mr. Corbett constitute himself a judge of that? He had, he understood, few acquaintances beyond his own limited private circle; and, at any rate, he had not that knowledge and experience of the country which would justify a man in making such a very wholesale assertion. In declaring that all the intelligence of the country was opposed to the Government, Mr. Corbett must have formed a very mean estimate of the Foreign Minister, with whom he was daily transacting business, and who had stated to Mr. Scarlett that he himself and a great majority of the Tuscans desired nothing so much as the return of the Grand Duke. On a former occasion he had drawn the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the circumstance of Mr. Corbett having appeared at one of the receptions of Signor Boncompagni, and had then been assured by a member of the Government, on the authority of a private letter, that Mr. Corbett had attended no official reception, but had only accepted a personal invitation to a private ball given by his intimate friend, Signor Boncompagni.

The Marquess of Normanby

pagni. He found, however, that in an official account of the reception which had appeared in the official gazette Il Monitore Toscano, it was stated to have been of an official character, and Mr. Corbett's presence at it was duly recorded, as that of Her Britannic Majesty's Charge d'Affaires. It was, in point of fact, precisely of the same character as the State Reception on New Year's Day always was—and as he himself had attended last year at the Palazzo Pitti. Upon seeing that announcement Mr. Corbett ought at once to have sent an intimation to the official gazette stating that he had attended the reception only in his private capacity. He ought not to have the credit in Florence of supporting the revolutionary Government officially and give it at home the character of a private civility. Letters were not only stopped and examined by the Tuscan Government, but suppressed altogether. With the exception of an anonymous letter received that morning, it was three months since he had received a single letter by the ordinary post from Tuscany, although previously he used to receive frequent communications. He had been informed that imprisonments and domiciliary visits had greatly increased since the English propositions had arrived at Florence. No less than 113 persons, nobles, priests, and others, had been thrown into solitary confinement in Florence alone without any specific charge having been made against them. An English lady, of a family well known to their Lordships, and married to an Italian gentleman of great respectability, had written to him to state that her now blind and infirm husband had been torn from her and imprisoned without any charge having been preferred against him. This lady, once Miss Thornton, was the daughter and sister of two distinguished diplomatists, her brother being now, he believed, Minister to the Argentine Confederation. He would do her the justice to allow her to state her case in her own words:—

"Florence, Feb. 15, 1860.

"I cannot refrain from writing a few lines to tell you that my poor husband has himself fallen a victim to the spirit of persecution at present so rife in Tuscany. He has been in prison since the 6th ult. Almost all the Guardie Nobili had been imprisoned before himself, and I really believe that it was because he had interested himself very much (as it was his duty to do) for them, and perhaps expressed himself too freely on the injustice of their imprisonment, and still more for their being kept in prison without the slightest appearance of a trial, or even being told why they were arrested. I have heard of no trial, in fact I know that no trial has taken place, for now more than five weeks that some of them have been in prison. You may imagine that in Tassinari's interest I have examined into their case by every means in my power, and I know that the public tribunals will have nothing to do with them, there being no cause to proceed, consequently there will be a trial by via economica, which is just as much as to say that they will be condemned as others have been before them without cause. Your Lordship is well aware of the state of poor Tassinari's sight, and consequently how infinitely more painful, as well as injurious to him, is solitary confinement, where books and writing, allowed to others, to him are useless. Tassinari does not seek to avoid a trial; on the contrary, he demands it, and what he asks is but an act of humanity which ought not to be denied him. It is a sad state of things, and I cannot but be surprised that in England people should talk of the possibility of another election with so many in prison, so many exiled, and so many, many more in voluntary exile! The following observation made by an Ultra Liberal the day Tassinari was arrested you will allow to be characteristic. 'Could I but know two hours before that I was to be arrested on an accusation of stealing the Campanile del Duomo, I would leave the country instantly in the present state of things,' &c. M. A. TASSINARI."

And this was the working of the model Government of Tuscany, which had been praised by Lord John Russell as the perfection of moderation and wisdom! If anything appeared in the English papers displeasing to the Government, its publication was suppressed. If the doctrine of the rights of man was to be raised in Tuscany, ought they to proceed by making a privileged class? How was it possible in such a case to ascertain what was the real voice of the people? What the people of Tuscany wanted was, to have a fair opportunity of expressing their real sentiments; and he asked whether it was consistent with the free exercise of the suffrage that the Tuscan army should not be in their own country to vote? and that the whole should be conducted by employés who had taken the oath of allegiance to one of the candidates. He thought that commissioners ought to be appointed by the great Powers to see that the election took place in all fairness; and he had no doubt that if the question was fairly put before the people of Tuscany their free and unbiassed opinion would be against annexation to Sardinia. In conclusion, the noble Marquess having stated that as these new elections had been caused by the direct interference of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, he concluded that he must have accompanied his recommendation by some instructions to the Chargé d'Affaires as to the necessity of allowing perfect freedom of opinion, as the experience of last year had sufficiently shown that unless enforced from without the present Tuscan Government had no great respect for the free exercise of the elective franchise. He concluded by moving—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of any Instructions addressed by the Secretary of State to Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, at Florence, directing him to impress upon the Provisional Government the Duty of abstaining from any arbitrary Acts calculated to destroy all Freedom of Action in connection with those fresh Elections which Her Majesty's Government had thought proper to recommend."

LORD WODEHOUSE said, with regard to the papers moved for by the noble Marquess, the answer he had to give would, he hoped, be satisfactory. It was simply that the papers did not exist, and therefore could not be laid on the table. Before venturing to answer some of the remarks made by the noble Marquess the House would, perhaps, allow him to say that it was rather hard that the Government should be compelled to go into minute details regarding the conduct of the Government of another country, with which he was perfectly ready to admit they had considerable sympathy, but in the affairs of which the policy of non-interference (which notwithstanding what had fallen from the noble Marquess, they had consistently pursued) did not permit them in any way to interpose. One thing was remarkable throughout the speech of the noble Marquess. He uniformly assumed that every person unfavourable to his views was inaccurate and partial; and that every one who agreed in opinion with him was thoroughly trustworthy and impartial. The noble Marquess remarked on the absence of instructions with reference to the oppressive measures said to have been exercised by the Tuscan Government before the elections, and charged Mr. Corbett with having acted with excessive partiality. He (Lord Wodehouse) thought that any one who read the published correspondence could not but be of opinion that Mr. Corbett had shown great impartiality, because the despatches contained proof that he had repeatedly pointed out the errors into which the Tuscan Government had fallen. When his noble Friend Lord John Russell wrote to Mr. Corbett to say certain measures were unjust and illiberal, Mr. Corbett lost no time in executing his instructions:—

"On receipt of your Lordship's despatch of the 28th ult." (Mr. Corbett wrote on the 6th of August last) 'I took an opportunity to express privately to Marchese Ridolfi your Lordship's opinion, that to repress a free declaration of opinion as to the future Government of this country was unjust and illiberal. His Excellency said, that it had been found necessary to warn certain persons that any attempt to disturb the public peace would be punished; but that these threats had been made use of not only to persons belonging to the Grand Ducal Party, but also to persons of Republican opinions, who had shown a disposition to create disturbance, and that one of the latter, named Sterbini, had been imprisoned. I urged upon his Excellency the necessity of allowing the freest expression of opinion compatible with the maintenance of public order, if the Government desired to render the opinion to be expressed by the new Assembly respected abroad.'

The noble Marquess had found great fault with the Government for not having expressed a more decided opinion; but he (Lord Wodehouse) thought Mr. Corbett's expression of opinion decided and distinct enough. The Tuscan Assembly was convoked; and the noble Marquess proceeded to say that Mr. Corbett had given a most inaccurate account of the way in which the votes were taken, and the numbers of those votes. On that part of the case he (Lord Wodehouse) was unable to say more than that he believed Mr. Corbett to be an accurate and trustworthy person. He was certain that Mr. Corbett transmitted to the Government the best information he could procure; it happened, besides, to coincide with all the rest of the information that had been received from other quarters. Of the constitution of the Tuscan Assembly, on which the noble Marquess had remarked, their Lordships could form a judgment for themselves. Their Lordships attended to the course of public affairs, and they must have seen that some of the most distinguished persons—men who had taken a prominent part in the affairs of Tuscany had been elected to seats in the Assembly. Mr. Corbett distinctly stated that the Assembly was composed of persons of rank, station, fortune, and intelligence in the country. He (Lord Wodehouse) could not help saying that the noble Marquess, in speaking of Mr. Corbett as he had done, had been wanting in generosity. The noble Marquess knew Mr. Corbett, for Mr. Corbett had served under the noble Marquess for some time. He (Lord Wodehouse) did not know him at all; but he must say that, as far as he had been able to judge from what he had heard of Mr. Corbett, he thought he had, under very difficult and peculiar circumstances, discharged his duty efficiently. The noble Marquess had attempted to fix on Her Majesty's Government the responsibility of the fresh elections which were about to take place. But he thought the noble Marquess had altogether misunderstood the true position which Her Majesty's Government had assumed in this matter. Her Majesty's Government, throughout the correspondence had distinctly laid down that they would not interfere in the internal concerns of Italy, and that they would endeavour to induce the other Powers to take the same course. He maintained that those who had read the Correspondence would see that the Government had consistently abstained from such interference. It was said Her Majesty's Government were in favour of the policy of annexation. Why were they in favour of it? Simply because annexation had been the expressed wish of the Italian people. His noble Friend Lord John Russell, in a conversation which was recorded in the blue-book, had even expressed an opinion that it might be desirable that the Grand Duke should be recalled under proper guarantees; Her Majesty's Government had never desired to see the Grand Ducal authority overthrown, connected as it was with many historical associations; but being overthrown, they had to consider how a secure Government could be established in its place, and Her Majesty's Government were so far from having being unwilling to countenance any policy but that of annexation, that amongst other combinations his noble Friend suggested that there might be a Kingdom of Central Italy; but he always laid down the principle that the feelings and wishes of the Italian people should be respected; and as the French Government proclaimed in Italy that they would not interfere by force of arms with the wishes of the Italian people, those wishes having been clearly ascertained; it was very natural that Her Majesty's Government should recommend elections as the best means of ascertaining what those wishes were. As regarded the new elections, the recommendation for a new election arose out of the general proposal of Her Majesty's Government with a view to the settlement of Italian affairs. Adverting to the application of the principle of universal suffrage, the noble Marquess said—addressing himself to Members of Her Majesty's Government—where was their respect for the rights of man?

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY explained that what he had said was, that if

Her Majesty's Government recommended that the destiny of Italy was to be decided by an appeal to popular vote, then every person ought to have an equal right to decide the question ; but that there were obvious objections to universal suffrage, and therefore he could not acquiesce in the future fate of a country being decided by a popular vote which, applied to such a question, would evidently be most unjust if not universal.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he did not precisely see the difference if there were objections to universal suffrage, they certainly were not diminished by the fact that the votes were to be taken for the purpose of determining the destinies of a whole people. But however that might be, it was clearly our duty not to interfere. The noble Marquess had alluded to the non-transmission of his letters from Florence, and had made a complaint, founded on a letter from Madame Tassinari, which he had read to the House. He did not desire to regard too strictly the letter of a lady who necessarily wrote under some excitement caused by the imprisonment of her husband, and could scarcely be expected to be accurate in matters of political import ; but he was surprised that charges against the Government should be based upon such a foundation. But before entering upon the matter of that complaint he would advert to the request of the noble Marquess that Mr. Corbett should be instructed by telegraph to take charge of a letter from Monsieur Tassinari to the noble Marquess. His noble Friend (Lord John Russell directed him (Lord Wodehouse) to inform the noble Marquess that he could not undertake to desire Mr. Corbett to take charge of his (the Marquess of Normanby's) correspondence, but a telegram was sent requesting the Tuscan Government to forward all letters addressed to the noble Marquess unopened. That was done, and the noble Marquess, it appeared, had received the anonymous letter which he had referred to. The grounds upon which the Secretary of State declined to accede to the noble Marquess's request were obvious. The privilege of rendering inviolate official correspondence for foreign countries depended upon that privilege never being abused. He did not wish to say anything harsh of the lady in question ; but it must be borne in mind that she was connected with the party opposed to, and accused of plotting against, the existing Government of Tuscany. A parallel case to the application of the noble Marquess would have been, if the late Lord Dudley Stuart had applied that our Minister at St. Petersburg might be allowed to transmit to him letters from disaffected Poles, or from English ladies who were married to disaffected Poles, in order that he might make statements affecting the Russian Government. He was only surprised that the noble Marquess, with his experience, should have made such a request. The Government thought it was not incumbent on them to institute an inquiry into the complaints of a subject of Tuscany, but he had made some inquiries concerning this matter, and he would now state the result to the House. In the first place it was singular that, on the evening of the very day the lady wrote to the noble Marquess complaining that Mr. Corbett had paid no attention to her appeal, on the evening of that very day her husband was removed from prison, and placed in confinement in his own house, being ill and afflicted with blindness, at Mr. Corbett's request ; and Mr. Corbett said the lady had never had the grace to thank him for his interference. That showed the animus which dictated these complaints. The gentleman in question was arrested on the 6th of February upon a charge of being concerned in a plot which the Tuscan authorities supposed to have some connection with the recent affair of the shells which had been thrown into the house of one of the Ministers. He was arrested in company with eleven other persons ; and, so far from not being made acquainted with the charge against him, he was examined the next day, and was afterwards tried under a law established in the reign of the late Grand Duke. He would like to ask whether the noble Marquess during his stay in Florence had felt it his duty to make any remonstrance to the Grand Duke upon the cruelty of that law. The gentleman himself, however, did not seem to be discontented with his treatment ; for after his removal to his own house, he wrote a letter to the chief of the police, thanking the government for the attention that had been shown to him, and the humane way in which he had been treated. The noble Marquess indulged in a spirit of exaggeration, and had spoken of hundreds of thousands of persons being thrown into prison by the present government of Tuscany. Mr. Corbett had furnished an account of the number of persons who had been arrested ; and it appeared that in October last there was a reactionary plot, on account of which Signor Andreozzi, and three or four others, were tried and sentenced to six months' imprisonment, with the option of commuting that penalty by an exile for twelve months. The next plot was one of the Mazzini faction ; for it was the fate of the Tuscan government to have to deal with two extreme and opposite parties. Upon that occasion fourteen persons were arrested at Leghorn, and after trial were condemned to six months' imprisonment, while seventeen others were placed in surveillance. In February, twelve of the re-actionary party, of whom Tassinari was one, were arrested. Considering the difficult position of the Tuscan Government struggling for existence almost in a time of revolution, he thought there was no example in history where a government placed in such difficulties, with the monarchical party on one side, and the extreme republican or anarchical party on the other, had shown greater firmness, moderation, and desire to avoid cruelty. So far from oppression, the Provisional Government, so far from meriting these continued harassing attacks, deserved general sympathy for its mild and impartial treatment of its opponents. The noble Marquess had referred to the supposed absence of Tuscan troops from that country ; but the fact was that out of 21,000 men under arms, 10,000 were at present in Tuscany, and the remainder were placed in positions where their services were most required. This did not show that the Tuscan Government did not place confidence in the fidelity of the troops. The Tuscan Government had recently determined to raise 6,000 more men, and to mobilize 6,000 National Guards. So far from there being numerous bodies of foreign troops in Tuscany, Mr. Corbett very recently reported that the first battalion of the troops of the League had arrived in Florence, where it had been received with universal sympathy. Then as to the press regulations, it appeared to him that the Provisional Government deserved credit for having removed all the restrictions that formerly existed. That, at the moment the elections were about to take place, showed a right-minded respect for public opinion. The noble Marquess spoke of the influence exercised by Sardinia in Tuscany ; but the recall of Signor Boncompagni at the moment when the elections were about to be held, showed a proper desire to avoid improper influence. The noble Marquess had upon a former occasion referred to Milan, and he (Lord Wodehouse) had received a letter from the municipality of Milan, declaring that some statements which he had made had caused great indignation ; and it was remarkable that the statements of the noble Marquess always did excite the indignation of some one ; so that it was natural to infer that they were not quite so accurate as he imagined them to be. This document was addressed to Sir James Hudson, and was to the following effect :—

"The municipal authorities (giunta municipale) of the city of Milan, recently empowered by the free vote of their fellow citizens, beg to present, through the kind medium of your Excellency, a rectification of the strange and quite unfounded assertions respecting this city which an hon. Member of the British Parliament, undoubtedly misled by false information, happened to allege at the sitting of the House of Lords of the 7th instant."

The writers then quoted from the Parliamentary report of The Times of February 8th the remarks of the noble Marquess relative to the "alarming state" of Milan, and proceeded :—

"Such an unqualifiable misrepresentation of facts cannot be answered but by the most complete and the most formal denial. Far from being in the least alarming, as the noble Lord is pleased to represent it, never was the state of this city a more calm, thriving, and cheerful one than at present. Nay, the present state of this city forms, in the eyes of any impartial observer, the most striking contrast to the gloomy, distressed, and deeply agitated appearance it bore under the Austrian rule. Since this city was happily relieved from that detested domination in so difficult a period as must necessarily arise from a great political crisis, no increase at all has to be stated in the average number of crimes and common offences, the good spirit and vigilance of the people themselves, as well as the moral strength of a national Government, working as a substitute for the arbitrary measures in which the Austrian Government so profusely indulged, and from which a constitutional one makes it a duty to abstain ; so that also as regards personal security the state of this country and city has nothing to envy in that of any civilized people in Europe. Let it be enough to state that during the last solemn entry of His Majesty the King on the 15th instant, while all the streets and public places swarmed with a joyful and bustling crowd, only a single complaint was brought into the police-offices in the whole of the day, and that, too, for an almost insignificant offence—a fact which no overflowing metropolis in Europe is perhaps in case to boast of for many years. As for the intercourse between civil inhabitants and military, not only is this a cordial and friendly one, but any testimony of the deepest and warmest sympathies that can be felt by an impressible people is bestowed upon soldiers and officers, whether Lombard or Piedmontese, or belonging to any other Italian provinces, as on the living symbol and palladium of the so long sought-after national independence. Never can the comparison between the treatment of a national and that of an Austrian officer in Milan present itself to a healthy mind but as that between friend and foe."

They then concluded by declaring that they attached too high a price to the esteem and friendship of the English nation not to take any step in their power in order to contradict false statements, which might eventually mislead public opinion in England respecting the real position of things in Lombardy. This was one specimen of the contradictions given to the statements of the noble Marquess. Another was supplied from Leghorn, and was contained in a letter addressed by the English merchants of that city to a well-known banker there. These gentlemen, referring to a letter read by the noble Marquess in this House on the 14th of February, and said to have been written by a Leghorn merchant "of the first consideration," declared their firm conviction that that letter was written neither by an English merchant of the first nor of any other consideration whatever, and they totally denied the allegations which it contained respecting the state of the country. Such were a few of the contradictions which poured in on every side to the statements of the noble Marquess; and most of their Lordships would have seen a certain correspondence between Dolfi, the baker of Florence, and the noble Lord, in which the latter, to use a familiar phrase, got as good as he gave. No such correspondence existed as the noble Marquess had moved for, and the reason why no such advice had been given to the Tuscan Government was that they appeared to be no ground whatever for volunteering it. There was no reason to believe that the Tuscan Government had adopted measures calculated to prevent a free expression of opinion in that country. He thought that Her Majesty's Government were justified in expressing their opinion that a sufficient answer had been given to the statements of the noble Marquess. The statements to which the House had listened emanated from persons who took no broad views of the politics of Europe, who drew general conclusions from small and insufficient premises, and who failed to see that the policy recommended by Her Majesty's Government sprang from the belief that you could only insure the peace and tranquillity of Italy by conferring on her a Government based upon the wishes of the people, and consolidated by the free expression of public opinion.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY, in explanation, said he had never desired that the Government should give him the right to send his letters through Mr. Corbett. He had refrained for some time from bringing under their Lordships' notice the cruel case which had been submitted to him, and all he had done was to request the noble Lord to allow the one letter which he expected, and which would have enabled him to lay the whole case fully before the House, to be transmitted through Mr. Corbett. He still thought it was neither courteous nor calculated to insure a fair and full consideration of the subject that that request should be refused. With respect to Milan, he would only say that the answer of the municipality, which had been read by the noble Lord, referred to the existing position of things in that city, whereas his statement referred to the state of Milan in the early part of January. Every word of that information was derived from The Times of January 7, in a letter written by the very same correspondent who afterwards cited the strange remonstrance sent to Sir James Hudson. With respect to the letter from five or six persons calling themselves Leghorn merchants, which the noble Lord had thought it his duty to communicate to the House, and giving their opinion as to his correspondent, of whose identity they could know nothing, he would be satisfied to leave the matter to be judged by any one more accurately acquainted with the Mercantile Society of Leghorn than the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State, and he could give confidentially to that noble Lord the name of his correspondent, which would at once show him to be a person of undoubted respectability.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE thought that the statements of the noble Marquess had received a complete refutation. As the noble Marquess had not had letters from Italy for some time, he had perhaps not received one that an officer of high standing had written to him, strongly contradicting the serious attack which the noble Marquess had made upon him in his pamphlet. He submitted that if the noble Marquess had received that letter he was bound to give it the same publicity as he had given to the charge. He thought that the noble Marquess, as a friend of the reactionary party, was excessively ungrateful to the Government of Florence; because if they had not taken the vigorous steps to maintain order which he now complained of, those persons for whose safety he was so anxious would be placed in a very insecure position.

The noble Marquess must know that there were many desperate republican agents in the country, and that it required the utmost efforts of the respective Governments to secure practical liberty to the people by preserving tranquillity and good order. The noble Marquess had next complained of the murder of Count Anviti; but he did not see that the murder of Count Anviti had showed the Government of Parma the necessity of taking the stronger measures that he now criticised in order to prevent the repetition of such outrages? He thought that mankind owed a debt of gratitude to those men who had come forward in Italy in support of the liberties of their country. Their names would be immortalized in their own country, and they would be recorded in the history of Europe. He did not know what the noble Marquess wanted the House to do in reference to the vote which was to be taken in Tuscany next Sunday. His belief was that that election would be conducted with great order, and that it would truly indicate the wishes and feelings of the people. It was wonderful how few persons of any ability there were who belonged to the reactionary party. There was not among them a single doctor, not a single man of science, not a lawyer, not a soldier of eminence, except one. Every one whose name was known out of the country was on the side of liberty and progress. Since the noble Marquess gave notice of this Motion he had the opportunity of conversing with a gentleman who had recently returned from Florence, and he assured him that the existing Government of the country was the incarnation of the popular will; that exceptions there were, and would be in all countries, but that the Government rested upon the affections of the people. The present Government had no foreign soldiers to enforce its will, and he had no doubt that the result of the elections would be to show that the people not only placed confidence in the Government, but that it entirely adopted its policy.

LORD DENMAN expressed a hope that the election would be allowed to proceed as freely as possible, and that the people would not be interfered with, one way or the other. Unless every part were freely represented the vote that might be arrived at would not command respect. The great object to be attained was the restoration of peace; and unless we showed perfect impartiality, our remonstrances would not be half so powerful. We did not take part in the war in Italy because we thought there was much precipitation in the conduct of the belligerent Powers, and that Sardinia herself was not altogether free from blame. He trusted that no effort would be spared to confirm and secure the peace which had been signed at Villafranca.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I am not surprised, knowing the strong interest felt by the noble Marquess in this subject, that he should have again brought it before your Lordships. I am the less surprised at this circumstance, because it is evident that the topic which formed the main object of my noble Friend's speech was the imprisonment of certain persons by the Tuscan authorities. The noble Marquess was somewhat moved by the fact of an English lady of good family, akin to persons much respected in this country, being to a certain extent a victim of the acts of the revolutionary party. I rise, however, for the purpose of expressing the strong objection which I hold to any acts of interference upon our part with the proceedings that are now going on in Italy. My Lords, every day that passes, and every account we receive, confirm me in the conviction that our own safety hereafter and the interests of the Italian people themselves consist in our complete abnegation of interference, either in the political discussions of the Italians, or the internal administration of their affairs. I think any interference which the Government may be tempted to exercise is most to be deprecated at a time when Tuscany is about to give a positive and decided opinion upon the form of Government which they deem best for themselves. I understand that in about three days hence Tuscany will declare, by universal suffrage, whether she will annex herself to Sardinia or not. It is, therefore, I think, a mere loss of time to discuss this question in this or the other House of Parliament, when the will of the Tuscan people will be declared immediately in the face of Europe. But I entreat Her Majesty's Government to look a little before them, and to reflect upon the danger they may draw upon themselves and this country by an interference in any shape with the movements of the Italian people. It is impossible for me—indeed, I feel it would be most difficult for me even if I were in office—to fathom the real intentions of the French Government in regard to the Italian States. But there is certainly this accusation constantly made against her Majesty's Government, both in the public prints and elsewhere, that they are responsible by their acts of interference in the affairs of Italy for the difficulties we have now to encounter in respect to the annexation of Savoy. I give no opinion whether the accusation be true or not; but it is said by Frenchmen in high positions that our Government have given a pretext and a justification to the French Emperor for his act of annexation, inasmuch as they have resisted those principles of peace which he had laid down in the Treaty of Villafranca, and thwarted his views which were founded upon that convention. If that is the case, it will not be the only difficulty we shall have to encounter, because it would naturally tempt a continuance of your interference with the affairs of Italy, and you will be bound in honour hereafter to support the Italians in their onward movement; and it is impossible to say into what difficulties we may be dragged to redeem the honour and credit of England. I only wished to give expression to those few observations, deprecating, as I do—and I cannot express my objections too often—any interference on our part in the affairs of Italy. I think it is desirable to cease any further discussion on the matter in this House until the Italians in Tuscany and Romagna have publicly and indisputably declared their own wishes as to their future government. Whatever those wishes may be, it is for us to respect them; and I think any officious interference on our part would only bring upon us future difficulties, without benefiting in any way the interests of the Italian peoples.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL concurred with the noble Earl as to the inexpediency of any further discussion of this question until the decision of the Tuscans and Romagnese should have been pronounced; but he regretted that the noble Earl, in recommending the cessation of discussion, should have brought an unjust accusation against Her Majesty's Government when he said that they were responsible by their interference for the present position of affairs in Italy. Neither in regard to Tuscany nor any other part of Italy had the Government taken any course but that of supporting the Italian people in the right of expressing their opinion upon their own form of government. If the Italian people had been willing to accept the settlement sketched out at Villafranca, Her Majesty's Government would have made no opposition; and the utmost they had done was to endeavour to have the basis of the Treaty of Villafranca made the subject of consultation with the Italian people, who were more interested in it. In no other sense could the Government be said to have interfered in the affairs of Italy. While agreeing with the noble Earl that we were rightly neutral in the war, he could not agree with him that, because we were neutral in the war, we should therefore be indifferent in the settlement of Italy. He thought the noble Earl, when in office did perfectly right in endeavouring to keep this country free from the responsibility of the Italian war, because it was undertaken under circumstances which made it extremely doubtful how far the war would result in the welfare of the people of Italy; but that noble Earl, to do him justice, did not act upon a principle of perfect indifference with regard to Italian affairs, because he was perpetually interfering to prevent the war or to localize the war, and was sending telegrams almost every day to one Court or another in reference to the affairs of Italy. He did not complain of the noble Earl for taking that course; but it was in every sense an interference in the affairs of Italy, expressing the opinions of the English Government thereupon. Now, what he said was that Her Majesty's present Government—no doubt to a certain extent, with different views, and with different sympathies, had taken precisely the same course. Her Majesty's Government were simply anxious to see that settlement which would most conduce to the interests of the Italian people, and best secure the peace of Europe. They were perfectly satisfied that there could be no secure settlement unless it rested on the wishes of the Italian people, and in that opinion he had no doubt the noble Earl would agree. But if the noble Earl was disposed to raise a discussion upon the course which had been taken, Her Majesty's Government would be quite prepared to meet him. Before sitting down he would say he thought the noble Marquess had made a strange omission. He would ask the noble Marquess whether he had read the context of the despatch of July 19? The despatch of the 19th July was an answer to a despatch from Mr. Corbett, of the 12th July, in which that gentleman reported that attempts were being made to gather the opinions of the people through the municipal bodies, and there was considerable danger of intimidation being used on those occasions. The answer of Lord John Russell was simply to suggest that the opinion of the people should be freely taken in a national assembly. The despatch, therefore, taken with its context did not support the accusation of the noble Marquess.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY explained, that what he had said was that whereas one of the conditions of the treaty of Villafranca was that the Grand Duke should be restored, Lord John Russell, in his despatch of the 19th of July, had advised that which was in exact opposition to the treaty of Villafranca. All he said was that Lord John Russell by that act was answerable for having produced a fresh demand for the annexation of Savoy. He did not require the English Government to interfere in favour of the Grand Dukes, but common respect for the treaty should have induced Lord John Russell to abstain from urging an election under Signor Boncompagni, the nominee of the King of Sardinia. He did not think that the Under Secretary of State had answered any one of the imputations which he had brought against the conduct of the Tuscan Government with respect to the arbitrary nature of their proceedings.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I am sorry to trouble your Lordships again. The noble Duke, however, obliges me to do so, in consequence of his observations that there was a similar policy pursued by the late and the present Government in regard to the affairs of Italy. Nothing could be more different than the circumstances under which the late and the present Government acted, and it is utterly impossible that their course of action could be the same. While in office my efforts for five or six months were directed in a way not to interfere personally in the affairs of Italy, but if possible to prevent the sanguinary war which was then threatened in Italy. I never gave any advice upon the affairs of Italy, except that in favour of a Congress of the European Powers, in which every one of the Italian States should be fairly and personally represented, which I believed to be the best mode of settling the difficulties that then existed. I felt a sincere interest in the ly and their sufferings, but I red in the way the present have done. Unfortunately I prevent the war. That war by a sudden peace—a peace for mankind generally, but that turned out less fortunate arties in Italy than they ex—the moment of such a peace dished it was not, in my opin—for a great Government like he of Argyll ours to intrude their opinions, and to run the risk, by thwarting that settlement, of reviving all the dangers that existed before the war took place. That is the difference in the situation of the two Governments. I again repeat that I never interfered in the affairs of Italy, except so far as to express my earnest wish in favour of a European Congress of the great Powers to arrange satisfactorily the complicated difficulties which had arisen; and to draw a comparison, such as has been made, is not a fair way of putting the case.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL explained that all he meant to say was, that the noble Earl when in office did not hold, and certainly did not act, upon the doctrine that England was absolutely isolated from Continental politics, and ought to allow affairs to be settled by the other nations, without offering any suggestions whatever; but, that on the contrary, the noble Earl offered many suggestions, in some of which he thought he was right, and in some mistaken. Her Majesty's Government had pursued the same course, holding that England had a right, not perhaps to interfere, but to make known her opinions as to what was the best mode of settling the affairs of Italy.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

House adjourned at Half-past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, March 9, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—Consolidated Fund (£4,500,000): Court of Chancery. 3^d Oxford University.

DOVER ELECTION.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

“That Admiral Sir Henry John Leake and William Nicol, esquire, are duly elected Barons to serve in this present Parliament for the Town and Port of Dover.

“And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.”

SINGAPORE.—QUESTION.

MR. GREGSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, if Her Majesty's Government have arranged with the Viceroy of India to transfer the control of the Government of Singapore and the Straits from Bengal to the Colonial Office; and, if so, when it is proposed to complete the transfer?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in answer to the question of his hon. Friend, he had to state that he himself had always been of opinion that it would be desirable to transfer the Government of Singapore and the Straits to the Colonial Office. The noble Lord who had preceded him in the office wrote a despatch to the Governor General of India, asking for his views on the question, and whether he saw any objection to such a course. In December last, he (Sir C. Wood) had received an answer to that despatch, in which the Governor General expressed the opinion that it would be desirable to make the transfer. On that he communicated with the noble Duke at the head of the Colonial Office, proposing to transfer the colony; but no answer had as yet been received from the Colonial Office. It was, therefore, impossible to say when the transfer would take place.

MANOR COURTS (IRELAND).

QUESTIONS.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when the scale of compensation to be given to the Seneschals and Registrars of Seneschals, consequent on the abolition of the Manor Courts in Ireland, will be announced?

MR. CARDWELL said, that a Treasury Minute had been prepared, fixing the compensation to be given to the Seneschals and Registrars, consequent on the abolition of the Manor Courts of Ireland.

BRITISH TROOPS IN INDIA.—QUESTION.

GENERAL PEEL said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether there is any truth in the statement that has appeared in the papers, copied from the Oude Gasette, "That tidings have been received at head-quarters of a feeling of discontent still lingering in the minds of the remnants of the late Company's European Troops, especially the Artillery; it has transpired that several of them, in different parts, have been in correspondence, urging each other to agitate for the bounty; to put down this spirit of insubordination the Government has resolved upon some most stringent measures, which the ringleaders will be shortly made to feel."

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had seen the statement to which his right hon. and gallant Friend had referred in the morning papers, but the Government had received no confirmation of the intelligence.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. SCULLY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he is prepared to introduce any reforms or improvements in the present system of National Education in Ireland, and to state their general nature to the House?

MR. CARDWELL replied, that he was in constant communication with various parties on the subject of Education in Ireland; but the House was aware that Her Majesty's Government fully adhered to the principles of the system of National Education in Ireland. With regard to minor changes, none would be made without full opportunity being afforded for their discussion, and the most convenient time for commencing them would be when the Educational Estimates were brought forward.

CUSTOMS ACTS—EXPLANATION.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, Sir, in moving that the House at its rising do adjourn to Monday, I will take the opportunity of answering a question which a noble Lord opposite (Lord W. Graham) has given notice of his intention to ask me, and also to make a short explanation of some Resolutions I am about to lay on the table of the House. The question of the noble Lord is, whether I consider the profits of tenant-farmers to have been largely increased during the last four years, because the Returns to the income tax under Schedule B have increased during that period. It is a mere matter of opinion, on which no argument can be founded. I have arrived at that conclusion, from figures which are open to the inspection of any Member of the House. I am perfectly aware that the immediate test of the payments under Schedule B is the actual rent; but the farmer has the opportunity of proving before the Income-tax Commissioners that his profits are not equal to the charge on him calculated on the rent, and may obtain a relief from a portion of the charge. But on looking at Schedule B, I find that the farmers have not found it to their interest generally to decline the fixed standard of rent, and go on the standard of profit; and from that I assume that the farmers' profits have been fully equal to his assessment calculated on the rental. I think the whole country believes that the farmers' profits during recent years have been considerably greater than they were during a long previous period; and it is evident from the large capital he has found it his interest to lay out in agricultural improvements; for if he were not making a profit he would not be desirous of making such expenditure. The Resolutions to which I have alluded are of importance to the whole commercial community. They are the 11th, 12th, and 13th, in the Committee on Customs Acts, and 1st and 2nd in the Resolutions of the Committee of Ways and Means. The first of these, the 11th, refers to the registration dues to be charged, with some modifications and adjustments, on exports and imports. I will lay the Resolutions on the table forthwith, in the form in which the Government intends to submit them to the sanction of the House, and describe very shortly what will be their effect. The goods are to be considered in the classification under which they fall in the course of business, and according to the methods in which they are respectively handled for the purposes of the public accounts. The goods imported into this country are divided into two classes—those liable to the payment of duty and those that are free. They are both very large; but the second class will henceforth, I hope, be the larger of the two. So far as goods liable to duty on importation into this country are concerned, inasmuch as the collection of the duty itself requires the operation of registration, we do not propose to levy on those goods any additional charge whatever. With respect, however, to goods which come into this country free of duty, and in respect to which the Customs' establishment is necessarily put to a great amount of labour, we propose to charge 1d. on each unit of entry, but with such modifications as will have for their general object to prevent that charge from exceeding in any case the ordinary ad valorem rate of one-quarter per cent. With regard to the goods exported from this country, and of which there are four important classes, we intend to submit to the House the following arrangements for its approval:—The first of the classes to which I allude is that which is embraced under the head of trans-shipments. A very large trade is carried on in this country in the case of goods which are never landed, but of which account is taken by the Customs' Department, and with respect to which a considerable amount of labour is incurred. It would, however, in my opinion, be extremely inexpedient to charge on those goods such an amount as would impede the course of trade, or which would be regarded as in any way burdensome. In the case, therefore, of goods which are simply trans-shipped, we propose that they should be charged at the rate of 1s. on the value for each £100 worth. In reference to foreign goods exported from this country out of warehouse—that is to say, which would have been liable to duty if delivered for consumption here, and in respect of which the Customs, if they had been delivered for consumption, would have been reimbursed for their labour by receiving the required duty—it is our intention to levy on the whole of that class of goods a charge of 1d., fixed on the weight in the case of solids, and on the measure in the case of liquids, according to the tariff, which will be very simple, inasmuch as the whole of the goods warehoused in this country will be reduced to nine or ten articles. Solid goods, then, will in general be charged on every 100lb. weight at the rate of 1d., but in one or two cases at the rate of 1d. on every 50lb. In the case of liquids the charge will be at the rate of 1d. on every five gallons. There is another class of goods, which being foreign in their origin, but coming into this country without any payment of duty, are exported after having undergone here some particular sort of operation. Those free imports which have not gone into warehouses, but have been landed, and subsequently sent abroad, we consider to belong to the same class as British goods when exported. It is necessary to take with respect to them an accurate account. Now, in the case of that particular description of exports, it is evident that the simplest as well as the most accurate mode of proceeding is to charge a small fee according to their value, and which shall have no reference to the number of packages or the description of articles exported. The reason why I look upon value as the best standard to take in this instance is that the value of the goods is invariably set forth in the document, which it is necessary should be presented before any goods can be exported, and that the imposition of a small charge will give the means of effecting improvements which, as I shall on some future occasion be able to show the House, are much needed in order to procure an accurate statistical account of the exports of the country. There will, therefore, according to my proposed arrangement, be three modes of charge—one of 1*d.* on free imports; another of 1*d.* on foreign goods out of warehouse; a third, a charge of one-eighth per cent ad valorem on British goods when exported, and on foreign goods imported free of duty, and re-exported never having paid any. [Sir S. NORTH-COTE: What will be the rate fixed upon those goods on which drawbacks have been paid?] They do not require any separate arrangement. Goods trans-shipped will be charged at the rate of 1*s.* on the value, and corn and timber, which are liable to a low duty on importation, but which, nevertheless, do not go into warehouse at all, we propose shall be subjected neither to registration dues on importation, nor to any charge when re-exported; we consider that the low duty they have paid should be taken to cover the charges of registration. It will be found by the Resolutions which I shall lay on the table for the purpose of carrying into effect the proposals of the Government with regard to registration dues that such an adjustment has been made as to secure the sum of nearly £300,000, upon which my calculations were based. The next Resolution, No. 12, relates to the removal of goods in warehouse. I must own that objection might very fairly be taken to that Resolution in the form in which it was originally presented to the House, both on the ground that the charge which it fixed was too high, and that it would operate with undue weight in those instances in which successive removals of goods might take place. The total amount which we hope to receive from the charge on removal is not large, and were it only a mere question of finance which was involved in the matter, we might have abandoned the £50,000 or £60,000 a year which we hope to derive from this charge. There is, however, another consideration connected with this impost, to which some degree of importance is to be attached. It is only by means of a charge on removal that we can establish a self-acting registration where bonding privileges exist, for in inland towns and in ports of secondary importance, the expense attendant upon keeping up a separate establishment would by no means be reimbursed to the State by any revenue derived from the bonded merchandise. We therefore propose to continue the charge on removal, making a reduction in the amount, so that in future it shall be a uniform charge of 1*d.* on each £1 of duty to which the articles subject to it may be liable. I may add that in the case of tobacco, the duty on which is enormous, we propose that the charge shall be a halfpenny. It is also our intention that the charge for removal shall be levied along with the charge for duty. By this arrangement it will only be levied once, inasmuch as it will only be paid on the final removal from the warehouse. The charge will be levied on the purchaser of the goods when he pays the duty: and in this way it will be levied over the whole of the community, and will not fall exclusively upon the dealer in bonded goods. There is also another change which I propose to make, which, I trust, will add something to the revenue of the country, but which I adopt not so much on that account as because I deem it absolutely necessary to remedy a glaring anomaly in the case of removals which at present exists, but which would be ten times more glaring in consequence of the alteration in the duties of wine, tending to produce a considerable increase in import of that article, which the House has deemed it right to sanction. In accordance with the present law, while every man who deals in wine pays a duty and is liable to be called upon to take out a ten-guinea licence, it is open to any person who may think fit to do so to deal in wine which has not paid duty, bonded in warehouse, without taking out any licence whatsoever. It would, therefore, in my opinion, be most unjust to the general dealer in wine to permit this exemption any longer to exist, especially under the altered circumstances of the wine trade which we expect will take place. We therefore propose that all persons dealing in bonded wine or spirits in a less quantity than ninety gallons shall be liable to be called upon to take out a ten-guinea licence. Many persons are desirous that on all classes dealing in bonded goods a certain charge should be laid, but I am of opinion that such a course could not be taken without subjecting the public to much vexation, and that its operation would be attended with a great deal of difficulty. With respect to the third Resolution—namely, that which relates to operations in warehouses—I have to state to the House that the principle on which the Resolution proceeds is to reduce the rate of charge, which is undoubtedly higher than is necessary, and to define more equitably and more particularly the particular cases to which that rate of charge should be applicable. These three Resolutions will have to be considered in the Committee on the Customs Acts, and, taken together with the hop duties, I believe they are the only three which remain to be thus considered. There is one proposal which I wish to make for the purpose of removing anomalies, and it is but a duty of 1s. per ton on foreign shipbuilding wood. I make that proposal with the view of equalizing the position of the builders of foreign ships which come into this country for registration, and the builders of ships here who are called upon to pay a low duty on the material of which the ships are made. These, then, are the Resolutions which are to be proposed in Committee on the Customs' duties. There are, however, two others with respect to which much discussion is likely to take place—I allude to those relating to dock-warrants and to contract notes. These I cannot lay upon the table in an amended form to-night, but I can state to the Committee the substantial end to which they will be directed. They bear upon four classes of subjects, which are entirely distinct from one another. The first is notes issued by dealers in stocks, shares, and securities, and the proposal to impose a 1d. stamp on these notes has been, I think, in principle generally approved. I shall propose a Resolution for the purpose of giving effect to that principle; but I shall also propose, in order to prevent its bearing hardly and inconveniently on some classes of transactions, particularly those connected with certain charities, that there shall be an exemption of all transactions where the value of the stock, share, or security to which they refer, shall not exceed £20. That disposes of the question of contract notes furnished by brokers, dealers, or middle men. The second class are dock warrants, which are intended to serve as distinct and independent evidence of the existence of certain goods; and that evidence is supplied, not by the owner or vendor of the goods, but by an independent person—namely, the owner of the warehouse or wharf in which the goods are deposited, whether he be an individual or a company. When the document that thus traces the existence of the goods has acquired such independent evidence, it becomes a security capable of being deposited, and being the basis of an advance of money. In that character I propose that all dock warrants, so defined, whether issued by companies or individuals, shall, as negotiable instruments, be charged with a stamp of 3d. The remaining question relates to two other subjects—namely, delivery orders and contract notes, or notes of purchase and sale of produce. On examining this question, I am bound to admit that if we do lay 1d. of charge on delivery orders and contract notes, the effect in general would be to lay a double tax on some transactions; and likewise, I must admit, so far as contract notes are concerned, it would be extremely difficult to find an adequate legal definition which would make them liable to charge, and which, at the same time, would not include a great many documents it is not intended to include, and which it would be hardly fair to include—such as, for example, all tenders to execute orders or undertake contracts on certain terms—sale notes that are furnished in the corn-trade, and which are absolutely subject to refusal, and may become altogether void. These are documents which it would be very unadvisable to include; and, under these circumstances, reserving the Resolutions, so far as regards stock, shares, and securities, I propose entirely to abandon them, and to apply the 1d. charge to other contract notes. On the other hand, I propose to place 1d. charge on all delivery orders, with the exception of such orders as relate to goods under the value of 40s. That will be the effect of the Resolutions as they will be submitted to the House for their definitive judgment. I do not now enter into the consideration of the particular clauses; but I thought it was desirable that I should at the earliest moment make known the intentions of the Government on these subjects, which, to a considerable degree, hang together. And now, thanking the House for permitting me to make this explanation, I beg leave to lay on the table the four Resolutions to which I have referred, and which will be considered in Committee on the Customs Acts.

Motion made, that the House, at rising, do adjourn till Monday next.

TENANT FARMERS.—INCOME TAX UNDER SCHEDULE B.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM begged to say a very few words with reference to the statement which the right hon. Gentleman ad made in reference to a question of which he (Lord W. Graham) had given notice. His question referred to the profits of tenant farmers and their assessment to the income tax. What were the facts of the case? The payment of a farmer's income tax was calculated upon his rental; thus, if his rent was £300, he paid on £150. But in 1857 the minimum income upon which the income tax was leviable was reduced to £100, which brought under the operation of the law a large number of holders who were before exempt; and as the annual value of every acre of land occupied by any person, no matter for what purpose, was added under Schedule B to his income derived from other sources, it was obvious that a large addition must be made by this alteration. Then there was a general desire to increase the size of farms by placing two or three small holdings together, which brought them immediately within the operation of the income tax, though separately they paid no tax. Nor should it be forgotten that large sums were annually expended on drainage, farm buildings, and other permanent improvements which were generally paid for by adding 5 or 6 per cent to the rental. When all these causes were combined, it was evident that the increase under Schedule B must be owing very largely, if not altogether, to these causes. In some places in Scotland, perhaps, some small increase of rental might have taken place; but he was not aware that such had been the case in England, certainly not in that part he had the honour to represent; and knowing that the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given rise to great surprise and dissatisfaction among the tenant farmers, he had taken the opportunity of adverting to a statement which was calculated, he believed, to mislead public opinion.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.

QUESTION.

MR. W. S. LINDSAY said, he rose to ask the President of the Board of Trade when Her Majesty's Government intend to introduce measures to carry into effect the recommendation of the Harbours of Refuge Commission. It would be remembered that a Committee of that House was appointed some years back to inquire into the subject of harbours of refuge, and they arrived at the conclusion that on national as well as commercial grounds such har-bours ought to be constructed at as early a period as possible; and they finished by saying that with regard to the welfare of the nation, and the dangerous and unprotected state of our coast, there was no object to which the public money could be more usefully and more properly applied. After that a Royal Commission, of which he was a member, was appointed to make a similar investigation; and the members, after devoting five months to the inquiry, reported unanimously in favour of the establishment of harbours of refuge. On a former evening he understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to state that the President of the Board of Trade had under consideration the best mode of carrying out the recommendations of the Commission; and he (Mr. Lindsay) wished to know when the right hon. Gentleman intended to introduce a measure on the subject.

SIR FREDERICK SMITH said, he was on the Committee in 1858, and subsequently was a member of the Royal Commission on the subject. The estimated amount proposed by the Commission as necessary for the construction of harbours of refuge, and the consequent safety of life and property, was £2,000,000, which it was proposed to spread over ten years, at the rate of £200,000 a year. He had the honour of attending a deputation to the Prime Minister a short time ago. The matter was then laid very fully before his Lordship, who conceded the necessity of taking some steps in the matter. When it was borne in mind that we lost 850 mariners annually, as well as property of the value of £1,500,000, chiefly owing to the want of harbours of refuge along our coasts, it could not be denied that the question was one deserving the attention of Her Majesty's Government. If a war should break out with the northern Powers we had no available harbour of refuge along the whole of our eastern seaboard. Sailing vessels were now decreasing, steamers increasing, and this caused a greater necessity for having our ships, which were the nursery of seamen, adequately protected by harbours. Therefore he hoped that Government would state the steps they intended to take; and he might observe that the first year they probably would not require to carry out the recommendation of the Royal Commission a greater sum than £100,000.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, this subject had undergone more inquiry not two years than any other before the House. Two years since was appointed on the refuge; they examined every thing they agreed to a report which was adopted almost entirely by the Commission. When the enormous life and property was concerned the trifling sum of money required to secure the shipping loss, it was a matter of importance that the works recommended by both the Committee and the Commission should be at once proceeded upon. There were four or five principal turning points of the coast—particularly in want of protection Bay was one of them. In the case of Merchant shipping the Lloyd's List for February 29 were produced, and the statement would astonish and amaze. It proved that very losses at sea on those two have been prevented had protection of refuge been in existence. There were often 400 or 500 lying about Flamborough Head, even of a north-east wind they could clear the Yorkshire coast of great importance then nothing should be made in this. It was a matter of national importance—it was also a matter of nature. It was a fact that there was on the whole east coast of England between the More Frith or Forth and Yarmouth Roads, which could be maintained. He pressed most strongly on the Government that he should be relieved by the sum the works depend upon it few questions the House that more urgently the attention of the Government of preventing the annual equal to the crew of a first-rate war and of money to the million and a half on the low-

MR GIBSON replied, that in the inquiries that had taken the Committee of the House and the Commission to which number had adverted, the Government it to be their duty to give a very careful consideration. Great expectations had been raised several inquiries. The Government formed opinions as to the Elphinstone proposals that ought to be submitted to Parliament consequent upon them. Their views would be stated when the course of public business would permit it; but at present he must claim the indulgence of his hon. Friend if he declined to go into the details of any plan that might have been under the consideration of Government. All he could now say was that when the course of public business would admit the views of Government would be stated; and he assured the hon. Gentleman that the importance of the subject was duly appreciated by them.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT. QUESTION.

MR. WISE said, he rose to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any Report has recently been made on the condition of the Stone-work of the Houses of Parliament, and what has been done with the £7,280 voted last Session for the purpose of indurating the external Stone-work of the said Houses of Parliament. In 1836 a Committee of twenty-four Members considered a great number of plans, which were submitted by architects, for the New Houses of Parliament, and the one of Mr. (now Sir Charles Barry) was selected, at an estimate of £774,560, excluding a larger sum for the courts of law. But up to the present moment no less a sum than £2,198,000 had been actually expended upon it, exclusive of the charge for free-works, statutory, and temporary offices. Before the undertaking was commenced a Commission, including Sir Henry de la Beche, Dr. Smith, Sir Charles Barry, and Mr. C. H. Smith, was appointed to consider what was the best stone to adopt. The Commission, having visited a great number of quarries and inspected many public edifices, and tested a great variety of stone, recommended the use of the Bolsover stone—a magnesian limestone—and it was then hoped that a structure would be raised which would not only last for an age, but would serve as a noble monument of the architecture of our times to a remote posterity. The Commission reported that the Bolsover stone combined the requisites of durability, economy of construction, beauty of colour, and other qualities. But the contract entered into for the supply of the material was cancelled, and a new quarry opened belonging to the late Duke of Leeds, the stone obtained from which was, in the estimation of experienced builders, of an inferior description. In 1854, understanding there was some ground for anxiety as to the durability of the fabric thus erected, he, himself, put a question in that House to the late Sir William Molesworth, then first Commissioner of Works, who replied that he had good authority for stating that the stone which had been used was, on the whole, very good, and contained no greater proportion of faulty material than was usually found in so large a quantity. Since that assurance was given they had, unfortunately, had too convincing proof to the contrary; for last year the House was asked for a Vote of £7,500 for the purpose of "indurating" it. Who was responsible for what had occurred? At a meeting of scientific men held in the month of February last at the house of the Society of Arts, Mr. C. Smith, one of the Commissioners previously appointed, as above stated, to ascertain and determine what was the best stone to employ in the erection of the Houses of Parliament, made a declaration with regard to the selection of magnesian limestone for that purpose. Mr. Smith stated his belief that if the same Commission had had to conduct their investigation over again they would have come to the same decision; but that, no person having been appointed to exercise a supervision over the stone as it was delivered from the quarry, it was not surprising if the quarrymen had been under a temptation to supply a quantity of bad stone along with the good; and that he only wondered that, in the absence of inspection, things were not much worse than they were. Here, then, was a plain charge that proper supervision had not been exercised over the delivery of the stone, and the question was who was responsible for so serious a neglect. The consequence of this was, that they now found inferior material had been used, and large sums in addition to the enormous outlay already incurred would be required to preserve these buildings from a decay which ought to have been foreseen and guarded against. Sir Christopher Wren did not so manage matters when he built St. Paul's Cathedral and the many churches which he erected. At the bottom of that state of affairs lay, he believed, the modern system of contracts, which gave great profit to the few and inflicted great injury on the many. The same remarks applied to Buckingham Palace, where the structure was in a most disgraceful condition. The adoption of an excessive ornamentation not originally contemplated for the Houses of Parliament had a tendency to subject the buildings to the atmospheric influences of that metropolis, where 3,000,000 tons of coal were annually consumed, producing sulphuric acid, carbonic acid, ammonia, and many other gases, which were particularly injurious to stone-work of a porous nature, to say nothing of the ordinary action of the elements. He hoped that it would be found that he was an alarmist, but from what he had seen he was afraid that the Chief Commissioner of Works would not be able to give so satisfactory an answer to his question as the House would be glad to hear. For some time he had noticed a rapid, constant, and increasing disruption of the surface of the stone, especially on the terrace front. The decomposition was not confined to the plain face of the stone, but extended to the sills, bases, capitals, plinths, and the stone-work above and below all these. Several of the entablatures, lions, shields, and the carving generally were beginning to be affected; and he was afraid that some of the old Druids might fancy they were much older than they really were, and that King John or some other old monarch might fall from his niche, and that the only ruler in British history who had not found a place in the building might suppose that room was being made for him among the Sovereigns. He should be glad to know from the Chief Commissioner of Works what remedy he proposed to adopt for this state of things. He had seen a great deal of scraping going on, and had observed men applying several different compositions and washes, or, as he might call them, architectural cosmetics, to different parts of the building, to which they would give very much the appearance of a Joseph's coat. Some of these washes might be effectual; but, unless they entirely destroyed the porosity of the stone, it would, in his opinion, be quite impossible to prevent its decomposition. We had not yet done with building; we were to have a new Foreign Office and other public buildings, and he hoped that Her Majesty's Government would consider this great stone question, and would not leave a stone unturned until they had arrived at a satisfactory conclusion in regard to it.

HYDE PARK.—QUESTION.

MR. MILD MAY said, before the hon. Gentleman rose, perhaps he had better put of which he had given notice, is his intention to entrust the removal of the shrubs in Hyde Park to a person to whom the planting was done on the previous occasion?

EWART said, he would also have the opportunity of putting his Question whether access can be given for the use of the space now railed off in the Hyde Park, near the Deputy Judge, formerly open to the public, in complaint to which it referred to the way: formerly the cattle were allowed to range over the Park, but as it was found to be inconvenient, it was shut out as some compensation to the public a space was railed off for the use of the cattle, and from which the public was excluded. But he did not see of the public who wished it to have access to that part of the Park in the cattle.

MR. SHILLIBEY said, he should like to know the mystery connected with the removal of the shrubs from Hyde Park because the condition of Hyde Park was of interest to all classes in the country.

The noble Lord at the head of the Government stated on a former occasion that the shrubs were removed because they were not properly planted. It was stated that this declaration cast some doubt on those to whom was entrusted the removal of the shrubs voted by this House for the removal of the shrubs. The noble Lord who was then Chief Commissioner of the Woods was not there to defend the removal, but he thought it his duty not to allow a question to be made without asking for an explanation. He knew the noble Lord got his information, after he had appeared in the publication Mr. Mann, the Superintendent of the Hyde Park, who stated that deciduous green shrubs thrive ill when they are cut down.

flowers, and therefore they are cut down. For himself he could say that he had watched these plants with great care, making allowance for the dry season last summer, he never saw plants better. But if they did not it was the fault of those who had the charge of them last summer, and never watered them through the drought. He believed the real reason of their removal was that the individuals living in the neighbourhood objected to them. He wished to know whether that was not the case? and whether those plants had been taken with such care that they could be planted again.

For he was told that though of great value the operation had been performed with great carelessness. He wished also to ask whether it was the intention of the Government to proceed at once with the works in the Green Park.

MR. COWPER said, that with respect to the Question of the hon. Member for Stafford, every means, popularly believed in, had been taken to procure the best stone for the erection of the Houses of Parliament. A Royal Commission, a contract with the lowest bidder, and an architect, under the sole control of the House, but without attaining the object; for that which had been recommended as the best stone that England could produce had been found not to combine those exact proportions of carbonate of lime and carbonate of magnesia which were expected to make it indestructible. On the contrary, the action of the weather upon it had been such that on the river front, not merely on the carved portions, but on many of the plain surfaces where the water dripped, the decay was advancing most rapidly. The only thing which could now be done was to find some composition which would render the stone impervious to moisture, and would have the same effect upon it as paint had upon wood and iron. There were several compositions which professed to attain that object, and two of them—one patented by Mr. Ransome, and the other invented by Mr. Szefermey—were now being tried. As far as ordinary investigation could go they seemed to promise very fairly; but he had thought it desirable to ask Mr. Faraday and Sir Roderick Murchison to examine and report upon these experiments, and he trusted that their labours would be more successful than were those of the Commission which sat sixteen years ago, to which the hon. Gentleman had referred. He did not think it right to expend any of the money which had last year been voted by Parliament, until it had been shown that this operation was completely successful in excluding moisture and preventing the decay of the stone. In answer to the numerous Questions which had been put to him by several hon. Friends, with reference to the removal of shrubs and plants in Hyde Park, he had better state simply what he believed had occurred with respect to that matter. It appeared that when his predecessor in office (Mr. FitzRoy), whose loss was so deeply lamented by every hon. Member in that House, considered the subject, he thought that it would be better to increase the space devoted to flowers, and to curtail that occupied by shrubs. He seemed upon several occasions to have expressed the opinion that such a mixture of trees, shrubs, and flowers was not altogether desirable; and, although he did not wish to make that portion of the Park bare, he desired to substitute a new and better arrangement of shrubs and flowers for that which then existed. Early in October Mr. FitzRoy gave orders that the trees and shrubs should be removed; but, in deference to the suggestions of others, the operation was postponed till the end of November. There was no reason to suppose that the trees and shrubs were planted in an improper manner. They were planted under the superintendence of Lord Llanover, whose practical skill and zeal in all matters relating to the Parks were a guarantee that the work was well and carefully done. He was not aware that any serious damage had been done to the trees and shrubs which were removed; on the contrary, he was informed that when they were again placed in the ground they would sprout and grow as vigorously as before. In accordance with the general desire, all the ground to which reference had been made would be planted with flowers, as far as the means at the disposal of the Government would allow; and where the space was too large for flowers there would be shrubs, either deciduous or evergreens. Everything would be done to render the spot a pleasant and agreeable walk to the inhabitants of the metropolis, and he thought the work could not be entrusted to a more competent person than the Superintendent of the Park. In reply to the question of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart), he would state that when, for the convenience of the public, the cows were prohibited from ranging freely over the whole of the park a fence was put up in the neighbourhood of the Deputy Ranger's house, in order that the cows might be circumscribed in their walks. The only mistake which occurred was that, for the purpose of shutting in the cows, a fence was put up which also shut out the public. As soon as he heard of that he desired that openings should be made in the iron railings of a size too small to let the cows out, but at the same time large enough to admit a man, a child, and, if possible, a lady. If those openings were either too wide or too narrow, he should be glad to alter them to suit the convenience of the public.

DELHI PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

MR. WAY said, he rose to put the Question, of which he had given notice to the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Batta granted to the Troops who were present at the siege and capture of Delhi is to be deducted from the Prize Money? Great alarm had been excited in consequence of a statement made by a high authority on the subject of India in "another place," to the effect that the army which captured Delhi was to have deducted from the proceeds of prize property, to which they were entitled, the batta which they had already received for the same service. Now, he did not mean to detain the House with the incidents of the memorable siege of that city, which was the stronghold of the revolt, and which, from its extent, its wealth, and its great resources was looked on as one of the strongest fortresses in Hindostan; but the House would remember the vast importance which was attached to the reduction of that focus of the mutiny, not in England only, but throughout Europe, and over the whole of Asia. It was then considered that the very existence of our Indian empire hung suspended on the fortune of the army before Delhi. For four months that gallant army was exposed to all the vicissitudes of an Indian season—to fevers and dysenteries and diseases of all kinds; it fought thirty-six battles, in every one of which it was victorious, though in every one it fought against apparently overwhelming odds. He believed that in after times the reduction of Delhi would be placed among the most brilliant achievements of the age. On the 14th September a general order was issued by General Sir Archdale Wilson promising the troops that all the property captured in Delhi should be equitably divided among them. That order was to be found in the order-book of the 9th Lancers, now stationed at Exeter, and he had been informed by a distinguished officer of the 60th Rifles who had seen it that it was to the effect he had stated. He insisted the more on this point because he wished to keep the question of the prize money distinct from batta, and the question of batta distinct from prize money. On the 21st of September the city was in our power, and the troops were only restrained from looting it by this general order issued by Sir Archdale Wilson. When the news of the capture reached Calcutta, Lord Canning ordered the troops six months' batta, being, he believed the utmost extent to which the Governor General had power to go. It was well known, however, that this caused the greatest discontent; many of the men threw the money away, and the walls of Delhi were everywhere chalked with the words, "Delhi captured and India saved for 36 rupees." Afterwards, twelve months' batta was ordered the troops; and it was plain from a document he held in his hand, and which was signed by that distinguished officer General Toombs, who signed it as Paymaster of the Forces in India, that this was a donation and not a payment on account of the prize money. After this he could see no reason why the batta should be deducted from the prize money, unless they were to be told that the achievements of the army had become less important by the lapse of time. Now, however, he was sorry to hear that some doubt had been thrown upon the matter by a statement recently made in the House of Lords, by a high authority on Indian affairs. The House and the country were lately delighted to hear that honour was to be done to the gallant men who had perished in the prosecution of the Arctic discoveries, and he hoped they would not be less just to the widows and orphans of those who had fallen in the capture of that city which was the focus of the mutiny. He believed he was expressing the sentiments of the whole army when he said that if they deducted a single pice or a single anna from the prize money to which the India army was entitled it would excite the greatest discontent and dissatisfaction.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had in reply to the Question of the hon. Member to state, that there was not the slightest intention on the part of the Government to deduct the batta from the prize money.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

QUESTION.

MR. BOWYER said, he wished to ask a Question of the Secretary of State for the Home Department regarding the committal of a Roman Catholic Priest at the Durham Assizes, for refusing to disclose statements made to him in confession. A prisoner had been tried at the Durham Assizes for stealing a watch, which had been given up to the police by a Roman Catholic priest; the clergyman was made a witness, and when he was asked from whom he had received the watch he declined to answer the question on the ground that all the knowledge which he possessed upon the subject had been acquired by him under the secrecy of the confessional. The Judge, however, decided that he was bound to answer the question, and committed him for contempt of court on his expressing his determination not to divulge the secret. Now it was evident that if the priest had answered the question he would have divulged the most material part of the confession, for when a person confessed a theft he was bound to make restitution of the thing stolen; and the watch was, no doubt, given to the priest in confession. The Judge told the priest that he was not asked to divulge anything communicated to him in confession, but he was only asked who gave him the watch. This appeared to be a distinction without a difference. He wished to say nothing but what was respectful to Mr. Justice Hill, but he thought the matter was a mistake and an oppressive one. He thought he was warranted in saying that by the old common law of England anything told under the seal of confession constituted a privilege. An attorney was not required to divulge anything told him by his client, and the seal of confession was certainly not of less high a nature. What he wished to ask was, Whether the rev. Gentleman who had been committed to prison had been set at liberty, and, if not, he should like to know whether the Government would take steps that he might be immediately liberated?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, his knowledge of that case was derived solely from the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman and from the report of the trial which had been published in the newspapers. The prisoner was indicted for stealing a watch; a Roman Catholic priest was called as a witness and sworn; but when asked from whom he had received the watch he had delivered up to the police, he refused to answer the question, and thereupon the Judge committed him. With respect to the law of the case, his opinion entirely differed from that of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The law of England did not, he believed, give a clergyman the right to refuse to answer a question in reference to a communication which had been made to him in confession. A communication which passed between a counsel or attorney and his client, especially on business to which a suit related, was privileged; but no such privilege existed with respect to a clergyman of any denomination, or a physician. As far as he was acquainted with the facts of that case, the question had been pressed by counsel, and the Judge was compelled to commit the clergyman when he persisted in his refusal to answer it. He apprehended that it would have been competent to the counsel to consent to waive the question; and that was, he believed, the course which was usually pursued in cases of that description in Ireland, where such instances naturally arose more frequently than in this country. But as the facts had actually taken place, the Judge, as far as he could see, had no discretion in the matter. He had reason to believe that the clergyman remained in custody only a few minutes, or, at all events, that he was discharged before the close of the day. He had, it was true, received no official intelligence to that effect, but he entertained little or no doubt that that was the fact.

MR. INGHAM rose to bear testimony to the worthy character of the clergyman, and said that he had refused to answer the question simply on account of an insuperable conscientious objection. From what he had heard he had not the least doubt that the rev. gentleman was now released.

SIR FITZROY KELLY observed, that it had been established by a decision of the Exchequer Chamber that communications made in confession were not privileged. He was glad to learn, however, that in this particular case the rev. gentleman had been released.

THE TIMBER DUTIES. QUESTION.

MR. HALIBURTON stated that in the early part of the evening he had presented a petition from a number of merchants connected with North America, praying that an alteration might be made in the differential duties on shipping. They were extremely anxious to be informed at what time this subject would be taken up, and he should therefore be glad to know from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he proposed to proceed to the consideration of this subject. Those gentlemen felt that they had been taken very much by surprise, as they had no means of communicating with their fellow traders on the other side of the Atlantic, with regard to a matter in which they were so materially interested. British colonial merchants had no representative in that House, there was no person charged with the interests of a particular colony, or of the colonies generally; and he therefore wished to ask—though in doing so he was not acting at their request—whether there would be any objection to allow British North Americans to be heard at the bar of the House on a question which was of such great importance, and which they alleged would extinguish the trade of these colonies. He would not detain the House, which he knew was anxious to proceed to the consideration of other subjects, by alluding to the details of the petition; but when the trade of an entire province like that of New Brunswick would be prostrated by the alteration contemplated by the Government, when Canada would be deprived of the means of purchasing and paying for British manufactures by the export of her timber, it was, perhaps, a question of quite as much importance as the shrubs in the Park and the gravel walks for cows. He had a very great repugnance to put this question at all. The petitioners felt, as everybody else must have done, the very contemptuous nature of the answer given the other evening by the right hon. Gentleman on this subject, and it was certainly not of a description to encourage a renewal of the inquiry. He did not stand up to defend British North America—he was not her representative, but merely that of an humble borough in England; but when a question put on behalf of 3,000,000 of unrepresented people, as to whether their exports might be admitted into a neighbouring kingdom under the late treaty, was answered by the taunt that they were already too free, or they would be better off—that the Emperor of the French had his colonies under control, and if the British Government had the bridle and bit on her colonies, they might have been served as well as the French—he did not think it was an answer such as they had a right to expect. They were told in the same breath that they had taxed British Manufactures. He did not defend this course—nor, perhaps, would they thank him for doing so, for they owed no allegiance to that House, although they did to Her Majesty; they were an independent, intelligent, loyal people; they had rights of their own and knew how to maintain them; and they would not thank him if he were to apologize for the fiscal arrangements which they had made. They had taxed British manufactures—they had taxed the manufactures and imports from every country in the world, and placed them on the same footing. They had not adopted the free-trade principles of the Government of this country, nor were they to be taunted for it; they had as much right to their opinion as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to the one-sided free-trade which he had introduced into this country. The sneer, therefore, with which that answer had been given had sunk deeply into the minds of those gentlemen now temporarily domiciled at Liverpool for their own business purposes; and he should be ashamed of them, and ashamed to acknowledge himself a colonist, if they would put up with the superciliousness of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with the neglect of Parliament, or with injustice from any Power on the face of the earth. It was at least to be expected that when men put a civil question, that question should be civilly answered.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Gentleman has closed with a most moderate proposition, that those who put civil questions should receive civil answers; but I am bound to say, if the answer now to be made to him were to depend on the application of his own principle, there might be some doubt as to how far it would be incumbent on me to adopt the rule to which he has referred. The hon. Gentleman spoke of my superciliousness, my taunts, my sneers, my contemptuous answer, and I really was at a loss to imagine what answer of mine the hon. Gentleman referred to; but as the hon. Gentleman went on to give what I will not call a description, but what I will frankly term, in his presence, a gross caricature of an answer which had proceeded from me, I was enabled at once to identify it, and to perceive the total error under which the hon. Gentleman labours with regard to its character. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman heard that answer; I am not sure whether he was in the House at the time.

MR. HALIBURTON: I heard it accurately; it was in answer to a Question that I put myself.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: All I can say is, if the answer was given in Committee, and if the hon. Gentleman thought I had been guilty of a very gross error in making a contemptuous reply to a question involving the interests of great or of small numbers of British subjects—it does not signify which—the hon.

Mr. Haliburton

Gentleman would have done reprehend me there and then if I had done wrong, and confessing my error, and of myself in the eyes of those in such interest, rather than nurse his wrath to keep then come down to the House the plea of putting a question which he is very unwilling the opportunity of making me which I hope are not manner in which I generally discharge my duties in which, I must say, if they would undoubtedly convict me of great culpability, and make me far severer punishment than now received from the hon. Gentleman. I have only to apologize to having noticed this matter. The hon. Gentleman's question, if I is, whether an opportunity for a discussion on the timber likewise whether Her Majesty will be disposed to delay on that subject until the colonies of North America can be heard in the House. [MR. HALIBURTON: With respect to the first question, there has been no opportunity for discussion. I give opportunities for discussion to the hon. Friend the Secretary of the Colonies in compliance with the appointment. I have postponed the discussion of my duties, in order that any hon. Member who might be so disposed might enter into that discussion; which it was adjourned to take place, and I was ready to do so in the House if any question had arisen; but there was no person who was disposed to raise a debate; and that is the Report which the hon. Gentleman will have to make to the British colonists of the vigilance with which he has attended to their interests. If any disposition is now felt to debate that question, Her Majesty's Government will take care to make arrangements for the purpose, and that in some stage of the measure opportunities shall be given to Members for expressing their views. With regard to the proposal of hearing parties at the bar, I believe it is entirely without precedent in the history of modern legislation; no such demands have been made by others much more directly interested, and having more pretensions to a distinct locus standi than the colonists of British North America can on this question strictly said to possess. And therefore I do not think it would be wise to create a precedent which, I believe, would be productive of great delays, and attended with inextricable confusion. I am far from complaining of the hon. Gentleman for giving the frankest utterance to what he regards as the ruinous consequences of the reduction of the timber duties; that is a conscientious feeling on his part, and he is perfectly right to claim whatever opportunities he thinks fit for giving expression to those opinions. For my own part, they, perhaps, make less impression on me; for it is not now for the first time that I hear them. In 1842, and at subsequent periods, I have so often received the most solemn warnings that in consequence of the reduction of the differential duties on foreign timber total and absolute ruin was about to fall on the colonies of British North America, which are now more flourishing than ever, that it is natural I should have become utterly impervious, and that these threats should not find entrance into my mind, notwithstanding that they appear to have got their seat in that of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. HALIBURTON explained that he had not asked the right hon. Gentleman to delay the discussion on the subject of the timber duties until the colonists of British North America could be heard at the bar. He only asked whether those who were now in this country and were interested in the matter would be afforded that opportunity. Perhaps this very misapprehension had given rise to the slur which was conveyed on the first occasion.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

QUESTION.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST said, that in putting the Question which appeared on the paper in his name, he wished to explain the reasons that had induced him to withdraw his Amendment on the previous evening.

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord is out of order in referring to a debate which is past and which has been concluded.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST: The Question he wished to ask related to the annexation of Savoy by the French Emperor. He had felt throughout that the House had been placed in a strange position with regard to the Treaty of Commerce. He was in a very difficult position, but being desirous only to discharge a conscientious duty, he trusted he should receive the kind indulgence of the House. He certainly would not detain the House more than ten minutes. They were asked to decide upon a question of a treaty of friendship with France, when, in consequence of the French Emperor's policy, they did not know whether they might not in a short time be on a footing of estrangement and suspicion with that country. They were asked to conclude a treaty of peace on commercial matters in a spirit of amity and friendship to Frenchmen. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, that the question of the Treaty with France was set down for discussion that evening, and it was contrary to order to discuss, by anticipation, a Motion which stood on the Orders of the Day.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST thought that on the question of Adjournment till Monday, it was competent for him to put a Question, and to make any observations he chose, so long as he confined himself to the subject of that Question. He desired to know whether he would be out of order in making some more remarks, which were pertinent to the Question.

MR. SPEAKER said, the noble Lord was entitled to ask any Question, and he would now, no doubt, confine himself within due limits in proposing his Question.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST, who was continually interrupted by cries of "Order," said, the hon. Member for Bridgwater had, with convenient amiability, postponed his Motion with regard to this important subject at the suggestion of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, until the 19th of the present month, and as if that was not sufficient, that ingenious architect the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes) had already formed a pont d'or for the Government. They were going, by affirming this Treaty, to declare to Europe that their hands were tied up with regard to this question. ["Order!"] He would not now detain the House upon the subject of the Treaty; but on another occasion he would do so at greater length, though owing to the admirable strategy of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, he would have to wait until the 19th March. He would now ask the noble Lord whether Her Majesty's Government had taken any steps, and if so, whether they had any objection to state the nature of them, to obtain the concurrence of Austria, Prussia, and Russia in opposing the rumoured annexation of Savoy to France? He wished to ask also whether they had been made acquainted with the final intentions of Sardinia with reference to this subject; and whether the expressed opinions of Switzerland remained unchanged? The opinions of Switzerland were very strong on the subject. He asked her Majesty's Government whether they had any objection to give the House the information they possessed on these subjects?

MR. KINGLAKE said, that if he could maintain a little more gravity than the House seemed to be possessed of at that moment, he would endeavour to express the indignation with which he had heard the charge made against him by the noble Lord. A charge more ungrounded had never been brought against any Member in that House. He thought he had given on a former occasion a proof that he was not disposed quickly or very easily to give way to any pressure put upon him by the Government for the purpose of inducing him to postpone his Motion. Once, when he was asked by a Minister of the Crown on his responsibility to postpone it, he consented; but on the second occasion when he was asked both by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary and the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes) to postpone it, he declined to do so, and having shown that he was capable of resisting pressure which it was painful to resist, especially when it came from his own side of the House, he asked the House whether it was right that such charges should be brought against him by the noble Lord. If the noble Lord had been in the House on the first occasion, he would have heard the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary declare, that if the question was then brought forward it would prove inconvenient and perhaps dangerous to the public service. After hearing that announcement, could the noble Lord persevere in asserting that he (Mr. Kinglake) had, with a convenient yielding, assented to the suggestion of the Government? He appealed to the House whether it was fitting that a charge of this description should be made on grounds so totally insufficient.

TENANT FARMERS.—AGRICULTURAL PROSPERITY.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. PACKE could not allow the debate to close—he meant the debate on the Motion for Adjournment—for it had quite assumed the character of a debate—without adverting to the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who opened the discussion by anticipating a question which was to be put to him with regard to the agriculture of this kingdom. The right hon. Gentleman had said that farmers had benefited by free trade, and had challenged any man to rise and contradict that statement. Now, he (Mr. Packe) knew that in 1849, 1850, and 1851 the farmers were, in consequence of free trade measures, principally as regarded corn, in a very distressed state; and with regard to graziers, there was scarcely one who had taken his oxen to market who had not suffered a severe loss by their contracting virulent diseases, introduced by the importation of foreign cattle. The consequence of free trade had been that the small farmers had been swept away, while those with large capital had been able to go on. He thought it his duty to state, on the part of the farmers of this country, who were the most patient people on the face of the earth, that though they had kept their heads above water, they had not been able to make the profits of former years. The Budget must prove most injurious to the farmers, for the importation of wine must lessen the consumption of malt.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, as there had been discussions on so many different subjects, he was glad to see his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) in his place, and he hoped he had taken a note of that evening's proceedings. He would certainly encourage his right hon. Friend to make another attempt to stop this practice, which was evidently growing beyond all reasonable bounds, of creating a miscellaneous debate on the Motion for Adjournment until Monday.

LORD ADOLPHUS VANE-TEMPEST, in explanation, said, he had by no means intended to cast an imputation on the conduct of so distinguished a Member of the House as the hon. Member for Bridgwater. By his observations he had simply meant to express his regret that the hon. Gentleman had displayed a spirit of "convenient amiability" in postponing his Motion at the suggestion of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

MR. ROEBUCK: If there has been more than the usual divergence upon the part of hon. Members to-night into a variety of topics, that circumstance, I think, is due to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has led the way in the dance by making a speech upon his Budget in moving the adjournment of the House until Monday.

TENANT FARMERS.—INCOME TAX, SCHEDULE B.—QUESTION.

MR. HENLEY expressed a wish to ascertain from the Chancellor of the Exchequer or some other member of the Government, whether he would be prepared to lay on the table of the House the papers upon which his calculation with respect to the increase of 19 per cent in the incomes classified under Schedule B was based. It would be, he thought, but doing an act of common justice to place those papers in the hands of hon. Members before they were called upon to come to a decision upon the continuance of the income tax.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE TO FRANCE.—EXPLANATION.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The noble Lord the Member for Durham (Lord A. Vane-Tempest) has put to me some questions on a subject of great public interest, and I feel bound to give him such information as I am able in reply to those questions. He asks me if I have taken any steps—and if so, what the nature of those steps is—to obtain the concurrence of Austria, Prussia, and Russia in protesting against the rumoured annexation of Savoy to France. Now, the course which we have adopted in respect to this question is this—We have communicated the correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and that of France on the subject to the Courts of Berlin, Vienna, and St. Petersburg. I may add that we contented ourselves with simply directing our Ministers to communicate that correspondence, and desiring that a copy of it should be handed to the Governments of each of those countries respectively, without asking them to take any steps or to make any suggestion in the matter, but leaving them to adopt such a course as they might deem expedient on a question which is of importance to the interests of Europe. With respect to the probable result of this proceeding I am quite unable to supply the noble Lord with any information beyond this, that the Ministers for Foreign Affairs both at Vienna and Berlin say that they agree generally with the views of Her Majesty's Government on this subject. Neither at Berlin nor Vienna, however, is it absolutely stated what steps their respective Governments propose to take in a matter which certainly requires careful consideration. From St. Petersburg I have received no information with regard to it, probably because the despatch which we sent there was not forwarded so soon as those which were sent to Vienna and Berlin. I may at the same time observe that when any information in answer to the despatch which we forwarded to St. Petersburg reaches us we shall be prepared to lay it on the table the moment it is in a state to be thus communicated to the House. We shall, I may add, have some correspondence from Berlin and Vienna to lay on the table on Monday. The noble Lord has asked me further, whether we are acquainted with the final intentions of Sardinia in reference to the annexation of Savoy to France. Now, in answer to that question I may state that I had placed in my hands by a private friend of Count Cavour a document which was said to be a copy of the Sardinian reply to the proposal of France; but I have been since informed that this document is not quite correct, and therefore I cannot, until I receive further information on the subject from Her Majesty's Minister in Turin, lay on the table any papers in reference to this particular point. I may, however, observe that the substance of the reply of Count Cavour is to the effect that, if the Parliament of Sardinia should deem it expedient to have recourse to a vote of the people of Savoy with respect to the question of its annexation to France, the Sardinian Government would take care that that vote should be taken with every form of liberty, so that the people of Savoy might exercise perfect freedom of choice in deciding whether they would continue under the Sardinian Government or prefer a separation from that country. The answer of Count Cavour then proceeds to state that, should the people of Savoy be in favour of separation, the Government of Sardinia trusts the question will be duly weighed by the other Powers of Europe, and that care will be taken not only of the interests of Switzerland, but due regard will be paid to the security of the frontiers of the kingdom of Sardinia itself. So far as Switzerland is concerned, I believe the views of the Government of that country upon this subject remain quite unchanged, the papers which I shall lay on the table on Monday will show the precise opinion they entertain. All the information we are possessed of will be contained in those papers.

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE—
ADDRESS MOVED.

ADJOURNED DEBATE—SECOND NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [8th March].

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to assure Her Majesty that, having considered the Treaty of Commerce concluded between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, this House begs leave to approach Her Majesty with their sincere and grateful acknowledgments for this new proof of Her Majesty's desire to promote the welfare and happiness of Her subjects:

"To assure Her Majesty that we shall proceed to take such steps as may be necessary for giving effect to a system which we trust will promote a beneficial intercourse between Great Britain and France, tend to the extension of Trade and Manufacture, and give additional security for the continuance of the blessings of Peace."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, as this debate affords the first opportunity which has been presented to the House of considering the Commercial Treaty with France as a whole, I will follow the example which has been set by the Mover and Seconder of the Address, and before I direct the attention of the House to the Amendment which I am about to propose, discuss the general policy and general character of the Treaty itself. The readiness with which the House has voted the financial Resolutions which are necessary in order to give the Treaty effect shows how desirable, in the opinion of hon. Members, is the extension of our commercial relations with France, and how advantageous the political and moral results which, in their estimation, will be consequent on increased intercourse between two great nations. We have, in assenting to this Treaty, made large fiscal sacrifices, to be compensated for by the imposition of new burdens; and while we have thus borne our testimony to the value which we set on the friendship of France, we have done our utmost to aid Her Majesty's Ministers in their laudable endeavour to perpetuate and strengthen that friendship. We have made concessions to France upon our side which might be made independent of Treaty, and she has also on her part made concessions to this country for the purpose of carrying which into effect no Treaty was necessary; and we now stand in the position of being invited to express our approbation of the peculiar mode of giving effect to their policy which the Government has adopted. And since all these concessions might have been made altogether independent of any treaty, I will first inquire why a treaty has been resorted to for that purpose. Now, I must contend that to enter into a treaty of reciprocity is a retrograde step for England to take. It is a step which is inconvenient, and which may lead to embarrassment. I make this statement because I am of opinion that if there be one right which more than another it becomes the Parliament of England to guard most vigilantly, it is that which gives us a complete control over our domestic, and especially over our fiscal arrangements, so that we might be able to increase, to diminish, or to modify our national expenditure or our fiscal regulations in accordance with what may happen to be the true interests and the real exigencies of our own people. Now, by entering into a treaty of reciprocity, this is a right we abandon; and, having concluded this Treaty with France, we shall have no power next year to rectify any omissions or oversights which may be found in it. We give up our legislative freedom; we barter it away to another Power; so that the control over the taxation of England will no longer rest exclusively with her own Parliament, but will be, as it were, a portion of the business of the French Government. We have, in short, by this Treaty, bound ourselves indissolubly to France, and henceforward it is only by her good favour that our fetters can be relaxed. We have, in acceding to it, violated one of the first principles of our commercial code—the repudiation of the doctrine of reciprocity. This, I contend, is a great sacrifice to a nation that has been so proud of its independence—it is a sacrifice so great as to be hardly capable of exaggeration—a sacrifice which could only be justified by some great impending evil to be avoided, or some good to arise so large and so legitimate, that no price which we could pay would be too high. It is necessary, therefore, to turn to Her Majesty's Ministers, and ask what are their motives for entering into this Treaty, and what is its compensation. For some time—for a long time—this has been asked in vain. When the existence of this Treaty was first announced, we were told by the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown that this particular form of arrangement was necessitated by the peculiar constitution of France, and must have been resorted to in order to provide that security for the fulfilment of the stipulations into which she was prepared to enter which the interests of England required. But security for the equivalents we were receiving implies that England sought the Treaty, and required to have equivalents secured to her. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us we were entitled to no equivalent, and that we are doing by Treaty what it is our interest to do without Treaty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer most significantly avoided all explanation of the reason for a Treaty; and I must say I appreciate his motives in doing so. But at a later period the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs was compelled to give some explanation, and then he told us—what I do not wonder the Government for some time was reluctant to avow—the real reason was, that in France the prohibitionists were too strong for the Emperor; they had the command of the Legislative Chamber. [Lord JOHN RUSSELL: I did not say so.] I cannot presume to quote the exact words of the noble Lord, but I understood him to say we are obliged to resort to a treaty to effect a change which probably the Legislative Chamber would not sanction.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I said nothing of the Legislative Chamber at all.

MR. HORSMAN: I thought I heard the noble Lord say that a treaty had been resorted to, because by the ordinary constitutional mode of submitting a project of law to the Legislature, it was likely not to be sanctioned. That was the statement we heard; and it only confirmed statements which had reached us from every side before. It comes to this—that the Emperor of the French is a Free-trader; the French nation are Protectionists, and, therefore, if left to settle the question between themselves, it must be settled adversely to the Emperor, because the project, if submitted to the Legislative Chambers, would certainly be rejected. Every man in the House knows that to be the case. In this difficulty the Emperor of the French addresses himself to the English Cabinet. “Deal with me,” he says, “by a treaty of reciprocity. To be sure, it is against your law, but it won’t be the first time you have endeavoured to oblige me by changing your law.” “Give me,” he says, “a treaty of reciprocity; by this means I can laugh at my Chambers, and can force free trade down the throats of my reluctant subjects.” The Cabinet of England appeals to us, the constitutional representatives of this moral country, and they think that we, the House of Commons, do good service to the principles we represent by making ourselves, I will not say the accomplices, but the instruments, through whom the ruler of France may evade the constitutional control of his own Legislature; and that we would deem it just and generous and politic to lend ourselves to a device by which he may mock his subjects. And with this motive, patent to all the world, we are to proceed to loosen one of the fundamental principles of our commercial code, and compromise and confuse the policy of England to meet the necessities of France. Now, these are the motives of the Treaty; and what is to be the compensation? By this act, say the admirers of the Treaty, you secure the friendship of the French nation; by helping their Emperor to jockey them you secure their eternal gratitude; you will get such a hold of their affections that old jealousies and animosities will become as dead as reciprocity was six months ago; and, as to the war party in France, you will never hear of it again, as M. Chevalier said the other day; and those who were wont to exclaim against perfidious Albion would hasten to the Hotel Meurice to enrol themselves as members of the Peace Society. Such are the great results we have been promised. Peace, friendship, gratitude, are great results, but they are not all. There is something more behind. This, it is said, is a transaction which will turn out most profitable for England. We shall make great profit by it. Our coalowners, our ironmasters will get new markets; our manufacturers will have a new nation of customers; French wines and silks shall be cheapened and made accessible to all the middle class; there shall be, as was expressed by an hon. Baronet behind me, a millennium of prosperity; and, if any weak brother in Lancashire or elsewhere has a conscience to prick him for having behaved rather shabbily to his poor French neighbours, let him count his gains, go home thankful, and be satisfied. Sir, this is a very glowing prospectus of the new course on which we are invited to embark. But my objection is, that like many a promising prospectus, it is based on false calculations, and even as a commercial speculation it may not pay. The equivalents we are promised are of two kinds, material and moral. The material equivalents are in the direction of free trade. Sir, I studied the principles of free trade—I adopted them long before they were embraced by any occupant of the Treasury Bench except the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. P. Villiers). I am not to be told now, by Gentlemen who throw up their hats at the eleventh hour that I do not comprehend its principles or appreciate its spirit. The principles of free trade, carried fairly out as I understand them, have for their object and result to unite nations together by common interests, to make them mutually dependent and assistant, to erase geographical distinctions, and unite France and England together as closely, as indissolubly, as Lancashire and Yorkshire are united together, so that whatever benefits the one must react on the other, and whatever conduces to the material wealth and prosperity of the one must add to the wealth and prosperity of the other; and, therefore, on the narrowest grounds of selfish policy, every consistent Free-trader would desire to promote the material prosperity of France as a great advantage to England. My opinion is also, that the moral benefits conferred on nations by free trade are even greater than the material. It was well said by the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) last night, that the commercial intercourse of nations is the great security for peace, and peace is the great moral agent for civilizing and elevating mankind. Therefore, free trade is, in my mind, associated not merely with wealth and commerce, but with the peace and morality of nations. But it is quite consistent with those opinions that, when there is an entirely exceptional state of things in France—when the military element predominates over the commercial—when you have a policy of aggression and aggrandizement openly avowed and unscrupulously carried out—when you have armaments by sea and land such as the world has never seen before, and a military organization unknown since the days of the Roman Empire—it is, I say, quite consistent with the appreciation of free-trade principles, that I should hold that this is not precisely the moment when we should part with our legislative independence, especially to that Power whose menacing attitude to ourselves imposes on us in time of peace war taxes and burdens and a grievous expenditure in order to protect us from the attacks which we apprehend from herself. My difference with those who see so much in favour of this Treaty as to the application of free trade is in reality not so much a matter of principle as a matter of definition. When they speak of France they mean the French Emperor; when I speak of France I speak of the French nation. And there is a distinction to be drawn which this Treaty ignores between the free intercourse of nations, patent to all the world, and the intrigues of Governments, that are a secret to everybody but themselves. It is because the Treaty ignores that distinction that I say it is founded on false principles—it violates the first principles of commercial freedom and international right—and on that ground I believe it may yet bear bitter and pernicious fruits. The material equivalents we are promised are two—first, the admission of our coal and iron at a low duty, and then the admission of our manufactures at a protective duty beginning at 30 per cent, by and by to be reduced to 25 per cent. As to coal and iron, I will leave them till I come to the Amendment I mean to move to the 11th Article. But as to the low duty of 30 per cent on our English manufactures, I believe it is the opinion of those most capable of forming an opinion on this subject, that a protecting duty of 30 per cent will, after all, turn out to be prohibitory. That is the opinion which, I understand, has been pronounced by the Leeds Chamber of Commerce, in a well-considered resolution; and I was somewhat surprised to find that the hon. Member for Leeds, who spoke last night with so much ability and effect, appeared not to have remembered this fact; but they say that is their opinion, and it is confirmed by other authority. I saw it stated in the Journal des Débats, which is a great free-trade authority, and an organ of the Emperor, that 30 per cent was intended by the Emperor to be a prohibitory duty, and that he had outwitted the English negotiators. This has received some confirmation from what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said about French gloves, which were practically excluded by a duty of 15 per cent. As far, then, as material equivalents go, we do not gain much from this Treaty. We allow French manufactures to come in duty free, while our manufactures on entering France are to pay 30 per cent. We derive no revenue whatever from the manufactures of France, while, if the apprehensions entertained across the Channel are realized, France will obtain an immense revenue from our manufactures. Again, the Treaty is not to come into operation on the side of France for eighteen months; on our side it takes effect immediately. In fact, we make a present to the Emperor of no less than two millions, while we have a deficit in our own exchequer that has to be made up from an increased income tax. The reciprocity of all this is somewhat of an Irish character. But then there are the moral equivalents. Through this Treaty you are to secure peace and friendship with France. If these results were indeed to follow, they would be cheaply purchased even at ten times the price now asked from us. But by what subtle process of metaphysical inquiry are we brought to the conclusion that the best way to win the friendship of the French people is to begin by irritating and wounding their feelings? The French are generally esteemed a quick and susceptible race, likely to be jealous of anything that savours of an impertinent meddling on our part between themselves and their Emperor, and peculiarly alive to the ridicule which stings a sensitive man when told that he has been "done." I do not see how, by hurting the amour propre of the French nation, you are to provoke them to love us. Still less can I divine how the prospects of peace are to be improved by our making enemies of the commercial class in France—the only class there hitherto averse to war. The fallacy that lurks beneath these alluring promises lies in confounding the French Emperor with the French people. It is of the very essence of this Treaty that the two are quite distinct. Their views are antagonistic; they take opposite sides. What gratifies the Emperor in this matter offends France. What serves the Emperor, in the estimation of the people ruins France. ["Oh, oh!"] I appeal to those who have taken the trouble to read the French journals, the organs of French opinion. We are asked to side with the Emperor against the people; and on what plea? Because this change is so unpalatable, so odious to the French nation that he cannot carry it by his own influence and power. To be sure his Legislative Chamber is a mere mockery, his nominees compose it, and he can dissolve it at his pleasure. Yet, weak and dependent as it is, it has spirit enough on this occasion to reject a project against which France is so united. England must therefore help him—help him to elude his Chamber by depriving the nation of the last remnant of a voice in the management of its own affairs. And we, who have been proclaiming the right of the Italians to choose their own form of Government, are to refuse the French nation the right to choose its own form of taxation; we are to enter into this plot against the French people—to conspire against them with their ruler. We deliver them, surprised, helpless, but irritated and incensed, into his hands. Because you must not imagine that all this, which is so openly done, is lost upon the French nation. This Treaty is not a diplomatic secret, buried in the mysterious recesses of the Foreign Office; no—it is only to take effect if the Parliament of England, in the face of all the world, adopts the new morality of the Code Napoleon. Observe, how ignoble and doubly odious is our part in this transaction. The Emperor had an alternative under the constitution, if he could find an opportunity to use it; but when that constitution was framed he had no such opportunity. So stepping out of our way and changing our law, we give him that opportunity and tempt him to employ it. Any hon. Gentleman who reads the French newspapers will learn for himself what they say of our proceedings. They are saying at this moment, that the Emperor has bribed England to help him to trip up France—that the complicity of a nation of shopkeepers has been purchased through the lust of lucre for sordid purposes, and that our services have been sold to aid him in circumventing his people. The Protectionists of France—if I may say it without offence to the hon. Gentlemen opposite—are a very benighted race; but they are entitled to fair play from us at least. Why not leave them to fight out their quarrel with their own Emperor? Surely he has odds enough in his favour if he wishes to convert them. The Protectionists of France know their own interests, they say, as well as we do, and know how to distinguish the morality we praise and the mammon we worship—between the friendship and the treachery we practise. But the Treaty is in the interests of peace! What says the Moniteur Industriel, which was quoted the other night by the hon. Member for Birmingham? It says, "This Treaty will not come into operation on the part of France for eighteen months. By that time our armaments will be complete, our fleet equipped, and we will blow this treaty to atoms with cannon balls." If the Emperor has not power to carry out this change in 1860, what security have we that he will be able to give effect to it in 1861? If, unfortunately, the French nation are then disposed to pick a quarrel with us, may they not say we have given them a provocation founded on a fraud? If we cannot justify this Treaty to the French nation on moral grounds, no commercial advantages to arise from it can compensate for its evils. But why our hot haste to grasp these alleged commercial advantages? Cannot we be satisfied with the immense material prosperity we are now enjoying from the adoption of free trade, that we must play tricks and tamper with the source of that prosperity? We have not the excuse of commercial pressure or financial embarrassment for this exceptional legislation. All interests are thriving, money-making is going on to an extent unparalleled in the history of the country, and our people are now blessed not only with wealth and comfort, but also contentment. Why endanger all this by a mad chase after more riches and more contentment? No argument could be more untenable than that, having heretofore consistently adhered to a sound political economy, we should now recede from it to help France to advance. The advice which Sir Robert Peel bequeathed to his successors in this matter was, that they should take no heed of foreigners except to set them an example which we might be sure they would sooner or later follow. And just at the very moment when our example is telling on the most powerful and important country in the world we are abandoning our principles in the face of all nations. Even as a commercial speculation I believe that this Treaty will not pay; its profits will not compensate for its risks. We have not found it very profitable attempting to make Free-traders of the Chinese; I hope we are not going to burn our fingers with the French. In his Speech the other day the Emperor of the French said this Treaty only anticipated what he himself would have been compelled in a short time to do without its instrumentality. I believe that the French people would take free trade more readily from their own Emperor, and that they would take it as a poisoned gift from us. I believe that we are prejudicing the question of free trade by associating it in the minds of the French people with the notion of a gift from us:—at any rate, I have no faith in the permanence of any system, commercial or political, which is carried in opposition to the opinion of the people of France by a coup d'état. There is another and a more important ground on which I strongly protest against this Treaty. It has been submitted to us as a political transaction. In that light, also, the commercial changes and financial considerations which it involves have been passed by the Committees of this House; and in that light the House must regard it. Now, our relations with Italy, France, and the other great Powers of Europe are at this moment of a very critical and delicate character. They cast an immense responsibility upon every Member of this House, and impose upon us a duty from the discharge of which we ought not to shrink. Within the last week the Emperor of France has delivered a Speech which has agitated every bourse in Europe. Within the last few days the Minister of that Emperor has published two despatches, one of them addressed to the French Ambassador in London, which have changed the whole aspect of European politics; and while England is still perturbed by this new revelation of the Imperial policy, we are invited before the whole world to enter into this new bond of union and brotherly compact. Now, Sir, I ask, what does a new political alliance with France indicate—to what is it to lead? Let me remind the House of the circumstances under which this Treaty was negotiated, of the circumstances under which it was submitted for our approval. In the letter of instructions addressed by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the British Plenipotentiaries I find this, which is now more than ever a very important passage. He says:—

“Over and above these considerations (the commercial ones), they attach a high social and political value to the conclusion of a Commercial Treaty with France. Its general tendency would be to lay broad and deep foundations in common interest and in friendly intercourse for the confirmation of the amicable relations which so happily exist between the two countries; and while thus making a provision for the future, which would gradually become more and more solid and efficacious, its significance at the present moment, when the condition of some parts of the Continent is critical, would be at once understood, and would powerfully reassure the public mind in the various countries of Europe.”

Now, I ask, what is the construction that any Member of this House would put upon that paragraph? The construction I put upon it is this, that by the Treaty the great Powers of Europe were to be informed that England and France had come to an understanding as to their common policy in regard to the affairs of Europe; and that especially upon the foremost question which was then agitating men's minds, and engrossing the attention of the Cabinets of Europe, the settlement of Italy there was between them that intimate alliance and close accord which would tend to reassure the public mind as to the prospects of peace. I will venture to say that not only is that the construction which would be put upon this paragraph by every Member of this House, but I will appeal to the candour of the noble Lord himself, whether in his own mind that was not the interpretation which he intended to be put upon it. That was the spirit in which the negotiators were instructed to act at the commencement of these negotiations. What was the spirit in which the Treaty was submitted to this House? Were we not advised to adopt it as giving to Europe a public indication of the confidence existing between the Cabinets of England and France, their community of sentiment, and their cordial co-operation and accord upon questions of European policy? Were we not further reminded by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the most eloquent and earnest of the advocates of the Treaty, that an alliance between England and France must be in favour of the freedom and civilization of mankind, and therefore that it could not be too close; and, above all, was not the recommendation to adopt that Treaty preceded by the most solemn assurance that France had no designs on Savoy? By these reiterated assurances, by these solemn declarations, the House was invited to the adoption of the Treaty—which was, we were also told, to be a most significant political demonstration, which could not be mistaken by Europe. A few weeks have passed, and where do we stand now? Will her Majesty's Ministers now venture to recommend the Treaty on the same grounds? Has not the Speech of the Emperor of France blown all these hopes and expectations to the wind? Have not the despatches of the Minister of the Emperor shown that all these promises were based upon a fiction? I would ask has the House of Commons been treated quite frankly—has the public of England been used quite fairly upon this subject? We have had the Savoy papers presented to us. I have read those papers, as every other Member of this House has done, and I have come to the conclusion that some of them form a most favourable contrast to the attitude and demeanour which have on some occasions been adopted by the Government of England towards that of France. I must say that to me it is most refreshing to see the tone and language recently adopted by the noble Lord, the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. It is refreshing to me to see that there is in him the spirit of a statesman and the sound and true heart of an English Minister; and, so far as I can gather his spirit from the perusal of his late despatches, I, for one, should be well content that the honour of England should be left in his hands. But, Sir, I cannot help feeling that the noble Lord is not the whole Cabinet of England; and we have been assured upon high authority that on this, as upon other occasions, there may be differences of opinion. The noble Lord cannot be said to be the master of the Cabinet; on the contrary, we are told that the Cabinet has another master, who is not at present in his place. [The right hon. Gentleman was supposed to hint at Mr. BRIGHT.] We have to day seen it stated in one of the most influential journals of public opinion in France that in England there has been the age of Elizabeth, that there has been the age of Pitt, and that this is the age of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham. Now, I, for one, never grudge my hon. Friend any of the honours which are paid to him. If he were here, I should like to say to him that he has won them bravely. He has won them by his courage; he has won them by his earnestness even more than by his ability. He has won them by the determination and fearlessness with which he has advocated his opinions and his policy. I am one of those who think that earnestness and sincerity are the first qualities of statesmanship. And, therefore, whether or not I agree with my hon. Friend in his opinions, at least I offer him so far the tribute of my respect; but I must be permitted to say that I have for some time past viewed with some anxiety and apprehension, especially with regard to our foreign policy, the predominance of the commercial influence in this House. I prize the commercial greatness of England, and I prize it not merely as a source of wealth and comfort to ourselves, but also as a great instrument of civilization and religion, carrying the influence of England to bless the remotest corners of the globe. But I feel that among nations as among individuals there is a more exalted code than that of self-interest; and the very greatness of England, her place among the nations, her lofty attitude, and her moral grandeur, impose upon her at times duties and obligations proportioned to the space she fills and the power she wields. And with nations as with individuals, there are occasions on which a principle is to be vindicated, an example to be set, a duty to be discharged to others, overriding for the moment what may be most convenient or agreeable to ourselves; and, when such occasions do arise, obedience to the calls of high policy and justice is not less in keeping with the precepts of Christianity when it compels us to prove the sincerity of the principles which we profess by the sacrifices by which we are ready to support them. Now, Sir, events of such a character are gathering in Europe that we cannot tell how soon we may need some English statesman ready to evoke that English spirit which, though dormant, is not extinct, and which in these days, as much as in any others of our history, would spurn the humiliating reproach that Englishmen are, after all, nothing but money-making machines, and that England has no higher mission than trade. Having stated my opinion of the tone and language of the noble Lord's despatches, and having offered to him, as I do, my sincere and grateful tribute for their spirit, I must revert to what has been with me and with some others an old subject of complaint in this House—namely, the scantiness of their character, and the reluctance with which, scanty as they are, they have been laid upon our table. It is rather a strange fact that the diplomatic correspondence of the despotic Governments of France and Austria is published to all the world, while the secrecy of constitutional England keeps back from her own Parliament knowledge which is important to the discussion of her own political affairs. I have always objected to this system of secrecy, because I hold that a system of secrecy necessarily becomes a system of deception; and I am sorry to say that I cannot make the present instance an exception to that rule. I must call the attention of the House to what it is impossible for me to notice but with pain and regret—it may be susceptible of explanation—I hope it is—there has been an unusual application of the scissors to the Correspondence which has been laid upon the table, and therefore we may assume that much has been kept back which, if it were published, might throw a new light upon what has been revealed. Some allowance may also be made for the effect of those differences which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham has told us exist within the Cabinet upon the subject of our foreign policy, and which may, in some parts, have clothed the language of the noble Lord in an ambiguity not his own. But still this fact remains, that at the very time the Ministers of England were recommending the Treaty to our adoption, with encomiums on the Emperor and expressions of confidence in his pacific policy, they were instructing their Ambassador in Paris to remonstrate with him on that policy, which they said was creating distrust and alarm in Europe. At the very moment they were inviting us to pay this ostentatious tribute of our homage and esteem to the Emperor of the French, they were possessed of information to show that he was meditating the greatest outrage against the public law and morality of Europe that has stained its history since the days of the First Napoleon. Therefore, I repeat the question—has the House been quite frankly treated by the Government? Here is a political treaty of alliance with France. What does an alliance with France mean? Does it not mean an alliance prospectively against some other Power? And is there any other Power at this moment with whose principles of international policy we have not more sympathy and a closer approximation than we have with France? Is it possible for any two countries to differ more widely than we do from France as to the policy to be pursued in Italy? Our principle is that the Italians should govern themselves. The policy of France is that Italy should be governed by France. Our policy is that Savoy should pertain to the paternal Government of Piedmont. The French policy is that Savoy should pertain to France. Our policy is respect for treaties, reverence for international rights, as the best security for the peace of the world. The policy of France is the extinction of treaties, aggression, aggrandizement, and war. Yet, while the sentiments, the principles, and the policy of the two countries are the antipodes of one another, we are invited to form this new political alliance, which we are told is to have an unmistakable significance in the eyes of Europe. It will have an unmistakeable significance as a fraudulent pretence of an identity of interest and policy which the Emperor himself has publicly and not very courteously or graciously repudiated. To the Treaty, as a whole, therefore, I object, both as to ts policy and its principles. As a treaty of reciprocity it gives everything and receives nothing. While the old-fashioned principle of taxing the foreigner for the benefit of the Englishman may have been a selfish one, I must own, for one, that I prefer it to the philosophy of the new school, that would tax the Englishman to benefit the foreigner. As a political transaction, giving the Emperor an escape from his own Legislature, I think it is to be condemned on constitutional and moral grounds. As a security for peace it defeats its own object by sowing the seeds of enmity and exasperation that are akin to war. As a proof of confidence in the Emperor it is belied by our increasing estimates and armaments; and as identifying us with the foreign policy of France it is particularly objectionable, since it connects us with a policy we cannot fathom, with an Ally we cannot trust, and makes us responsible for consequences which all Europe is certain to deplore. But, if anything could show what I think is the mistaken spirit in which this Treaty has been negotiated, it would be the manner in which concession to France and sacrifice of the interests of England is exhibited by the 11th Article. I leave the constitutional question upon the ground on which it was placed by the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) last night, but I reiterate the opinion which I expressed some weeks ago, that, when the Queen was advised to assume legislative functions, controlling future Parliaments as to the taxation of the country, Her Majesty was advised, in connection with this Article, to exercise a power in excess of Her prerogative. Further consideration and inquiry have confirmed me in that opinion, and I still believe that no high legal or constitutional authority will attempt to controvert it. But, as I have said in my Amendment, that Article is unnecessary. All the other Articles of the Treaty effect some changes. This Article effects no change whatever. No export duty is now levied on coal; no export duty is contemplated on coal; on the contrary, the export duty which was at one time imposed upon coal was repealed in 1845 on the express ground that it was at variance with the principles of our financial system. France has at this moment all that she requires in a commercial point of view. She has access to our pits, the full use of our minerals, as we have ourselves, and all that is required is to leave matters as they are. In every sense—whether considered in an economical, a commercial, a financial, or a political point of view—this Article of the Treaty is objectionable and injurious to the country. Consider it in an economical point of view. When I first took the liberty of calling the attention of the House to this Article I stated that in 1842 Dr. Buckland had very strongly represented to Sir Robert Peel his apprehension of the exhaustion of our coal-fields. I also stated that Sir Robert Peel placed an export duty on coal, although I would not take upon myself to say, speaking from recollection, that he did so in consequence of the representations made to him by Dr. Buckland. I spoke at that time from a very imperfect recollection of what had occurred eighteen years ago; but since then I have referred to the transactions of 1842, and I find that I very much understated the case; that Sir Robert Peel quoted Dr. Buckland and Mr. Warburton in this House, attaching weight to their opinions as to the exhaustibility of coal, and that he connected his export duty with those opinions. I made a further statement. I said it was now proved by accurate surveys that the coal-fields in the north of England, on which at one time we thought we must depend for a supply, would be worked out in 300 years. I said there were larger and newer coal-fields in Wales, of which there had been no accurate survey, and I suggested that a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire and report as to the probable duration of the coal. Since I made that statement I have received communications from many gentlemen, with most of whom I was entirely unacquainted, from geologists, from engineers, from men practically engaged in the working of coal, all showing the great uncertainty that exists upon this subject, and all expressing apprehension and alarm upon it. I would not venture to quote any of those communications which are written in favour of my views; but I may refer to one from a very eminent authority, seeing that he is himself a Professor of Geology and Mineralogy, who writes a letter which hon. Gentlemen have had an opportunity of reading in The Times, and which is penned for the purpose of refuting my statements. The House will see that Professor Ansted, though he comes to different conclusions, actually confirms both my facts and arguments. He gives a detailed and, I have no doubt, very accurate account of all the coal-fields—their locality, character, and extent—in England, Scotland, and Wales, and he sums up his conclusions in a short sentence. He says that we have a total of 4,000,000 acres, or, in round numbers, 6,000 square miles, of coal in the British islands. Then, calculating the annual consumption of coal in England at present as not less than 80,000,000 tons, he estimates that the whole will be exhausted in about 350 years. Such is the opinion of a Professor of Geology and Mineralogy, who writes for the express purpose of showing that my apprehensions are unfounded, because he goes on to say that, as coal becomes scarce, exhaustion will be prevented by a rise of price, which will lead the nation to husband the article—a statement which I hope the House will observe. Let me give an illustration of the extent to which the consumption of coal is going on. It has been already stated to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it proceeds from perhaps the very highest scientific authority in England. He says, that if you were to build a column—not a pyramid—with a base as large as the square of Lincoln's-inn Fields, and with a summit as high as Snowdon, it would pretty accurately represent what is the annual consumption of coal in England at this moment. Varying the figure, he says that if you were to cover the whole of Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens with coal to the height of the highest houses in the neighbourhood, you would not have a larger mass than is annually consumed in this country alone. This gentleman also says, "I cannot tell you how soon the exhaustion of coal will take place; but of this I have no doubt, that within twenty-five years there will be a rise of price that at this moment would be incredible." All the highest authorities admit that, with the present consumption going on, before long there will be a very great increase of price. Now, what does that mean? Does it not mean an increased cost of production, an increase in the cost of manufactures, a severer competition in foreign markets, a loss of the power of underselling our rivals in those markets, and a sacrifice of the present margin of profit? What is the source of the English manufacturer's prosperity and success? The abundance of labour? It is cheaper in France. The ingenuity of our countrymen? The people of France are at least as ingenious. Our climate? The climate of France is superior to ours. It is that in England exclusively there is a cheap and abundant supply of the first element of manufacturing prosperity, and that by its means producing cheaply, she can outstrip the rivalry of foreign nations, and carry away the profits and trade of the world. This, too, must be remembered—we are only now working the coal that is more accessible, that which is near the surface, and can be got at the least cost. Increased demand, however, means deeper mines, more extensive machinery, worse ventilation, multiplied accidents, increased waste and loss of life, and greater enhancement of price; and, as to enhancement of price, is there a manufactory in Lancashire, an establishment in Yorkshire, or a furnace in Birmingham, in which enhanced price of coal does not mean increased cost of production followed by diminished profit? It is said with truth that France is not conferring any favour upon us by taking our coal. In a commercial point of view, it will be no advantage to England. It will be a great advantage, no doubt, to our coal proprietors, but their interests are rather on the side of France taking our coal in order to raise the price of coal in England. But an increase in the price of coal is equivalent to a new tax upon the people, and an enhanced price of coal is really an addition to our income tax. There can be no doubt that coal is an exhaustible commodity. Every ton exported is so far a diminution of the capital on which England relies, is a diminution of the manufacturing and productive power of England, and so far accelerates the term of her prosperity and greatness. And yet, knowing this, you are giving foreign nations a vested right in English coal. You are making them co-partners and co-proprietors in the first element of your commercial success; and you are doing this when it is known that coal is a first element of national life and that its exhaustion will be the end of national prosperity. You are doing this in the improvident, greedy, and speculative race for wealth which marks our time. You are wasting that inheritance of which Providence has made us the trustees; you are squandering—wickedly squandering, I must say—that on which the wealth, the success, and, indeed, the continued existence of the greatness of our country depend. It must also be remembered that coal and iron are the raw materials of war. An army and navy cannot move without coal; it is as essential as gunpowder to a ation; and is it not right to reserve the legal and acknowledged power of stopping the supplies of that which is the first element of war when you may believe that other nations are organizing a combination to attack us? Coal, also, is not only a great instrument of war, but an instrument of peace, because can there be a greater element of strength to us in our negotiations with foreign Powers than that they cannot move without coal, that we can stop their supplies, and that we are the only nation in Europe having that abundant supply of coal which is in a condition to carry on a long and protracted war? Financially, there is not much to be said about it. No one would advise an export duty on coal. It is vicious in principle, and pernicious in operation. Sir Robert Peel, however, did feel that coal being an exhaustible commodity, might be an exception to the general principle, and he laid an export duty on coal, partly because it is an exhaustible commodity, and partly because it is the element of strength in enabling foreign nations to compete with us in the markets of the world. No one advises an export duty to be laid on coal now; but I say we ought not to part with the power of laying on such a duty. Our financial position is not very satisfactory, nor are our prospects very assuring. The export duty imposed by Sir Robert Peel in 1842 was admitted to be a failure, and people say that an export duty of that kind will always be unproductive. But they forget that in 1842 this duty was imposed in the face of hostile tariffs. Coal was not then admitted into France and the Continent. There was a protective, almost a prohibitive, duty against it. But now foreign countries are going to admit it freely and abundantly; and if you were going to impose an export duty on coal it would amount to this, that while a duty on coal would yield a very large revenue, in the one instance, an export duty would go into your own exchequer, in the other case an import duty will go into the exchequer of France. It is unwise and unnecessary that for all time coming you should deprive England of the power of making a financial arrangement with other countries. There is one thing I must say, which it is rather mortifying to observe, and that is the sagacity on this subject exhibited by the Emperor of the French in contrast with the weakness of our own Government. The Emperor of the French knew that coal is a mighty engine for war

—he knew that for commercial purposes it is a mightier engine for peace. He knew that it is the source of England's greatness, that it is the power by which she commands wealth and ascendancy in Europe. Wisely and sagaciously, therefore, he obtained a right of ownership in England's coal. Wisely and sagaciously he has deprived England of the sole ownership and control over her own mineral resources. We feel that we have much to dread from the probability that English coal will be used against us in war. We have much more to dread it as an element of competition in peace. Reversing the policy of Sir Robert Peel—the jealous patriotism that guided him—our Government have cheapened coal to Rouen and Havre, and made it dearer to Birmingham and Manchester. Can any advantages arising from the increased trade of coal compensate for the heavier load and increased cost of manufacture, if we increase the competition in foreign markets against ourselves? Nature has prevented the French Emperor from so acting in return. The Emperor does not bestow on us a share in the sun of southern France, nor can he give us or share with us the brilliant hues of French silks or the delicate flavour of French wines. The command of these he must keep. He is secured in these respects from the possibility of reciprocity. But the whole shores of the Channel, from Dunkirk to Cherbourg, and the whole country, from the banks of the Seine to the great Manchester of France, he has made a part, and a favoured part, of England in respect to coal; and henceforth you have a race eminent for industry, for energy, for taste in the fine arts, who have acquired a vested and permanent right in the mineral resources of England. I say the whole history of civilized legislation furnishes no parallel for such improvidence. This is the more inexplicable, because it is now proved on every ground to be unnecessary; it was not called for by the interest of England, nor demanded by the Government of France, for the Ambassador of France the moment this question was stirred, knowing how objectionable the principle was, how obnoxious and unpopular it must be in England, and how injurious to this country, came forward voluntarily and suggested to the Government a modification of that Article. Our Government would listen to no modification. It is true they in effect say the time may come when the interest of England may require that the export of coal should be taxed or prohibited; but against the interest of England, if the revenue should require that tax, we will now protect France. The time may come when Governments succeeding us may feel it a matter of policy or of patriotism to impose that duty; it may be inconvenient to France—injurious to France; you (the French) may have apprehensions about it; but we will now give you a guarantee for the future time. Our own tenure of office may be a matter of years or months; that is uncertain; but at least as long as it lasts we will take the opportunity of giving you a charter of right that cannot be questioned by any English Minister in future; and if we have at this moment by the possession of coal a superiority over France, we will waive that superiority and descend in that respect to your level, and let you have a fair start with us either as competitors in peace or rivals in war. Now, Sir, I wish it to be clearly understood what is the point to which my Amendment is directed. Do not let it be said that I wish to place an export duty on coals against France; or that I would deprive the French Government of any right or privilege it at present possesses. I take my stand on the existing law. I say that the law, as it now stands, gives to France all that the French Government can ask, and as much as an English legislature should concede. It is for you to show why you change that law, and why you give more even than France itself demands; it is for you to show that this you give is called for by the promotion of English interests, because it is English interests alone that are the care and concern of a British Ministry and a British Parliament. Now, I make the statement that this article has only been inserted in the Treaty from a consideration of the interest of France. I challenge the Government to disprove that statement. I say, by this article, you injure England to benefit France; I say, that in legislating between England and France, you have put the interest of France first, and the interest of your own nation last. I make this statement publicly, in the face of the House and of the country. I make this charge against the Government—I say, in this transaction you have acted, not as Ministers of England, but as Ministers of France. I say that you have sacrificed the interests of the nation that has trusted you, and have failed in your duty to the noble-hearted Sovereign whom you have sworn to serve, and to the magnificent empire it is your duty to save.

Mr. Horsman

MR. PACKE seconded the Amendment

Amendment proposed,—

“At the end of the Question to add the words ‘But humbly to represent to Her Majesty that, in the opinion of this House, Article XI. imposes on the Crown and Legislature of the Country unnecessary and impolitic restrictions to which this House cannot assent; and to pray Her Majesty to effect the omission of that Article from the Treaty.’”

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. VIVIAN said, that as he represented a district which might be considered the most important of all the coal-fields of England, and as he had studied the question for twenty years, he felt that he was in a position to give the House some information on this important question of coals. He had heard from the right hon. Gentleman who had so ably addressed the House, quotations from very high geological authorities; but he thought the right hon. Gentleman had omitted to give the House quotations from men practically acquainted with the subject; and he (Mr. Vivian) ventured to say that it was rather from those practically acquainted with the subject than from geologists that we ought to look for a true conclusion on this most important matter. The South Wales coal-field was the district which was most intimately known to him. It was as well known to him as the floor of that House. That coal-field was of enormous extent; and he should perhaps astonish hon. Members by telling them that the estimate which he formed of the workable coal within that district was fully equal to supply the whole wants of England at her present gigantic rate of consumption for 500 years—that coal-field alone. He did not make this statement without fully considering the subject. It was possible that his words might be reported, and he might be challenged by those who had considered the subject, and therefore he would give the data of his calculation. The area of the South Wales coal-field was variously estimated; but the estimates did not differ very greatly. The lowest estimate that he had been able to find was 600,000 acres; the highest, 675,000 acres. He had himself roughly measured the area of the coal-field, and he made it about 640,000 acres. Therefore, it would be plain that no very material difference existed on the question of the area of the South Wales coal-field.

The next element in the calculation was the thickness of the coal which underlies that area. Providence had provided that the great beds of the South Wales coal-field should underlie its whole area; those great beds, on which the large iron works had subsisted more than half a century, and from which the great production of steam coals was now drawn, were the lowest beds of the basin. It was not easy to estimate the thickness. In the north-eastern portion of the area, the outcrop was about 31 feet in thickness; going further west it reached at Merthyr from 50 to 57 feet of workable thickness; in the great central up-throw of the district, where the lower beds were brought up, the thickness reached 70 feet; and on the southern out-crop they reached upwards of 100 feet of workable thickness. Now from these data they might draw the conclusion, that the workable beds of coal in South Wales might be fairly taken at an average of 60 feet in thickness. He found that Mr. Conybeare, a very eminent local authority, took them some years ago at 60 feet; others had taken them higher; but he did not find that any one had taken them at a lower average than 60 feet. Every foot in depth of coal underlying one acre was generally computed to produce 1,500 tons of coal. The actual fact was that a cubic yard of coal weighed just a ton, which would give 1,613 tons to each acre of coal one foot thick. Now, if the number of square acres was taken at 600,000, which he believed to be the lowest estimate of the coal-field of South Wales, and if that area were multiplied by the thickness of beds underlying it, they arrived at the result that they had 36,000,000 of acres of coal, one foot thick. Assuming, then, that there were 1,500 tons to the acre, which was the usual calculation, this would give 540,000,000,000 tons of coal in the South Wales coal-field alone. Now, the quantity consumed by this country every year might be taken at 70,000,000 tons—he believed, indeed, that was an excess. The usual estimate was 65,000,000 or 66,000,000 tons—but taking it at 70,000,000, the quantity of coal in the South Wales field alone would suffice for the whole consumption of England for the next 770 years. If they deducted one-third from that quantity to allow for faults, bad working, and waste, which was the usual deduction, there would still be enough for the supply of the present consumption of England for upwards of 500 years. It was impossible for him to meet the statements which Professor Ansted had given, for that gentleman had given no data for the conclusions at which he had arrived; but the facts which he (Mr. Vivian) had given to the House he had ascertained for himself, and he stood there pledged to their accuracy, as far as human calculations could be depended on. But there was another point of view in which this matter might be regarded. The present annual production of the South Wales coal-field amounted to 7,500,000 tons, which was about the tenth part of the consumption of the whole of England. Now, at this rate, South Wales could maintain its present production of coal for upwards of 5,000 years. But he need not remind the House that South Wales was not the only coal-field in England. He was not personally acquainted with the other coal-fields of the country as he was with the South Wales field; but from those records to which other hon. Gentlemen had equal access with himself, he had endeavoured to form some estimate of their contents. There was the great Yorkshire field, for instance, extending from Bradford to the neighbourhood of Nottingham. That coal-field was estimated at an extent of from 500,000 to 600,000 acres, with an average thickness of 70 feet. It was, therefore, nearly equal to the South Wales coal-field, and all he had said of the South Wales field applied equally to Yorkshire. Then there was the Lancashire coal-field, with an area of from 200,000 to 300,000 acres, with an average thickness of 60 feet; the Bristol coal-field of 128,000 acres, with an average thickness of 80 feet; the Durham coal-field of 400,000 acres, and which, after all that had been taken out of it was still calculated to contain 9,000,000,000 tons of coal. Then there was a coal-field in the south of Scotland, the extent of which was said to be something quite enormous, but it had not yet been accurately surveyed; it was stated to be of the extent of 1,000,000 acres, or nearly double the extent of the South Wales field, and at one point of it 59 feet of coal had been found in one pit. With these facts before him he was almost ashamed to go on replying to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) who he regretted to see had left his place. He believed the right hon. Gentleman had completely misled himself, and if so the whole of the latter portion of his speech at least broke down. In addition to the coalfields he had mentioned, however, there were many minor coal-fields. There were those of North and South Staffordshire, the Forest of Dean, the Warwickshire, the Ashby-de-la-Zouch, the Colebrookdale, the Whitehaven, the Flintshire, and in Scotland, the Lanarkshire, the Midlothian, the Ayrshire, and the Fifeshire; these were all producing enormous quantities of coal. It was perfectly absurd then to talk of the exhaustion of coal in this country. But this by no means exhausted the subject. If any gentleman would walk into the library and pull down the admirable geological map of England, by Greenough, he would see that our present coal-fields were the mere out-crops of a much larger field lying under the younger rocks—the Permian and the New red sandstone, which overlies the coal formation. This was no mere geological theory; in many instances the New red sandstone had been pierced through, and millions of tons of coal were now being brought up through it. If hon. Gentlemen looked at the map he had alluded to they would see that the portions marked black, which formed the present coal-fields, bore but a small proportion to those districts which were coloured brown, which formed the coal-fields covered by the younger rocks. To talk of the exhaustion of the coal-fields of England in the face of facts like these was so absurd that he had no patience with those who used the argument. He would allude for one moment to the bearing of coal on the question of war. The consumption of coal by the French navy in 1858 was stated the other evening by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) to be 160,000 tons per annum. The consumption of the British navy was about 200,000 tons per annum; the Vote for coals this year was £334,000. Why, 160,000 tons per annum was the production of one good colliery alone, a colliery, of which he had turned the first sod, was now producing that quantity. It was therefore, a perfect absurdity to talk of 160,000 tons as worthy of any political consideration. Hon. Gentlemen did not appear to consider that France was herself a coal producing country. If they looked to the geological maps of France they would see that she possessed no fewer than 88 coal and lignite basins. The latest records he had been able to obtain of their working was for the year 1845-46, in which year he found that there were 1,135,000 acres under concession for coal working in France, and the coal produced was about 4,000,000 tons. The consumption in France it appeared amounted to 6,251,000 tons, of which 4,141,000 were supplied by her own coal-fields. He was now informed that the production of France in 1858 amounted to 7,000,000 tons. Yet the right hon. Member for Stroud talked of the supply of 160,000 tons as being matter of grave political consideration. He respected the abilities of the right hon. Gentleman, but he could not help thinking that he might have devoted them to a much more fruitful subject. He had himself gone under ground in one of the coal pits of the St. Etienne field twenty years ago, and the thickness of the bed there was from 40 to 50 feet. It was the largest he had ever seen, and he had seen the Staffordshire beds. There were also the great coal-fields of Valenciennes, and of Saarbrücke on the Prussian border; so that there was no chance of France wanting coal. It was said that our coal was superior to all other for steam ships; but France contained anthracite within her own territories. Again, if invisibility in war was the question there was no better fuel for steamers in the world than coke. He had himself used coke in his yacht to avoid dust and dirt, and he could answer for its applicability giving off no smoke to be seen by an enemy. Now France had abundance of coal which was capable of being made into the best coke. Then the right hon. Gentleman had dilated at some length, and in a way that was calculated to alarm the public, on the subject of the demand for coal tending to enhance the price. But that was a question which might very safely be left to the ordinary laws of trade. When the price rose a greater number of pits would be sunk, and the supply would soon exceed the demand, and bring the prices down again to their old level. The original sinking of a coal-pit was a very small element in the cost of production; it was soon covered by the yield; but if he might administer one drop of comfort to the bitter potion which had fallen to the lot of the right hon. Gentleman, he would say that the production of coal depended on the number of hands they could get to work it, and the supply was thus limited, for no man could work in the pits who was not bred to it. That was the only limit which he (Mr. Vivian) knew. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the deeper the mine the worse it was ventilated. There the right hon. Gentleman was undoubtedly in error, for all who were conversant with the subject knew that a deep pit was much more easily ventilated than a shallow one. The right hon. Gentleman had also said that no benefit accrued to England from the export of coal. But he (Mr. Vivian) could not understand how it could be argued that the export of coal was a loss of national capital. What was the difference between a ton of coal and an ounce of gold? The two things were precisely analogous. They both lay dead and useless in the earth until they were dug out of it. If this country received three millions sterling a year for coal, which she exported, surely it was as beneficial to her as if it were three millions of gold. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman, however, that the exhaustion of coal would be the destruction of England's greatness, because it would be the destruction of her manufactures. If he (Mr. Vivian) thought there was the slightest danger of that exhaustion he would not advocate its exportation. He might also state, for the satisfaction of the right hon. Gentleman, that in those districts where the manufactures were there was little or no coal exported. There was, he believed, not a ton of coal exported from the Yorkshire or the Staffordshire coal-fields, and scarcely any from the Lancashire. Having stated these facts, by which he thought he was able to throw some light upon the subject, he would not enter into the question of the Treaty further than to say that he cordially concurred in it, and would give it his earnest support.

MR. BENTINCK said, the hon. Member who had just sat down had entered into minute details on the subject of coal, and the hon. Gentleman might fairly be considered an authority upon that point. He would not dispute the accuracy of the statistics which the hon. Member had read to the House; but he must tell the hon. Member that in reference to one important part of the question, he was totally in error. That point was, the application of coal to warlike purposes. The hon. Gentleman laboured under a complete mistake in supposing that coke would be available for the objects he had stated. It could not be used for keeping up steam in large vessels; and, moreover, it required so much more stowage than coal, that it would be folly to attempt to employ it in a ship as a motive power. Under those circumstances the elaborate statement of the hon. Gentleman fell to the ground. Good coal and not coke was wanted for a steam navy, and France would secure herself a supply of the first of those articles under the Treaty. He would proceed to notice some points which had been raised by various Members in the course of that debate. The right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, had begun by telling them that he was not friendly to commercial treaties, but that he was not prepared to reject the one then under the consideration of the House. Now that appeared to him (Mr. Bentinck) to be a very singular statement on the part of a Member of the Government, and he was afraid it would go far to show that the right hon. Gentleman, during his tenure of office, had learned some of those slippery practices which he might readily acquire in the company he was keeping. The right hon. Gentleman had attempted to show that English shipping was exposed to no disadvantage as compared with French and other foreign shipping, and upon that point he specially referred to the case of the Mauritius. It so happened, however, that immediately after the right hon. Gentleman had concluded his speech an extract from a letter written by the master of an English ship at the Mauritius was put into his (Mr. Bentinck's) hands, which entirely overthrew that position of the right hon. Gentleman. The letter was dated the 7th of January last, and could not therefore, have been written with any reference to their present discussions. In it the master of the ship, addressing the owner in this country, stated that English vessels at the Mauritius could not obtain more than 10s. per ton to a direct port, while French ships were obtaining from £3 to £3 15s. per ton. That statement was, he thought, a complete answer to the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman that the English shipping interest, and more especially that branch of it which was connected with the Mauritius, was not in an unsatisfactory condition. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast (Sir H. Cairns) had delivered a very able speech on the subject of the Treaty; but he confessed he had heard it with some surprise. He understood his hon. and learned Friend to say that he hoped the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Byng) would not be rejected by the House, because its rejection would cause the rejection of the Treaty. Now, it was precisely because he (Mr. Bentinck) wished for the rejection of the Treaty, that he trusted most sincerely the House would not adopt the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex. His hon. and learned Friend considered the Treaty to be a very bad bargain for this country, and as he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend upon that point he wished the Treaty should be rejected; but he was utterly at a loss to understand how his hon. and learned Friend could believe the Treaty was a bad bargain, and could at the same time wish for its adoption. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Middlesex in the very able speech in which he had introduced the Motion then under their consideration, had told them that this was not a treaty of reciprocity. But if it were not a treaty of reciprocity he (Mr. Bentinck) should like to know what it was. It appeared to him to be a treaty based upon the principle of reciprocity, but with no real reciprocity in it. At first sight it might appear to be a reciprocity treaty; but on examination it was seen that all its advantages would be on the side of France, and all its disadvantages on the side of this country. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Middlesex said that France was meeting us half-way in this matter, but he (Mr. Bentinck) saw nothing which could justify such a statement. He found in the French publications of every description the most decided abuse of the Treaty and of the principle of free trade, with commendations, in which he entirely concurred, of the principle of protection. But he perceived nothing like a disposition to meet the free trade policy of this country half-way. A number of French manufacturers and merchants who had addressed the Emperor upon the subject said that it was a Treaty which would have to be rent by cannon-balls. If the establishment of very high protective duties in France, in return for the total abolition of duties on this side the Channel was meeting us half-way, it was the most curious half-way house he had ever heard of. The hon. Member for Middlesex further told them that this was a treaty of commerce and not of navigation. But if it were not a treaty of navigation, why had the third article been introduced into it? And further if it were only a Treaty of Commerce, why, he would ask, had it not been made a treaty of navigation? Why, had Her Majesty's Government neglected the opportunity of asking the Government of France to deal with the shipping of this country in a spirit of reciprocity? In his opinion the Treaty was founded not on right but on utterly erroneous principles, and that far from being beneficial, it would be most pernicious to the true interests of the country. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Middlesex expressed a hope that private interests would not influence the decision of the House upon that subject; but if instead of "private interests" the hon. Gentleman had deprecated the influence of "class interests," he might have fairly appealed to the hon. Member for Birmingham, who after all must be looked upon as the most important personage in connection with this measure. That hon. Gentleman had admitted that the Treaty was founded upon a suggestion which he had made, and he had held out a threat to the Government of the consequences which must follow from their not adhering to it. [Mr. BAIGHT intimated dissent.] The hon. Gentleman was not perhaps always aware of the force of his own language; but he (Mr. Bentinck) believed that was the meaning which the words he had employed were calculated to convey. He should add that the hon. Gentleman appeared to him to have forfeited, in one short month, a character he had been earning during a period of twenty years. He would tell the hon. Gentleman frankly, but in all courtesy, why he made that statement. He wished, however, in the first place, to observe that he was speaking politically and not personally. The hon. Gentleman for twenty years had been endeavouring to persuade the lower classes of this country that he was their only friend, and that he was prepared to sacrifice for their sakes the interests of all other classes. He (Mr. Bentinck) would not then go into the mystification which the hon. Gentleman had practised upon them in respect to his promised Reform Bill, which had never appeared; he should say, however, that he believed the hon. Gentleman, by the policy he was at present pursuing, was forfeiting the reputation he had acquired during all the preceding portion of his public life. The hon. Gentleman was the originator and the great promoter of a Treaty, the sole object of which was to benefit one wealthy class to the prejudice of thousands, and even millions, of their fellow countrymen. Would the hon. Gentleman deny that the Treaty would benefit the class to which he belonged, and that it would inflict great suffering on thousands of people engaged in other branches of industry. He (Mr. Bentinck) was anxious to avoid as far as possible discussions of a personal character, and he felt that the absent in particular ought to be dealt with carefully and leniently: he would therefore only say, in the absence of the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), that he could not concur in the eulogies which had been passed upon him, and that, speaking of him solely as a public man, he believed that his political antecedents and his expressed opinions rendered him the man the least qualified in all England, not even excepting the hon. Member for Birmingham, to be entrusted at a foreign Court with the national honour and interests. The details of the Treaty had already been made the subject of prolonged discussion, and he would not refer to them at any length upon that occasion. Every one must be aware that French Protectionists were opposed to the Treaty. All he could say was this—that if the French Protectionists did not exhibit on the present occasion more energy, more consistency, more determination, than was exhibited by the Protectionists within the walls of the House of Commons some years ago, the Protectionists of France would come to an untimely end, and nobody would pity them. He would say no more about the question of coal; but there was one argument which the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Stroud, had so well put, and which he thought to be unanswerable—what could be the object of tying up the hands of future Governments with regard to coal? To sum up the whole matter in five words, it was done to please the Emperor of the French. It was his good fortune to be able to congratulate the Government upon one point—he would not touch upon the paper duty, because that they would have to deal with hereafter; but he had seen with pleasure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had succeeded in inducing the French Government to withdraw the prohibition on the export of rags. That would be a great boon, no doubt, to the manufacturers of this country; but it was valuable in another point of view, because his conviction was, that if this Treaty was carried out rags would become an essential element in the clothing of numerous classes in this country. He was, therefore, glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had had the humanity to forestall the means of alleviating the miseries which his policy would create. He (Mr. Bentinck) had listened to all the arguments advanced on the other side in favour of the Treaty, but could not, for the life of him, see a single argument which went to prove the probability of any man in England benefiting from the adoption of the Treaty, except the class which the hon. Member for Birmingham represented. He quite admitted that the prosperity of that class was one test of the prosperity of England; but it did not constitute the sole prosperity of England, and if the Treaty was to benefit that class at the cost of millions of others of their countrymen, how could it be said that such a Treaty was beneficial to our national interests? The right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had made one of his eloquent and brilliant speeches, in which he scouted the very name of protection, and then he went on to propose the adoption of a treaty, the very soul and essence of which consisted in the protective principle. He should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman how he could consistently reconcile the two things: Any attempt to do so was utterly irreconcilable with common sense. The most marvellous part of the Treaty was that it did not seem to be liked in France more than it was in England, and although the right hon. Gentleman spoke in general terms with all the power of language which he possessed, of the advantages which would result from the Treaty, he had never attempted to show a single class, with the exception of the class which had been alluded to, which was to derive any advantage from the operation of the Treaty. The right hon. Gentleman always avoided any such argument, and told them they were carrying out the principles of free trade, and that, therefore, they must be conferring great benefits upon the country. He was bound to show some advantages which would result specifically from the Treaty, but he could not do so, and the fact was that the Treaty, so far from carrying out the principles of free trade, was only caricaturing those principles. This was not the free trade of Sir Robert Peel or the free trade of Mr. Huskisson; but it was free trade run mad; and he verily believed that if either of those departed statesmen could come back to the House and peruse the Treaty now offered for their acceptance, they would say that it was a Treaty either made at Paris or in Bedlam. The right hon. Gentleman had laid great stress on the question of the dignity of the Government, and had stated that its dignity was involved in the adoption of the Treaty. He would not set up his opinion as to what constituted true dignity upon the part of the Government, but he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman what his opinion was of the dignity of a Government which enrolls among its most distinguished members a right hon. Gentleman who accepted employment abroad under the Government of the day, who came over and voted for that Government upon a great party division, and when within a short time after their defeat took office with those who succeeded to power by the result of that division? After that it certainly did not appear to him that the Government were very sensitive on the question of dignity. The right hon. Gentleman told him that the country would be "ennobled" by passing the Treaty; but he never could believe that the country could be ennobled by impoverishing itself, or by truckling to France. On the contrary there was a verse which warned them that nought could "ennoble knaves, or fools, or cowards;" and he believed that if this Treaty should be passed the British House of Commons would be considered as the fitting representative of those three classes of mankind. No man was more fully impressed than he was with the advantages entailed on the country by the maintenance of the blessings of peace; but those advantages could be purchased at too high a price, and in this case not only was the scheme one which would entail upon us the most frightful financial difficulties, but whatever might be said in the House of Commons and in the Court of France, people would say after its ratification that it was done at the dictation of France; and he, for one, admitting as he fully did the undoubted advantages of peace, would rather see this country at war with the whole of Europe than see the Treaty accepted. He did not ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to agree with him, but he was stating publicly, as he always had done, frankly and fairly expressing his opinions, and stating the reasons which induced him to arrive at that conclusion; and he would repeat again that he thought a war would be less prejudicial both to the honour and the interests of the country than the final ratification of the Treaty. He did not know why hon. Members took the matter so seriously to heart, and he could only account for it by supposing that his words had more force than he at first apprehended they had. Although war might be disastrous, it could never be disgraceful to this country, which he considered the adoption of this Treaty would be; and war would be cheaper in every respect, for he believed that the financial ruin which this Treaty inevitably involved would be of a character to which the expense of all former wars—to use the expression sanctioned by high authority in that House—would be a mere fleabite in comparison. Historians had before now recorded the disgraceful fact of the English Government paying tribute to a foreign Power to preserve our soil from invasion, and he believed that the result of this Treaty would be still worse, because we should pay the tribute first and very likely be invaded afterwards. For these reasons he begged to express his cordial dissent to the ratification of the Treaty—a treaty which could only have been concocted by those who were alike indifferent to the honour and blind to the interests of the country.

SIR ROBERT PEELE: Sir, although I should hesitate to trespass on the time of the House, I am anxious, not having spoken at all on this question, to engage its attention for a few moments. I think the Government acted with wise discretion on Monday last in consenting to the proposal of the hon. Member for Bridgewater (Mr. Kinglake) to adjourn this discussion till last evening; otherwise, as the Member for Middlesex (Mr. Byng) justly observed, they would have exposed themselves to insinuations of endeavouring to avoid discussion at this critical state of affairs, which, however unfounded, would nevertheless have been prejudicial. I have followed with great interest the discussions which have taken place in this House on the various Articles of the Treaty; and with regard to the speech of the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), who entered into details on this subject, I must, with all deference to the House, observe that this does not appear to me an opportune occasion to go into all the particular features of this Treaty, which has been so fully discussed in Committee, and which has, I think, received a very ample measure of confirmation. I listened with great attention to the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who exposed all the facts of the case with admirable ability, and I intend to give him till the end, as I have given him from the beginning of this discussion, a most willing and grateful support. We have discussed the various items of the Treaty in Committee; what is it we are now called on to do? We are called on by the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex to acknowledge Her Majesty's desire to promote the happiness and welfare of the people; and we are to take steps to give effect to the Treaty which Her Majesty hopes will tend to the public advantage by promoting trade, commerce, and manufactures. I am glad to see the unanimous feeling of the House on this subject. No one, I think, can decline to acknowledge the desire Her Majesty has expressed for the welfare of her people. Whatever may be our party differences, whatever may be our legitimate rivalry in discussing them, there can only be one unanimous feeling in the House as to according our assent to the desire of the Sovereign. But I will go further. Can we deny that Her Majesty's Government has shown a wish to open fresh channels to the commerce of the country? Can we deny that it has shown itself alive to the fact that the benefits of commerce are infinitely preferable to the hazardous uncertainty of war?—that it wishes to draw closer the ties of amity between this country and a great, powerful, and neighbouring State? I think the Government, with a wise policy, has sought to develop new springs of industry, and new means of increasing the national resources; and I think they have been successful in doing that which every Government, of whatever party, must desire to accomplish. With all respect to the views of the minority of this House, I think the repeated majorities in which we have shared convey a convincing proof that we will support every attempt to promote trade and commerce, as far as those attempts are consistent with the honour of the country. And now I will ask a question. If we are all agreed in this, how was it that the House the other night hesitated as to considering this Motion? How was it that the House on Monday night rather supported the view of the hon. Member for Bridgwater, and hesitated in at once ratifying a treaty that promises such great advantages in the future? It was not wholly on account of the sacrifice we are called on to make for it; we are sacrificing for it £1,200,000 of revenue—but I believe the advantages of the Treaty infinitely outweigh that sacrifice. Many hon. Gentlemen have quoted the opinions of Mr. Pitt, as to the treaty of 1786, but I will cite an opinion of Mr. Pitt with regard to sacrificing a present revenue for the purpose of improving our commercial relations with foreign countries. It is from a speech made by Mr. Pitt in 1787. He says:—

"The surrender of revenue for great commercial purposes was a policy by no means unknown in the history of Great Britain; but here we enjoyed the extraordinary advantage of having it returned to us in a threefold rate by extending and legalizing the importation of the articles. Increase by means of reduction, he was obliged to confess, appeared once a paradox; but experience had now convinced us that it was more than practicable."—[Hansard, Parliamentary History, xxvi., 398.]

Here is an authority that proves we may surrender revenue for the moment with great advantage, with a view to those prospective advantages which may be expected to flow from these Treaty negotiations. I ask the House, then, why it hesitated the other night? The hon. Member for Stroud has referred to the general policy of France; and I did once think this Treaty has some general bearing on the policy of the French Government. I thought there were questions agitating Europe that required to be settled before such a Treaty was concluded; I thought they were questions bearing on the general relations of the Powers of Europe among themselves, and the degree of confidence they could place in each other, without which confidence neither trade nor commerce can flourish or exist; I thought, with such questions unsettled, it might be injudicious to consider such a treaty; but on reflection, I think I was wrong; and that the policy of the Government, being really a policy of peace, is such as should meet the approval both of the House and the country. At the same time, I have heard opinions expressed by one hon. Gentleman in support of the Treaty, that have inspired me with considerable alarm. The opinions I allude to were expressed by an hon. Gentleman who is a new ally of the Government, though not altogether a new ally of despotism. I have seen opinions reported as those of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), which, considering the connection always existing between him and Mr. Cobden, and now existing between him and Her Majesty's Government, have, I confess, surprised me. We all thought the hon. Gentleman was the "friend of the people," not only of this country and America, but all over the world. We were mistaken; we have heard a great deal of the hon. Member for Birmingham; how he has acquired great provincial éclat and doubtless ephemeral popularity by his advocacy of popular measures. But now we find he has deserted his free opinions in favour of the despotism of France—so much so that he will not allow any one to differ from him. He has actually become a despot of ideas. How often do we see this! How often do we see a man of great powers, great ability, and extreme liberality, a tribune of the people, a demagogue, call him what you will, yet give him scope and opportunity of action, and he becomes a most unmitigated despot. What did the hon. Member for Birmingham say the other night? Many thought we could not separate the Treaty from the general policy of France; but he said—"Perish the liberty of half-a-million of people, only give me this Treaty." Is that the feeling of this House? Is that the feeling of the Government? All I can say is, if the Government adopts the opinions of its new ally, neither its ally nor its Treaty will gain for it the public confidence. More than this, the hon. Member the other night ventured to gauge the loyalty of men by their means; he estimated their loyalty by the extent or deficiency of their pecuniary resources. I never heard such a sentiment in this House before.—[Mr. BRIGHT expressed dissent.]—The hon. Member distinctly said it, for I wrote down the words as they fell from his honeyed lips. Surely the poor man's heart beats with as ardent an emotion of loyalty to his Queen as the heart of the richest aristocrat in the land; and surely the rich man, if Providence were to take from him his riches, would not lose those sentiments of loyalty he had previously entertained. The argument is most fallacious, particularly for a country like England. "Perish the liberties of half-a-million of people," says the hon. Gentleman, "only give me this Treaty." The hon. Gentleman is generally understood to represent the opinions of Mr. Cobden on political questions; if so, and if Mr. Cobden negotiated this Treaty, I do not wonder the House hesitated to adopt a document framed under the influence of such revolutionary principles. I do not wonder it hesitated to adopt a Treaty so made with a Power whose policy tends to alarm every other State of Europe. I do not wish to enter into these questions of the policy of France; we shall have other opportunities of discussing them fully; for this reason I do not wish to follow the right hon. Member for Stroud. Now, for my own part, I think the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs comes very well out of the correspondence, which from time to time has been laid upon the table; but I must, nevertheless, say that there is a despatch of M. Walewski's and two of M. Thouvenel's, which, in my opinion, place the question of the annexation of Savoy to France in a very dangerous and ambiguous light. More than that—I am afraid—as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud so forcibly put it—that the mask in this case is being withdrawn, for it appears to me to be evident—~~anxious~~ as I am that the bonds of amity between this country and France should be drawn more closely together—that our worst apprehensions with reference not only to the future condition of one people, but the independence and neutrality of another, are about to be realized, and that the peace of Europe is on the eve of being disturbed, perhaps for many a long day to come. That such may not be the case I sincerely hope; nor can I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud that the Government ought to be held responsible for the occurrence of these events should they unhappily take place. I do not think Her Majesty's Ministers have, as the right hon. Gentleman seems to suppose, connived at the policy to which I allude to secure the advantages which this Treaty is calculated to confer. No—nothing can ever make me believe that they—more particularly my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—in their desire to imitate the policy of Mr. Pitt, although perhaps under different circumstances, could so far forget the interests of their country as in any way to lend their countenance to such a transaction as the proposed annexation of Savoy. On the contrary, I feel quite sure that if the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had in August last been aware of the intentions of the Emperor of the French on this question, he would have entered against their being carried into execution a most vigorous and dignified protest. At the same time I cannot understand how the Emperor of the French—for it is with him after all, and not with the French people, we are dealing in negotiating this Treaty—could, while he was taking a course which tends to increase the feelings of amity and friendship between two great nations, resist the appeals on this subject, which must, since his intentions with respect to it became known, have been repeatedly addressed to him by the Government of England. I must, however, say that, since he does appear to have paid no regard to them so far as the Minister for Foreign Affairs is concerned, it becomes the duty of the English Parliament to speak out boldly its sentiments at this critical moment, and when we are about to give our assent to a Treaty like the present. It seems to me to be a matter of the utmost importance that we should not be quiet spectators of such a transaction as the annexation of Savoy, and that we should not, in our anxiety to support the Treaty, allow this annexation to take place without making some more formal protest than we have yet done against its injustice. We ought to bear in mind that we have spent millions in war, the expenditure of which might have been avoided had a vigorous policy at the outset been pursued. That is the description of policy which I now wish to see adopted in reference to France. We have only to read the pages of history to see what has been the result of a contrary course. Has experience, I would ask, taught the Parliament of England nothing? I should hope it has not failed to derive instruction from the lessons of the past, and I entreat the House to enter—not to-night, but as soon as possible after this Treaty has passed—its indignant protest against this act of spoliation and wrong, the result of which will be to upset Europe. I have no wish now to allude to the Despatches on this subject which have been laid on the table. There is, however, one point contained in them to which I may be permitted to refer, in order to enter my indignant protest against the language that has been used. It is a point which, in my opinion, demands the immediate attention of this House as well as the serious consideration of the Government. The other day the Ambassador of France, it appears, called on the noble Lord the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and, alluding to this subject of the annexation of Savoy, said, "After all what does it matter? Let us take Savoy—it is but a bare rock." Now, Sir, if the Ambassador of France had dared to speak to me in that language—I ought not perhaps to express myself in terms so strong—but if the Ambassador of France had used that language to me, I should have returned to him the reply of an honest but indignant Englishman, and told him that men "lived, moved, and had their being" on the rocky mountains of Savoy who are just as respectable and as worthy of the consideration of their fellow-men as are the denizens of our crowded cities or the sycophants of degraded courts. I would have said to him that those inhabitants of Savoy in their mountain home were as deserving of our solicitude as the rich who dwell in gilded palaces of luxurious ease; and I shall not hesitate on all fitting occasions, when this subject is under discussion, to hold up to the indignation of all honourable men language such as that used by the Ambassador of France, so antagonistic to every principle of liberty, and so unworthy of the spirit which should actuate our conduct in dealing with human affairs; and while I shall be prepared to take that course, I must not be supposed to be desirous of sowing dissension between this country and France, or of creating a feeling of antipathy to the Emperor of the French. On the contrary, my earnest wish is to see France occupy that position in Europe which her great resources and the character of her people fairly entitle her to hold. As long, however, as I have the honour of a seat in this House and am capable of raising my voice in its deliberations, I shall never refrain objecting to the immoderate growth of power on the part of France, because its attainment can only lead to the excitement of jealousies between the nations of the Continent, and tend to embroil the peace and happiness of the world. I must also observe that the attainment of this immoderate power, which—notwithstanding her professions of friendship and amity—seems to be the aim of France under the Napoleonic dynasty, must always be a source, if it be persevered in, of serious uneasiness and anxiety to Europe. As she is now situated she occupies a magnificent position. She is blessed to satiety with every gift that the bounty of Providence can give—with every advantage that soil and climate can impart. Yet, notwithstanding all this, she is, under the Napoleonic dynasty, always dissatisfied with her lot, striving always to remove her neighbours' landmarks, and thus to create dissension throughout the Continent. ["No, no."] If some hon. Gentlemen differ from me in that opinion, I can only say that I hope their view of the matter may be the more correct. At the same time, my belief is that the general policy of France is such as I have described it to be, and I, for one, beg to enter a respectful protest against its continuance. But now to revert to the Treaty. I shall, as I said before, support it, because I am of opinion that Her Majesty's Government have honestly sought by its means to promote the prosperity of the country, and because I concur in the justice of the remarkable expressions which Mr. Pitt made use of in 1787, when he said, in the discussion on the Commercial Treaty with France which was then concluded,—

“If war was the greatest of evils, and commerce the greatest felicity which it was possible for a country to enjoy, then it became the duty of those to whom the affairs of the public were intrusted to endeavour as much as possible to render the one permanent, and to remove the prospect of danger to the other. This was the object of the present Treaty, for so great were the advantages likely to arise from it, that they would not only contribute to avoid war, but would also strengthen the resources of the country.”

Such I believe was the impression of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer when through Mr. Cobden the present Treaty was negotiated, and I earnestly hope, now that it is about to receive the assent of this House, Her Majesty's Government will bring the influence of public opinion to bear on the contemplated policy of the Emperor of the French in reference to Savoy, so that he may be dissuaded from taking a course which can, if persevered in, only tend to excite mistrust throughout Europe, and which will not fail to rob Europe of the blessing of commerce and the inestimable blessings of peace. Having said this much on this important topic, I should resume my seat were it not that I am desirous of making a few remarks which were suggested to me by the speech of the hon. Gentleman who moved the Address, and who said, very properly, in that speech, which he delivered with so much eloquence and ability, that that man was worthy of public approbation who made two blades of grass grow where only one had grown before. In the justice of that sentiment I concur; and I will add that that statesman is worthy of public estimation who enlarges the resources of his country and extends the pacific influence of her power. I am therefore happy to concur in the praises of Mr. Cobden to whose influence it is said this Commercial Treaty is chiefly owing. But I am of opinion that, although much is due to Mr. Cobden in the matter, there sits on the Treasury bench a man who, by his activity and the intelligence which he has brought to bear upon this question, is worthy of the warmest eulogy which we can bestow on his exertions—I need not say that I allude to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Without at all wishing to disparage what Mr. Cobden has done, I think I am justified in saying that my right hon. Friend has treated this great subject with a compass, a genius, and a power which we have rarely seen equalled and never surpassed in the House of Commons. Those who like myself have sat here night after night listening to these discussions cannot have failed to observe how my right hon. Friend, while dealing with the Imperial interests of the country in a manner the most statesmanlike, showed himself able to master the minutest details of trade; so that no gentleman could submit to his consideration—I will not say the crotchets, but—the objections of any particular interest to his proposals that he was not prepared to enter into its discussion with the most consummate knowledge and ability. And, if I may be permitted to allude further to the subject, I would say my right hon. Friend is in this House the efficient representative of that policy which was inaugurated in 1842 under the auspices of the great party opposite. The right hon. Gentleman is the living, active, and intelligent representative of a party which my father had the proud distinction to lead: and, whatever may have been the differences and dissensions which unhappily ensued on that occasion, I think there is no impartial man in this House but will bear me out in saying that the policy then inaugurated could not have succeeded without the support of that party at the outset, and that without their support the blessings of prosperity which have since so abundantly flowed must have been at least temporarily delayed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has been endeavouring to follow out that policy, and he has laboured not altogether in vain. He has the genius and ability to carry out this system; but he knows well that, it is not only from his genius and ability, but from the character of his policy that permanent good must flow. I think, Sir, that permanent good will result to the country, and therefore I support the policy. I think that permanent good will result from it, quite irrespective of political considerations, in a commercial point of view; and sure I am that the right hon. Gentleman has shown that he is desirous of laying the foundations of commercial prosperity; he has shown that his only wish, his only thought, his only study has been to see the vessels of this great country sailing triumphantly to every shore, and carrying the products of our industry to every clime; he has shown that his laborious untiring study has been to see the trade and enterprise of this country steadily pursuing its onward course under those influences which have wafted the great name of England to the remotest limits of the world.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, as we are to-night permitted to express an opinion upon this Commercial Treaty as a whole, I trust the House will allow me to take a brief but general view of the policy of this now celebrated instrument, and the circumstances under which it is brought under our consideration. Although a policy which tends to an increase of our commercial relations in Europe, is so satisfactory and encouraging that I cannot doubt it must afford to both sides of the House, and, indeed, I would say to all the subjects of Her Majesty, sentiments of great congratulation, I confess myself that subsequent reflection has not altered the first impression I entertained when we were first informed of the intentions of the Government. I still believe that, on the whole, it would have been wiser to have waited for a year. I think it would have been wiser to have permitted the Emperor of the French to have fulfilled his honourable engagements to the commercial and manufacturing interests of his country, and to have seen what would have been the result of the lapse of such a term, and whether in the necessary order of human affairs the prohibitory system of France would not have concluded at that time. We should then have been placed, if not in an equally advantageous position as regards immediate results, in one which, on the whole, would probably have been more convenient and more conducive to the permanent interests of the country than we now occupy by the Treaty now before our consideration. But if—and I, for one, would not have critically examined the decision of the Government—if they had arrived at a contrary decision, and if, on the whole, they had thought it wiser at once to enter into some agreement with France, without waiting for the perhaps gradual, but what I cannot but believe must have been the inevitable determination of the French nation—if it had been the opinion of the Government of this country that, on the whole, duly weighing those vast and various considerations which must have been placed before their examination on an issue so important, they ought at once to enter into some agreement with the French Government, I still am of opinion that it would have been better, by some alterations of our mutual tariff, to have attained all those ends which could at the present moment be acquired; and then, when the favoured period of July, 1861, had arrived, benefitting, I hope, by experience, we might have completed the work, and accomplished all those ulterior results which by the present Treaty are not achieved, but only contemplated. Sir, I think that under ordinary circumstances that would have been the course which it would have been wiser for us to have taken, and which this House I think, on the whole, would have had no difficulty in sanctioning. I cannot help thinking that under even ordinary circumstances the proceeding by treaty, even for an object so desirable as the increase of our commercial relations with our neighbour, is a course which is scarcely defensible. Certainly in the course of this debate and the various conversations on the same subject that preceded it, I have not yet heard any satisfactory reason why on scientific or political grounds it should have been deemed expedient to tie up the policy of the country for a term of years so long, and that to accomplish results which might, I think, have been realized by a much simpler process. These are the views with which I should have considered this question under ordinary circumstances. Under ordinary circumstances I should have regretted that the Government, in order to attain such desirable ends should have availed themselves of such questionable means; but no man can for a moment maintain that this Treaty has been negotiated under ordinary circumstances. The circumstances are, indeed, of a most exceptional character, and under these circumstances I, myself, object to this Treaty. I object to it on three grounds—those grounds are financial; they are diplomatic; and they are political.

I will not, Sir, enlarge or dwell to-night on the financial objections which I entertain to this Treaty; because I think a fair opportunity has been given to the House to decide upon that portion of the subject; and though I cannot agree with the decision at which they arrived, I am content to take it as one which at least precludes me from, at present, entering into any lengthened discussion on the subject. I think the condition of our revenue is at the present moment such that it was not prudent for us to increase a large deficit by creating a considerable deficiency in addition, in order to obtain the commercial arrangements which are secured by the instrument now on the table. Sir, the House has had that question fairly placed before it. However they may ultimately regret this arrangement—and I believe the time will come, and that, too, even rapidly, when they will deeply regret it—however they may think the scheme of finance propounded by the Government this year to be unsafe in principle, improvident in arrangement, and pernicious in its consequences, I do not think we ought to-night to enter into that discussion. The question has been fairly raised in this House; and I for one, far from regretting that the decision of the House was called for on that scheme, should not have felt that I was doing my duty to my constituents and to my country had I avoided that decision. I think the decision of the House not to the advantage of the country; but I look with no regret to the means by which that decision was arrived at. I think the time will come when the principle the minority then upheld will be recognized as sound. But I think also to-night, although it is my duty to state that one of my objections to this Treaty is founded on what I deem its pernicious influence on our financial condition, all will agree that after that question has been so amply discussed, and has been decided by the House, it would be perfectly unnecessary for me now to revive any of those considerations. Being therefore under ordinary circumstances in favour of any policy which increases the commercial intercourse of the two countries, I may be permitted, before I advance to another stage of my argument, to say that I cannot agree with some Gentlemen who take what I believe to be an exaggerated view of the impending increase of that intercourse. It always has been a fault of the English people—having as they have, no doubt, a commercial instinct superior to that of any other nation—to exaggerate the importance of particular markets. It is a very curious fact that they have always over-estimated those markets which have proved of slight advantage and productiveness to them. Some few years ago the markets of South America were always exalted in this House far above those solid and substantial markets of our North American brethren, which have been the source of so much mutual wealth to both countries. And so at the present moment hon. Gentlemen talk of commercial intercourse with France as if a new California or a new Australia were being opened to us. The hon. Gentleman who seconded this Address (Mr. Baines) and who, from his position and relations with a district of great industry, ought to second it with authority, used this sort of an argument:—"Australia, with 1,000,000 of population, takes £11,000,000 of our exports; France has 36,000,000 of population; multiply the trade of Australia by 36, and you will have some idea of the commercial intercourse which is about to take place. ["No."] Certainly that was the inevitable inference from the hon. Gentleman's argument. He dilated, too, on the case of Brazil, with a population of from 4,000,000 to 5,000,000, and pointing out what a large commercial exchange there was between this country and Brazil, in the very next sentence he showed us that France had eight times the population, and hon. Gentlemen might therefore calculate the vast results to flow from the new commercial policy. But ancient countries will never offer the same markets to a country like England as new colonies, such as Australia and California, or as countries settled under circumstances of modern civilization, like Brazil. We must remember that the manufactures of France are, with some few exceptions, more ancient than the manufactures of England, and I believe there is no one in this House who will say that generally speaking the French are less skilful. On the contrary, all will admit that in many points they are more skilful. I hope that no inconsiderable increase of the commercial relations between the two countries will occur from this Treaty, but depend upon it that it will be to a limited degree only. Depend upon it also, no great branch of industry will ever be allowed to be superseded in France by any great branch of industry of this country. No doubt the introduction of our goods will increase the demand for theirs, will stimulate the invention, and will reduce the cost of French goods; the French consumer generally will be benefited; but the moment there is any prospect of any great branch of industry in France being superseded by any equal branch of industry on this side the water, steps will be taken to prevent such a result. And for this reason alone, if not for others, France, whatever may be her form of government, is essentially a democracy, and a democracy will never submit to any great supercession of native industry. My hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Newdegate) is accustomed to appeal with pride to the fact that the two great nations of France and the United States are favourable to the protective principles which he supports, and you may rely upon it that if you succeed with your new Reform Bill, or with the Reform Bill which is to supplement and succeed it, as announced by the hon. Member for Birmingham, you will soon have a protective interest in this House—a result, perhaps, you little anticipate in calculations. At present I think we are led away by too sanguine a view of what may be the consequences of the opening of this new market. It will be subject to all the conditions which prevail in ancient, populous and highly civilized countries; and as a natural consequence there will be certain limits to our enterprize which at present we do not recognize.

The financial grounds of my objections to the Treaty I shall not now discuss; but I object to it also on diplomatic grounds. It appears to me to be unskilfully and negligently drawn. I have listened with great attention to the debate, but I have heard no satisfactory answer given—though more than one Minister has spoken—to the objections which have been raised by various Members to what appear to be unsatisfactory provisions of the Treaty. I have heard nothing said to account for the mysterious appearance in the Treaty of the 3rd Article which refers to the duties on shipping. There is no apparent reason why an Article of that kind should have been introduced into a treaty of commerce. My hon. Friend, the Member for Stamford (Sir S. Northcote), reminded the House last night that the differential duties on the direct trade of England with France are only removed at present temporarily, and that the French Government, by giving notice, may at any time put an end to the treaty of 1825, when the differential duties will revive, not only with regard to the indirect, but the direct trade also. That is a matter which must occasion anxiety. The very fact that an article of navigation should be introduced into a treaty of commerce is enough to create apprehension in the public mind. In reference to the Article which is the subject of the Amendment now before us, there is an objection to that Article; but we are told that we are unable to discuss it because it is a legal question. It is certainly a new theory that educated English Gentlemen, Members of this House, should not be able to give an opinion on subjects of constitutional law. As I understand it, this House by Act of Parliament has entrusted the Sovereign with certain powers; and we find by this Treaty that the advisers of Her Majesty have recommended Her to dispense with these powers; and now we are told that this being a legal question, Members of Parliament are not competent to give an opinion upon it. But the dispensing power of the Sovereign was once considered a subject on which Members of Parliament were very competent to give an opinion. It appears to me not to be shrouded in any particular obscurity. But, do not let the House suppose that if we agree that we cannot discuss this question because it is a legal question, and then proceed to sanction the Treaty, we shall, therefore, avoid the difficulty. Assume that we agree to this Address. We shall then communicate it to the other House of Parliament, and that House can hardly be prevented from entering on the discussion of a legal question. Great as may be its political distinction, the lustre of its legal reputation is not less distinguished. What may possibly, if not probably, happen if we evade our duty in this House? This question of the 11th Article will be discussed in the other House, and the other House may decide that it is impossible to carry it into effect without an Act of Parliament. The other House may, if it likes, clearly agree to address the Crown on the Treaty—as we have done—but at the same time they may think it proper to introduce an Act into the House to carry the 11th Article into effect. What a reproof to this House if we should have an Act of Parliament sent down to us in order that we should be able to complete our work! I am sure that is not a course which this House would desire should be pursued. I cannot pretend to enter into any discussion upon the statistical question as to our coal resources, to which the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman refers. I take it for granted that he has made no statement on that matter of the truth of which he is not fully convinced. We have had a speech, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman, from one who, no doubt, on such a subject speaks with some weight. He bears the name of one whom I long remember in this House, with whom I was intimate in private life, and whom all of us greatly respected; but I may be allowed to inform the hon. Gentleman—not being altogether unacquainted with that district myself—that the railroads of the present day have penetrated every valley of the South Wales district to which he referred, that they have tapped every field, and that a stimulus has been given to the production of the coal of that part of the country which it is not at all likely can be sustained. But it is impossible to settle a question of this kind by reference to local experience. It is a subject which has occupied the attention of men of science of eminence, who have given to it their personal efforts and the results of the deepest thought. I do not pretend to offer any opinion of my own upon it; I can only refer to those general statements which the best authorities have accepted, and, speaking in round numbers, we are informed that the coal-fields of England and Wales occupy 12,000 square miles, that half of that quantity is not workable, and that every year 16 square miles are exhausted. Every hon. Gentleman can make the calculation for himself, and he will find that, if such is the quantity and such the produce, with such a rate of consumption, the coal will probably last between 300 and 400 years. Every one can estimate what will be the result if that produce and that consumption of coal are doubled. I cannot pretend that this calculation ought to influence legislation; but when an hon. Gentleman of local experience rises and speaking under all the excitement of recent explorations of South Wales, which were stimulated by circumstances which never happened before and will never happen again, gives us the benefit of local experience, I must remind the House that they should receive his calculations with due distrust, and that the different estimate formed by the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment is one sanctioned by philosophers and men of science, whose opinion is recognized by all as authority on the subject.

There are many other other points in this Treaty which appear to me to prove that it has not been negotiated with the skill, knowledge, and attention which are required in such an instrument, and that, on the contrary, there is evidence of precipitation and carelessness. There has been no satisfactory answer to the charges that have been made. It does appear to me to be a very improvident arrangement that the silk manufactures of England should enter France at a certain time subject to a duty of 30 per cent, and that the raw material from France should at the same time be subject to a high duty. I have heard no answer to that objection. The President of the Board of Trade got up last night, and, having no doubt in his mind the celebrated passage which used to be quoted from Mr. Eden as to the difficulty of negotiating treaties of commerce, said, "Why, if we had negotiated a commercial treaty and tried to settle exactly the rate of duty upon every minute detail in every particular branch of manufacture, we should not have got over the question of linens even by this time." But that is no answer to the unfortunate silk manufacturer who has to compete with the French manufacturer subject to a 30 per cent duty, and at the same time receives the raw material of his manufacture subjected to a high duty. He asks naturally,—“Why is there an English Government—why are there Ministers? Why are there negotiators? Why, above all, is there a secret negotiator—if my just interests are not considered.” There is no question of protection or free trade involved in this point, but I really think if he has to undergo a competition under odds which appear to me to be overwhelming, he has, at least, a right to expect that the Ministers of the Queen would have taken care that the raw material should come into this country duty free. And so far as I can learn—of course I speak with hesitation—there would have been no difficulty on the part of the French Government if this claim had been preferred. If it were preferred and refused, I believe it would have been an act of great injustice and not at all indicative of the friendship and amity we are taught to expect; and if it were not preferred, I say there is great negligence on the part of the English Government. We have had no satisfactory answer to those charges. It may seem a little point, but I think it is a point of great importance when we come to consider the arrangement of the Treaty, that we have heard no answer to the complaint of the English brewers. When the Government were introducing French wines into this country, why did they not obtain the French market for our English beer? Here, again, when I have mentioned the circumstance out of doors, I have been assured, upon an authority which influences my opinion, that if that claim had been preferred the French Government would not have objected to it. Is it an evidence of a sedulous attention to English interests, to have omitted a provision of that kind? Why was it omitted? Would it have offended any principles of our new commercial system? Not at all. No one can pretend—not even the Member for Birmingham—that the exchange of English beer for French wine would offend his principles of trade. I have mentioned four instances, and there would be no difficulty in doubling or trebling the number, although it would be wearisome to the House to pursue the matter further; but all these instances show that this Treaty has been negotiated with precipitation; and the very tone of the Government, when criticisms on the Treaty are made, confirms that suspicion. They do not vindicate their instrument. They say, "We are aware of your objections; we admit there is a great deal in them; we will make representations to the French Government, and there is a very fair prospect of obtaining what you seek." What was the cause of this precipitation? What object was to be gained by this haste? These are questions which force themselves on our attention.

Sir, I have stated shortly my objections against this Treaty financially and diplomatically. Financially it affects injuriously a revenue which is in a dilapidated state. Diplomatically it has produced an instrument which does not duly provide for British interests, which might have been provided for in perfect consistency with our commercial system. Nor has any reason yet been given why this negotiation was conducted with so much precipitation. I have now to consider the political objections to this Treaty. And this is a part of the subject which cannot be evaded because we are challenged to consider the Treaty on political grounds. This is a commercial treaty between England and France, I admit. But it is a commercial treaty between England and France mainly and avowedly negotiated for a political purpose. This Treaty was not introduced to us by any statement which I can recollect from any Minister of the Crown. We only incidentally became acquainted with its provisions while we were involved in the dreary labours of a Committee on Customs Acts. But we have a great public State paper which records the principles upon which the negotiations were carried on and the character of the instrument which was contemplated. It has been placed upon the table, and we are indebted alone to that document for a due understanding of the Treaty and the objects proposed to be carried into effect by its means. The noble Lord (Lord John Russell), in language which has been referred to partly, but not completely, for some significant words have been omitted, in the instructions to the negotiators, which is, in fact, the State paper upon which the Treaty is founded, while he dilates on the advantages to commerce and the amiable consequences of intercourse between the two nations, with all of which we are acquainted, writes, "But over and above these considerations the Government attach a high social and political value to the conclusion of a Commercial Treaty with France." A high political value! and therefore it is that I am obliged to consider this Treaty in a political sense. Those who have preceded, and who, not only on the other, but on this side of the House, have deprecated introducing political considerations into a general discussion of the Treaty, seem entirely to have forgotten the standing point upon which this instrument rests, and the introductory terms by which the House of Commons were made acquainted with it. It is, therefore, the political value of this Treaty on which the Government depend. The words where the noble Lord says:

"Its significance at the present moment, when the condition of some parts of the Continent is critical, would be at once understood, and would powerfully reassure the public mind in the various countries of Europe,"

have been quoted already by the right hon. Gentleman, the Mover of the Amendment. But there the right hon. Gentleman stopped. He omitted the first words in the next paragraph, in which the noble Lord frankly states, "On this account Her Majesty's Government are prepared to entertain a negotiation." It is positively stated that, on political grounds, the noble Lord and his colleagues were prepared to entertain a negotiation. I do not blame the noble Lord. All I say is, that, in discussing a Treaty preceded by a State Paper of such a character as this, the noble Lord will not cavil with me, if I inquire into the considerations upon which he proceeded. The noble Lord has gone out of his way, though I am sure he thinks in due fulfilment of his duty, to frankly inform the Parliament of this country what were the principal considerations in negotiating this Treaty, and that they were political grounds "upon which account Her Majesty's Government were prepared to entertain a negotiation." Is the state of Europe less critical at the present moment than when the noble Lord wrote that despatch? The noble Lord has received compliments from both sides of the House upon the spirit with which he has maintained the character of a British Minister in these negotiations. I am not one of those who are apt to believe that any man, occupying the position of the noble Lord, would be wanting in his duty to the Crown and country on any occasion. I am not disposed to believe that the noble Lord, of all others, would form an exception to that rule; but he will, I am sure, not be offended with me if I do not address him in those terms of compliment and eulogy, with which I dare say he has been satiated. He will not misapprehend me if I offer some constitutional criticism on his conduct as Foreign Minister. He will recognize that I am only performing my duty; and as I shall confine myself to facts, and even to something drier than facts, to dates, drawing from them inferences so strictly logical, that I trust the noble Lord himself will not dispute their accuracy, I am persuaded he will not take amiss the contrast I may offer to the encomiums he has received, but will be ready to afford me, if he can, an answer that will be satisfactory to the House on points that require some elucidation with reference to this Treaty, before I can give my assent to the Address moved by the hon. Member for Middlesex.

Sir, the night when it was first proposed that an Address should be presented to the Crown, and when the Motion was unexpectedly postponed, some discussion arose on the subject of our relations with France. I had not at that time read the papers which were circulated only in the course of that morning; and, therefore, I would not have presumed, even if it had been desirable—which the House thought, and very justly, that it was not—to enter then into that question. But, Sir, I have read those papers since then. They have been referred to in this House, and noticed in different moods by different speakers. But no one has made the inquiry of the noble Lord which I wish to make to-night; because, until I have an answer to it, I cannot form a just opinion upon the condition of Europe, which he describes as so critical, and which, because it is so critical, he thinks is a reason why we should conclude a Commercial Treaty with France. Now, I have read these papers: and so much having been said—unjustly in many in-spirit of passion and pre- to indulge in at this mo- to our neighbours, I am at, to me, the conduct of oment in this matter of suppose is the question them, now renders the affairs critical, appears, glish Government is con- seen sincere, frank, and straightforward. That is my opinion, which I am prepared to prove; and, what is more, I think I can prove it in a very short space which I know is a recommendation. The House will remember that in July last, when the noble Lord, the present Foreign Secretary, announced to us the Preliminaries of Villafranca, he congratulated us upon the fact that France had required no accession of territory, and he adverted to the distressing rumour previously afloat—namely, that it had been the intention of France to demand the annexation of Savoy. That showed that the noble Lord's mind was perfectly alive to the question, and, indeed, he must have found, from the archives of the Foreign Office, that it was a subject which had occupied—though not to a very great degree, still in a manner sufficient at once to have attracted the noble Lord's own notice to it—the attention of his predecessor. Therefore the noble Lord was perfectly aware in July last that the question of the annexation of Savoy had been rife, and he justly congratulated us on that annexation not having been demanded by France. Well, we have in these papers a Despatch, in which Her Majesty's Government are informed that, after the Preliminaries of Villafranca had been signed, the Emperor of the French had renounced his intention of mooted that question, and the subject of the annexation of Savoy seemed to have entirely dropped. But it now appears from the papers before us, by a despatch dated at the end of January of this year, in the interval between the despatch which announced that the Emperor had given up all intention to annex Savoy, that if not at the same moment, yet subsequently, and on more than one occasion—in consequence, no doubt, of the difficulties which arose as to carrying into execution the Treaty of Zurich—the Minister of France had frankly informed the Ambassador of the Queen at Paris that, in case the Treaty of Zurich was not carried into effect, the Emperor of the French would certainly look to the annexation of the Duchy of Savoy and the province of Nice as a necessary consequence. That appears clearly in the papers. Well, the noble Lord having been aware that under certain circumstances which were distinctly indicated—namely, if Sardinia was aggrandized and became a considerable Power in Italy, France would require the annexation of these Sardinian provinces as a compensation; I want to ask the noble Lord—who will have an opportunity of answering me to-night—how it came that from that moment he pursued a policy in Italy which, if successful, would have rendered the annexation of these provinces to France inevitable? The noble Lord was of opinion that the territorial aggrandizement of Sardinia was a highly desirable object; of course, he and his colleagues believed that it was an English interest to strengthen Sardinia and make her a Power, if not of first-rate, still of considerable importance. Do not let us now enter into any controversy on that point. If it is to be a subject of controversy, let it be reserved for a future occasion. But I assume that the noble Lord and his colleagues did not arrive at that conclusion unless they were convinced it was an English interest to pursue such a policy. But before they adopted that policy, they must have considered which was best—whether Sardinia should be weak and the frontiers of France not extended, but maintained according to the terms of treaties, Sardinia remaining in a position very different from that in which they wished to see her placed; or they must have decided that it was better that Sardinia should be aggrandized, and the boundaries of France at the same time expanded by the annexation of these two provinces. I will not now discuss which of those alternatives was to be preferred. I give the Government credit for taking the course they believed to be right. But I say this is inevitable—that with the information they possessed they must have been aware all this time that they were pursuing a policy in Italy—namely, the aggrandizement and strengthening of Sardinia, which must necessarily lead to the annexation of Nice and Savoy to France. The House will, I think, see that I am stating the case fairly. If that be so, how can Her Majesty's Government now turn round upon France and say, "What is all this? You have taken us by surprise. We find you are going to annex two Sardinian provinces. This is behaving in a manner that can be described only in the language of the noble Lord's despatches. You are producing distrust and suspicion throughout Europe. You are disturbing the settlement of Europe. Men's minds are led to the remembrance of long and sanguinary struggles, and, perhaps, the result will be fatal to your dynasty." So strange is the mode in which papers are laid before Parliament, so much better informed of their foreign affairs are every nation under the sun than the English Parliament, that by a most remarkable circumstance there is no record on our table at this moment—none in these papers or in any other English official document—of an attempt by the noble Lord at the commencement of this year—following the great principle of non-interference so universally admitted and generally practised—to settle the affairs of Italy. At the beginning of this year the noble Lord produced four propositions for the adjustment of the affairs of Italy. We have no official record of them. [Lord J. RUSSELL was understood to say that papers had been delivered that day.] Well, we have no printed record in our possession, and the circumstance just mentioned by the noble Lord does not touch my argument. But we have a despatch of the French Minister commenting on those four propositions, and published to all Europe, and, strange to say, though only owing to a casual inquiry of the hon. Member for Tamworth, the noble Lord has himself expressed in this House what those four propositions were. Although that took place a fortnight, or for aught I know, a month ago, it was only this evening that the noble Lord placed these propositions on our table. What are these propositions? The gist of them, if they mean anything, is the establishment of Sardinia as a powerful State in Italy. The noble Lord will not deny that. The noble Lord proposes that it shall be left to the people of Central Italy to decide to whom they shall belong. No one doubts that when the noble Lord made that proposition, he had a conviction—and I think it is the conviction of a majority of this House, and, perhaps, of Europe—that the choice of the people of Central Italy would be for their annexation to Sardinia. I am sure I shall not be contradicted, then, when I say that the purport of the four propositions is, that Sardinia should be established as a powerful Government in Italy. Those propositions are offered for the consideration of France; France agrees to them, with the exception of one of quite minor importance, about the immediate evacuation of Italy by her armies. Now, I want to know from the noble Lord whether, when he offered those propositions to the French Ministry—the result of which would be the aggrandizement of Sardinia by the addition of the Duchies and the whole of Central Italy—I want to know whether upon that the French Minister informed him that his Government had renounced the condition they had previously annexed to such an event—namely, that Savoy and Nice should be annexed to France. That is a question that should be answered by the noble Lord. For six months the noble Lord has been perfectly aware, as appears from these documents, that in the event of Sardinia being thus aggrandized France would claim Savoy and Nice; the noble Lord has a settlement in January for the aggrandizement and strengthening of Sardinia in the manner referred to, and I now put it to him to say whether the French Government then informed him that they had renounced the contingent condition of claiming those two provinces. I do not think that the noble Lord can rise and tell me he was so informed. But is that all? The noble Lord sent his propositions for the settlement of Italy by the formation of a great Italian Power under the King of Sardinia to the great Powers of Europe—to Austria, Prussia, and Russia. But did the noble Lord at the same time inform the great Powers that if those propositions were adopted it was of his knowledge that France would claim an expansion of her frontier in the direction of Savoy and Nice? If the noble Lord, possessing that knowledge, did not impart it to our Allies, I ask him whether that is the mode in which the diplomacy of a great country like this ought to be carried on? These are subjects upon which, when we are asked to agree to a Treaty on account of the critical condition of Europe we are, I think, bound to demand the fullest information from the noble Lord.

Sir, there is another point upon which at this moment I think it of the utmost importance the House should have correct information; and that is the manner in which very important information oozes out in these despatches which, otherwise, would never have reached the ears of Parliament, having been conveyed in what are called "private letters." I am perfectly willing to admit to the noble Lord that it is not only of the utmost advantage, but of the greatest importance that there should be unreserved communication between the Secretary of State and the Ambassadors and Ministers of the Queen at foreign Courts. At Paris, for example, the Ambassador has to write hurriedly to the Secretary of State once, perhaps twice or thrice, a day, and even where there is no hurry there are many observations and views which can only be expressed in private letters, and cannot and ought not to form the subject of a public despatch. It is proper, however, that the House should be clearly instructed what these private letters are. The private letters of an Ambassador to the Secretary of State are purely and entirely what that epithet implies. They are private letters, and nothing more. The Secretary of State is not bound to show them to his colleagues. They are very rarely seen by any one except the Secretary of State himself, and perhaps the Prime Minister; and, indeed, they come so rapidly, and his colleagues are so absorbed in their own Departments, it would be impossible to do anything else. As a matter of usage the Secretary of State is not bound to place those private letters even before the Sovereign. If he quits office he takes them with him, and they form no part of the record of our diplomatic transactions or the authentic history of our public business. I find no fault with that. I am convinced that it is a practice not only expedient and beneficial, but necessary; that it would be unwise to attempt to restrict the confidential communication of the Minister with the agents of the Sovereign; and that, indeed, no man would assume the responsibilities of office if debarred of such an advantageous means of carrying on its duties with effect. Still the House ought to know that the line is distinctly drawn between private letters and the public records of the country; and I say that, from the very nature of these confidential communications, it is not right that a Secretary of State or an Ambassador should in their public despatches fall back upon their private letters. I find from these papers that most important information is contained in private letters, which are not produced. We have here no evidence that subsequently to the despatch in July, which announces that the Emperor had renounced his intention of annexing Savoy, that information was neutralized and falsified, had it not been for the private letters of Lord Cowley. Here we have an Ambassador sending a public despatch, in which he positively announced that the Emperor had given up his intention of annexing Savoy; and it is only in those private letters that we discover afterwards that, circumstances having changed, the French Minister, apparently with the utmost frankness, more than once, perhaps frequently, informed the British Ministry that if the Treaty of Zurich, constituting the Preliminaries to the Treaty of Villafranca, were not carried into effect, the Emperor would revert to his original intention. I say that a diplomatic narrative placed before this House ought to be a complete narrative. Do not let the House run away with the idea—that I am pedantically dwelling on a point of form. It is not a mere form, but a matter in which the highest interests of the State are involved. Suppose there had been a change of Ministry at the commencement of the year. The first duty of the new Ministry would probably have been to consult upon the affairs of Italy. It might have been their opinion that it would be advantageous to Europe and to England to strengthen Sardinia, and to assist in establishing her as a Power of importance; but, as far as the record of public transactions in the Foreign Office is concerned, they would have been completely in the dark as to the fact that the adoption of that policy must necessarily lead to the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France. Because, generally speaking, the Secretary of State, when he retires from office, is accompanied by the Ambassador. If not invariably the rule, that was the former practice, and it is one, I believe, which ought never to have been given up. The House therefore will see the necessity that there should be a complete register in the Foreign Office of the diplomatic transactions of the country.

It appears, then, from these papers that from the month of July or a little after—from the moment the difficulties respecting the execution of the Treaty of Zurich occurred, Her Majesty's Ministers were perfectly aware that it was the intention of France, if that Treaty were not carried into effect, as it was soon known it would be impossible, to claim the annexation of Savoy and Nice. All this time Her Majesty's Ministers have been pursuing a policy which, without agreeing with it, I will grant for argument was sound and worthy, but which if successful must necessarily lead to that annexation. And it is under these circumstances that Her Majesty's Government have asked the House to enter into a treaty of commerce with France. Early in January Mr. Grey, then Chargé d'Affaires at Paris, communicated to the Government the alarm of the Swiss Government, and of their Minister at Paris, at the project of annexing Savoy and Nice. The negotiation of the Commercial Treaty went on, but no instructions were sent to Mr. Grey in reference to the subject of his letter, nor were any steps taken to make the French Government aware that the views of Her Majesty's Ministers on the annexation were such as they afterwards expressed. It was not till the end of January that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs wrote the despatch on which he has received the compliments of so many hon. Gentlemen. I ask the House this—is it any compensation for the negligence and neglect of a Minister during six months, that at the end of that time, when the mischief is done, he should take refuge in a grandiloquent despatch? That document is, no doubt, very convenient for the House of Commons; but I should have liked one in the same spirit to have been sent to the French Emperor months before. The Emperor of the French is supposed, and I believe with justice, to be not insensible to public opinion—a quality not to be despised; but, according to the noble Lord's own narrative, he appears during all these months, to have made no effort to protest against a policy which he himself described at the end of January as one which would fill Europe with alarm and distrust as of a disturbing character, and that might lead to the most distressing and dreadful consequences. Yet the noble Lord commences this Session by placing on the table a paper which is to be the foundation of a Treaty of Commerce between England and France, which Treaty he recommends on account of the critical condition of Europe, and because its significance at that moment would be understood, and would powerfully reassure the public mind in the various countries of Europe. The various countries of Europe! Why, if the noble Lord had done his duty when he sent out his four propositions at the commencement of January, the various countries of Europe must have been aware of the contemplated annexation of Savoy and Nice! And yet under these circumstances the Treaty of Commerce between England and France was to reassure the public mind. Why, these are among the most inconsistent circumstances that have ever occurred in the history of diplomacy; yet these are the papers for which the noble Lord has received compliments—compliments upon a despatch written at the end of January, when the noble Lord, had he not been absorbed in his Italian enthusiasm and thinking only of results, which, if attained, must have produced the very catastrophe the contemplation of which he afterwards deplored, must have taken a course diametrically opposite. These are matters which require explanation. When we are asked to assent to a treaty of commerce between this country and France, on account of the critical condition of Europe, that critical condition being the result of the policy which the noble Lord deplures, I must ask the Government to condescend at least to explain these inconsistencies. The House is, with regard to this question, placed in an embarrassing position, one not favourable to the exercise of its privileges, and one which I think has been brought about by its own laches, and which it will ultimately very much regret. When this matter was first before us I endeavoured to call the attention of the House to the position in which we were placed. Unfortunately the House was not then sufficiently aware of the circumstances; the subject was a new one, it was hurried, I think, not to the advantage of the Government, I am sure greatly to the disadvantage of the House; but, had we only adopted what begins now to be understood, the procedure of 1787, we should not have been placed in the somewhat humiliating position in which we now find ourselves. A treaty with France is recommended to the House on account of the critical condition of Europe, and the excellent effect it would have; that critical condition of Europe turns out to be an act of aggression on the part of France which we strongly disapprove, yet by this treaty appear to sanction; and yet the House is placed in such a situation that it really can pronounce no practical opinion upon this most important instrument. If we had originally, instead of going into Committee on Customs Acts, gone, as the House did in the time of Mr. Pitt, into Committee upon the Treaty, all this embarrassment would have been avoided. That was the Motion that I made. I could not propose it in so many words, because the forms of the House prevented me, but that was the object which I endeavoured to obtain. Had that course been adopted, the Government might have carried all their Resolutions in Committee on the Commercial Treaty, and after they had carried them the House could have addressed the Crown, and could have pronounced their opinion upon the Treaty. Under those circumstances, the revenue would not have been disturbed; the Resolutions would have been only provisional Resolutions, depending upon the House approving the Treaty of Commerce. Owing to the course which was adopted, the evils of which the House was at the time but little aware, it is idle to pretend that our opinion can really be given with any effect upon this most momentous Treaty. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Address commented upon what he considered a most strange and indefensible proposition of mine, that we should consider the Treaty before we addressed the Crown. No such nonsense ever entered into my head. There is only one way in which we can consider a Treaty, and that is upon an Address to the Crown; but what I wanted to impress upon the House originally was this, "Do not go into Committee of Customs and sacrifice all this revenue before you address the Crown; because the Address to the Crown, so far as it can influence public events, will, in fact, then be only an idle ceremony;" and an idle ceremony it is to-night, because, however grave may be my objections to this Treaty upon political grounds, yet, after what the House has done, I feel that it is impossible to offer any opposition to it. Regarding it from a diplomatic point of view, carping at and criticizing a Treaty is not a ground upon which you can refuse to address the Crown; and when we come to financial considerations, why, if you were to terminate the Treaty now you have lost your revenue.

Let us understand what is the state of affairs in which Her Majesty's Government have entered into this Treaty, and are now calling for our decision upon it. Is it a state of affairs such as the House was led to believe existed when the Treaty was laid upon the table? You have heard from an Imperial Throne the announcement of a political principle, the consequences of which none of us can foresee, and the ultimate results of which many of us will not live to witness—the natural boundaries of empire. It has been publicly announced that empires have natural boundaries; and who can foresee what may be the consequences of such a policy in action? We know now that Her Majesty's Government even at the tenth hour have protested against this doctrine. We know that they have described and denounced it as one of the most dangerous that can be pursued, one that must fill Europe with suspicion, with apprehension, with distrust, and one that is associated with long and sanguinary wars, with the fall of empires, and with the fate of dynasties. This is their own description of the critical state of Europe, and it is under these circumstances that we are called upon to approve this Treaty with the very Power which the noble Lord the Secretary of State himself has described as a Power of disturbance and distrust. Since the right hon. Gentleman introduced his financial scheme to the House all the circumstances are changed. We are not influenced by the same feelings, the country is not thinking of the same considerations. All is altered since the day when I endeavoured to lead you to a safer course [laughter and cheers], which everybody feels now and privately admits to have been the proper one, and which was then met by rhetorical gibes as it now is by unmeaning laughter. We shall, however, I hope, before this Address is voted, receive from the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs some explanation of the incomprehensible passages in his conduct to which I have called attention. I hope we shall learn from him why, in possession, and in full and complete possession, of the policy of the French Government, he did not communicate it to us and to his Allies, why he pursued in Italy a policy which favoured and even precipitated the policy of Franco, which he himself disapproves, and why in placing these papers before the House he does so in such a manner that it is with the utmost difficulty we can arrive at a conclusion as to the policy of the Government; of which, under these circumstances, I will only say, as the noble Lord said of that of the Emperor of the French, that it fills me with distrust, and I believe will lead to disturbance.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, that the House will be of opinion that the time for the full discussion of the important matters that have occupied the greater part of the speech of the right hon. Gentlemen has not yet arrived, but will be afforded at that probably early period when we shall be invited by the Motion of the hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake) to enter on the consideration of the conduct of the Government, and of the position of the country with reference to the province of Savoy. At present it is necessary for me to say but very little on that point. If the question of Savoy, or if any other question of foreign policy upon which a difference of opinion with the French Government might possibly arise, was before the Cabinet of Her Majesty at the time when the substance of this Treaty was negotiated, it was before us as a comparatively remote and hypothetical proceeding; and I hold that, inasmuch as, in the state of European politics which exists at the present day, you cannot expect a uniform concurrence of opinion between two great and independent countries like England and France, therefore if we were to contemplate the possible occurrence of cases in which it might be our duty frankly to express our dissent from any policy entertained by France, and to point out to her the evils which might follow its adoption, the very best mode of strengthening our own position for all events was to unite cordially with France in a great act of policy, fraught with benefit to both countries, to which we were frankly invited by her, and which, whatever might occur, was the best preparation for friendly relations between the two Governments, because it tended not only to create these friendly relations between the Governments, but also to give them a broad and deep and solid basis in the friendly sympathies of the two nations.

With respect to the course of the debate I must confess I should be perfectly content to rest the argument for the Treaty of Commerce with France, irrespective of the able speech made by a Member of the Government, upon the various speeches which have been delivered by hon. Gentlemen, most of them, though not all, sitting on this side of the House—beginning with the admirable speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesex, so ably seconded by the hon. Member for Leeds, and followed by a long list of Gentlemen who brought to the support of this Treaty every gift of knowledge and ability, among whom if I do not include the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth it is only because of the much too favourable and flattering terms in which he thought fit to allude to myself. At the same time, Sir, I am sorry to say that there was one speech which, if I estimate it aright, stands in striking contrast with the general tone of the debate. I refer of course to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman). Her Majesty's Government have been unfortunate beyond description during the present Session in attempting to win the favour of my right hon. Friend. Scarcely had the Session opened when he complained that never did a Government present to Parliament so scanty a programme of business; but scarcely had it proceeded three weeks more when he again complained that such was the crowd and mass of business forced upon the attention of the House by the Government that they were greedily and irrationally demanding from private Members a portion of time which properly belonged to them. My right hon. Friend has told us to-night that he is an older Free-trader than any Gentleman except one who sits upon the Treasury Bench, and yet almost in the same breath he informed us that the country which diminishes its import duties makes a present of its revenue to the foreigner. Two millions, says he, of import duties we shall have made a present of to France before France begins to act upon this Treaty. Such is the mode in which my right hon. Friend illustrates his old experience and his happy conception of the doctrines of free trade. My right hon. Friend says that the Government have contrived in this Treaty to betray the interests of England, and at the same time to ruin the interests of France; for, he tells us, whoever supports the plans of the French Emperor is, in the opinion of the French people ruining the interests of France. He says, again, that by the 11th Article of the Treaty my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who is necessarily in a peculiar degree responsible for every treaty, and the entire Government have abandoned and betrayed the highest and most vital interests of this country; and yet he is perfectly satisfied, as he declared in another part of his speech, to leave in the hands of my noble Friend the conduct of our foreign affairs. These are the declarations of my right hon. Friend; but they are declarations of secondary importance, because they merely express the criticisms of an individual Member of Parliament on the conduct of the Government—there were graver matters involved in his speech; and, as a Member of the House of Commons, as an Englishman, and not less as one holding office under the Crown, I must take leave to enter my respectful protest against the whole tone and language of my right hon. Friend, when he described the character, policy, and conduct of a neighbouring and friendly nation. My right hon. Friend, in drawing a contrast between England and France, said that the policy France was “aggression, aggrandizement, and war.” I admit to my right hon. Friend that if the time has really come when it is the duty of a Member of the British Parliament, of a man of ability and experience like my right hon. Friend, thus to describe the permanent and standing character and policy of a neighbouring and friendly nation, then, indeed, it is inappropriate to be discussing either treaties of commerce or amendments to treaties of commerce, not to speak of some paltry amendment relating to the export of coal, but we ought to have a sweeping and un-mistakeable vote of condemnation passed at once upon the Treaty that has been made and upon the Government that had made it. Again, says my right hon. Friend, it is not the best way to secure peace with the French people to wound and irritate their feelings. That is one of the dicta necessary to make up the budget of inconsistencies and contradictions which my right hon. Friend has exhibited to-night. “It is not the best way to wound and irritate their feelings.” I ask him to put himself in their position, and then to inquire of himself whether, if he had heard such a speech delivered by a subject of a nation in peace and alliance with his own, his feelings would or would not have been wounded and irritated? But my right hon. Friend endeavoured to save himself by drawing a minute distinction between the French Government and the French nation, and he told us that we were conspiring with their ruler against the French people. Does he really imagine that, in order to soothe the feelings of the French people, he has only to draw these distinctions between them and their Government, which no foreign nation has a right to draw? We have no right, I repeat, to draw such distinctions. It is not only an interference, but it is an interference of the most offensive kind; and if there be in France one spark of that patriotism which we were told to foster in England, every Frenchman must read, as every Englishman would read, with indignation much of what we have heard to-night.

[Second Night.]

Sir, it appears to me that there is no great difficulty in construing the passage which has been quoted by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) from the despatch of Lord Cowley on the subject of the Treaty. I think he gives it too narrow a construction if he intends it to be understood that the opinion of the Government was that only on political grounds was this Treaty to be judged. We have always frankly admitted that the Treaty must be tried upon its merits with reference to commerce and trade, and with reference also to the indirect effects which commerce and trade would produce. With respect to political grounds, we could not, undoubtedly, be insensible to the fact that there was much at the time when these negotiations were going on in which France and England had a common feeling, and in which France and England jointly were the main European champions of the principles and representatives of the Powers by which alone we could hope to see the affairs of Europe settled. When we looked to Italy, which has long been a suppressed volcano, certain to burst out and to produce most dangerous complications in Europe, no impartial man could deny that, whether the Emperor's title to make war in Italy was good or bad, no inconsiderable effects had been produced by the war, whether they were due to the valour of France or to the moderation of Austria, and no inconsiderable progress made towards the settlement of Italian affairs, which upon every ground of European interest and of British feeling was a consummation much to be desired. Take the state of feeling in England. It surely could not be possible for any rational man to see the state of things that prevailed in Italy, and not to desire to make an effort, in itself beneficial, but likewise recommended by the likelihood of its being successful, for the purpose of applying a remedy, or at least a palliative. We had the greatest alarm and apprehension in the public mind on the score of the great military preparations that were being made abroad. We had an immense and constantly growing increase of our own expenditure, connected very much with that alarm and apprehension. Last year it was the painful duty of the Government to propose a great addition to the burdens of the country, and we have the prospect of further additional expenditure in the present year and for a long succession of years. Was not that a reason for endeavouring to act upon the alarm and apprehension which prevailed, and to endeavour to stay the evil, not by the discontinuance of measures which the safety of the country required, but by the adoption of a process which, like the silent and ceaseless processes of nature herself, would bring into play a thousand beneficial influences on the side of peace, and which from day to day and from year to year would counteract the prevailing alarms by undermining their causes, and by substituting for whatever remained of panic on the one hand or undue military spirit on the other, those solid habits and usages of friendship which are cemented and strengthened by the peaceful intercourse of commerce and trade?

But the political part of the question I will not dwell upon; I will go to those portions of it which are more within my own proper sphere. And here I must confess I have listened with great satisfaction to the course of the present debate, because I take it for granted that the best objections that could be made to the Treaty have been made. And what do they come to? We have heard something of bargains, and we have been told that this Treaty is a bargain; that we have asked for equivalents, and that we have not got them. Sir, I deny that this Treaty has ever been a bargain, for it is of the essence of a bargain that you give away something which it would be of value to you to retain, and that you receive something which it is important to the other party to keep. This is a reciprocal instrument if you like, but a bargain it is not, for you are giving nothing to France that is not a gift to yourself, and you are receiving nothing from France except measures by which France confers a benefit upon herself. In the first place it would be unnecessary, and in the next place it would be mischievous, to inquire the precise measure of percentage on this article or on that—whether the restraint on the exportation of rags is duly balanced by the duty on paper, or whether the duty which France leaves on the raw silk she sends to us shall be removed when we are sending her enormous quantities of raw silk without any duty at all. All these propositions it was unnecessary, and much worse than unnecessary, to entertain. The hon. Member for Stamford (Sir S. Northcote) fell into a ludicrous error last night. He speaks of the slovenliness of the Treaty with regard to the export of rags. He says we have covered that by obtaining the removal of the prohibition, but that is only one fault in the Treaty, and there are twenty others. But that is not a fault in the Treaty. We have never attempted the impossible task of constructing such a system of equivalents. We have had warning enough in the experience of former years. And what says the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir H. Cairns), who finds fault with us and comes forward to instruct us? He finds fault with us for not having entered into these minute adjustments—for not having settled how much duty should be levied on every description of linen goods; and then he says, "Why not go to Spain and see whether she will not enter upon these minute and endless discussions?" I will tell him why. Because we knew quite well that, if there were any means of obstructing the progress of free trade, it was by entering upon these negotiations in the spirit of bargain that he recommends. And even that is not all; for, not only would he have been entangled, if he had had the management of these negotiations, in hopeless complications that would have made him times out of mind pray his stars that he had never meddled with it, but while he was involved in the attempt to disentangle these inexplicable difficulties and complications—and I really pay him the compliment of saying that he was the man to do it if it could be done—the whole of those proceedings, involving millions of revenue, would have become patent to the public, and the last result of that blessed undertaking would have been a total paralysis alike of trade and of revenue, and of no inconsiderable portion of the commerce and industry of the country. These, Sir, are the reasons why we declined these negotiations, and it is no blot on the Treaty that it does not provide for the free export of rags. We came to the conviction that if France once frankly, sincerely, and decisively entered upon the career of freedom of trade, her own experience of the commencing stages would be a security for her proceeding onwards towards its consummation such as we could not by any other means obtain. That is the meaning of the Treaty, and that is the reason of the avoidance of these minute arrangements, which, hopeless and impossible at any time, would have been mischievous and absurd under the particular circumstances, because they would have led to a total misconception of the fundamental principles of the Treaty. That is the reason why the Treaty has been framed such as it is, and not such as has been recommended by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite.

Sir, I will only say one word on what fell from the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), who says that the increase of the income tax is due to this Treaty. I must say that is a very inaccurate statement of the case. In the first place, it is the loss really due to the Treaty, and only small in amount. In our proceedings we have been very precise in our calculation of the exact loss incurred by the Treaty, and we have endeavoured to make it jointly with the hon. Member for the Treaty. But I am urged with the benefit of Portugal through the Eschequer

the admission of their wines at a low price, nor are we, so far as I am aware, bound by any treaty to extend unconditionally to those countries the benefits we extend to France. The whole annual amount of loss of revenue under the Treaty upon our commerce with France cannot, I think, even at the outset, be estimated at more than £600,000 or £700,000 a year—that is, including the ultimate fall of the wine duties, which will not take place before the expiration of nine months. On commercial grounds, then, I put against a very small loss of revenue for a year the promise of a very great extension of trade. With regard to the great staples of France, wine and brandy, the reduction of duty is such as to promise a great increase of trade. As regards ourselves, I wish to call the particular attention of the House to this—that we have long acted on the principle that all differential duties are impolitic and bad, and that there is not even a single duty of any moment—I am not sure there is even one of the very smallest—that we abandon under the Treaty with France that is not strictly a differential duty. I look to France, and I must say that I can conceive no measure more qualified to attach the people of France than a Treaty like this. We have been told that the people of France, forsooth, are opposed to this Treaty. So far as I have had opportunities of judging, I should say it appears to me the case is this—that there is a limited and powerful class in France to which, at any rate for the moment, the Treaty may be obnoxious. But you have hardly any country where so large a mass of the population are so directly interested, not only as consumers, but also as producers, and whose productions would immediately receive so greatly increased a value from a Commercial Treaty; and here you will have another most powerful agency that will attach the people of France to this Treaty and all connected with it. France is likely to receive a very large increase of Customs' revenue under this Treaty. What can be more beneficial to France than a treaty that will enable the Government to reduce the additions to the direct taxation of that country? I believe that even the hon. Member for Birmingham will admit that the people of France are not so enamoured of direct taxation as not to see with pleasure the prospect of a remission of direct taxation. I must confess I have the strongest conviction that there is another great commercial benefit not alluded to in this debate, but which may be anticipated from this Treaty. Should circumstances be favourable to its development, I do not think that anything could withstand the moral contagion of France and England acting together in the sense of liberty of commerce. As long as England stood alone, it was easy to say, "This nation has grown old and great by Protection, and she can afford to throw away the ladder by which she has mounted to eminence." That is the current language about us. I admit that the admirable example we set has been but slightly, reluctantly, and partially followed; and I believe that the right hon. Gentleman, who, I admit, has spoken with moderation, is in error in supposing that the Emperor was about to introduce a system analogous to the provisions of the Treaty by independent legislation in France. Such an opinion is totally contrary to the information we possess. It rests upon no documents. The right hon. Gentleman has, I think, mistaken the negative promise of the Emperor, that no prohibitions should be removed before a certain date, for a positive promise of the Emperor that at that date those prohibitions shall be removed. It was not a fraud practised on the people, but we enabled the Emperor to hold out to the people of France by the advantages this Treaty will confer upon them additional inducements to wish the system of prohibition altered. But the advantages to be derived from this Treaty will go far beyond France, for I believe that the example of France joined with England in one course and policy will spread far beyond the limits of those two countries, and the results which the changes in this Treaty ought to achieve will be not merely to make 2*d.* into 4*d.*, as an hon. Member has said, but to turn the hearts and minds of men to the blessings of peace; and gradually to spread from country to country and from region to region a sense of the manifold evils that result from protection.

Sir, let us now consider shortly what are the articles on which many of the hopes of the opposition to this Treaty are founded. Great hopes which had been entertained with regard to one item were dispelled, in a great degree, by the prudent and kindly announcement we were permitted to make the other evening on the part of the French Emperor; but, though rags have failed, yet some hopes were entertained until a recent period on the subject of shipping. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) very frankly admitted that when he first read the article with regard to shipping—the 3*rd* Article—he, in common with the rest of the world, totally misunderstood it; but he congratulated himself that he had by study extricated himself from his error, whereas a portion of the world are still wandering in darkness. We have had unfortunate proof that such is the case. My hon. Friend the Member for Stamford showed last night that he did not understand the Article, and the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, following him to-night with ready confidence, has likewise exhibited a similar unacquaintance with the spirit and intention and whole effect and character of this Article. The hon. Member for Stamford began by ascribing to Government a defence of the Article which the Government did not make, and having set up a lay figure wherewith to fight, he, of course, had no difficulty in knocking it down. He said that the Government defended the Article by asserting that it related to the indirect trade. My right hon. Friend (Mr. M. Gibson) last night did not so defend it. I say that it does not refer to the indirect trade, but to the direct trade only. I want to give an example of the extravagancies into which ingenious men are led when there is something or other to which they must object. "Now, mind," hon. Gentlemen seemed to have said, "you must object to the 3*rd* Article; handle it, turn it over, see what you can make of it, but object to it you must;" and so my hon. Friend opposite detected a deep plot in this Article, and urged that the French Emperor had outwitted and entrapped the simple-minded British negotiators. The Article reserves, it is quite true, differential duties on French shipping; and it is true that these differential duties are not paid by British shipping; but my hon. Friend says that the meaning is obvious, and that the French Emperor, having got the Treaty of Commerce, will give notice to terminate the Treaty of navigation, and then the differential duties will be applicable to British shipping. An argument more far-fetched or more contrary to nature and reason there could not be than one which supposed that the man who with almost unparalleled boldness has undertaken to negotiate this Treaty in France, in the teeth of so much interested opposition, and who thereby runs the risk of alienating powerful parties from his Government, would the day after pledging himself in the face of his people to the principles of free trade, reverse the only instrument which prevents the unlimited protection of shipping, and revert to the old state before the Treaty. But that is not all, for what would be the effect if the Emperor exercised this cunning? It is perfectly true that, if the Treaty of navigation were at an end, this 3rd Article would enable the Emperor to impose against English shipping the differential duties which now exist in the French law,—that is to say, that by terminating the Treaty of navigation he would obtain a limited power of imposing differential duties. But what should we get? That proceeding would give to us the unlimited power of imposing duties on French ships, for then there would be nothing to prevent our prohibiting the entrance of every French ship into our ports. Let me give to my hon. Friend the real, natural, and true account of this Article. So far from having to apologize on account of this Treaty to those who represent British shipping, the Government maintain that the Treaty does much for British shipping. What will be the increase of the coal trade under this Treaty? What is the meaning of your alarms and fears for the exhaustion of English coal in 300 years? At any rate, as long as it lasts a great many more English ships will be employed in carrying it. Perhaps you think that French ships will carry it all. On the contrary, of the shipping already employed in the trade 69 per cent are British ships, and 28 per cent are French ships. That sounds grateful to the ears of hon. Gentlemen opposite. But now, what is the specific purpose of this Article? I have already stated, that of the ships now employed in the trade 69 per cent are British, and 28 are French. That makes only 97; the other three are foreign ships that go to English ports and engage in the indirect trade of carrying coal from England to France, and thus become liable to the differential duties. Now France is afraid, and naturally, that the specified rates of duties on English goods should be used by foreign ships to claim exemption from the differential duties they have at present to pay; and though France is willing to expose herself to competition in the direct trade, she will not permit it in the indirect trade, as she is afraid of the rivalry of the Dutch, Danish, and other navigators who now engage in the trade, and she asked for the insertion of this article in order to prevent their competition. There is, therefore, a slight flavour, a small pinch of protection, in this article. There is a protection in favour of French ships, but there is also a protection in favour of British ships. Now will not the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) admit that this article at any rate was not written in Bedlam. That is the case as regards the shipowners, and though the purists of free trade may not endure to sully her maiden hues—though they may say you ought not to consent to this article, by which you indirectly receive a benefit from protection—yet I think hon. Gentlemen opposite will not blame us on this account. Ships constituted one of the points on which great hopes long turned, and those hopes have not been abandoned to-night by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire; but I trust that he also is now satisfied as to the object and scope of the Article.

Every thing else having broken down, there still remained the subject of coal, which has been thought strong enough to bear the weight of an Amendment. I do not think that the right hon. Member for Stroud has done justice to himself, for this is but a narrow conclusion to a broad speech. His speech went much further, and the conclusion he has arrived at is, compared with the speech, so inadequate that I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman cannot go home easy to-night. At any rate, he has the consolation of reflecting that he made a gallant struggle to save one of the most vital interests of England. I must say, however, that I do not think my right hon. Friend relies much on what may be called the extra-commercial part of the case. He did not enter into details on that part of the subject relating to the prerogative of the Crown, nor will I now attempt to do so. I will satisfy myself with stating that, so far as we are advised, with respect to the rights of the Crown no duty arising out of any obligation that appertains to it is in the smallest degree compromised, qualified, or surrendered by this Treaty. The question we have to consider is entirely a commercial question. It is the question whether we ought to enter into an engagement, even for the period of ten years, which absolutely binds us during that period—or longer should a continuance of the Treaty be resolved on—to lay no duty on the exportation of coal to France. It is clear, however, that we could not enter into any treaty of commerce with France without having assurance of her and she of us that we would not be subjected to exceptional legislation. I think, therefore, no one will take the slightest objection to the 19th Article, by which France is secured against any exceptional legislation on our part. The question, then, is whether we have done wisely or unwisely in undertaking that for a period of ten years at least we shall impose no export duty on the article of coal; and whether or not this is a fit subject for such an Amendment as my right hon. Friend has proposed, I trust the House will not entertain that Amendment on any other except upon the very strongest grounds. The House is going to the foot of the Throne to express its loyal sense of duty at this commencement of an arrangement which it declares will, in its judgment, be beneficial to the interests of commerce and of peace; and in such circumstances I am sure no person would wish to obtrude such an Amendment as is now proposed, except from a very strong sense of duty. And what is that sense of duty in this case? But I ought not, perhaps, to inquire into this sense of duty—it may be better to leave that point inscrutable—but what I will ask is, what is the object or policy my right hon. Friend hopes to defeat by pressing upon the House the adoption of this Amendment? I hope the notion has been disposed of that the object of France in regard to the article of coal is a military one. I am sure that in the mind of any impartial person it is impossible that such a notion could remain for a single moment. In the first place, France has contrived at this moment to acquire a fleet, by means of which fleet she has considerably shaken the nerves of a portion of the population of England without the favour of any stipulation on our part not to prohibit or to impose any duty upon the export of coal. The whole extent of the naval consumption of France is 160,000 tons, representing a value of £200,000; and I believe that quantity includes the coals consumed in the arsenals of France. The whole affair is utterly insignificant. Why, my hon. Friend (Mr. Vivian) has told us in his admirable speech to-night that he raises that quantity himself from a single mine; it is the quantity consumed by a single iron-work; it is the quantity which one mine in the north of England absolutely burns as waste at the pit's mouth every year. Not less than 180,000 tons of small coal, which one single company burns at the pit's mouth for the purpose of getting rid of it, because it finds no market in England, may, under this Treaty, find a market in France, where good coal is scarce. There is no military object involved in this matter; it is a question of cost, and I may state that the estimated difference of cost, looked at from a French point of view, will be 10s. a ton. The French expect to gain 10s. a ton; and from that very estimate it will become evident to the House that a great deal of coal that is unsaleable in this country is certain to find a market in France, where the price is so much higher. Let me state in a few words what is the rational construction of this Article, and what the motives of France are with regard to it. It may be true that the French Government might have been induced to surrender or qualify this Article; but I do not know an Article in the Treaty which I, for one, would see modified with greater regret. It may be true that rather than expose the two countries to the loss of all the great boons which the Treaty promises the French Government might have been induced to qualify this Article. But I, for one, should have been ashamed to make such a request; for of all the Articles in the Treaty there is not one more beneficial, as I believe, in a commercial point of view; there is not one that will more powerfully tend to bind together the commercial arrangements and through them the friendly feelings of the two countries. To prohibit the export of coal is impossible, except in the case of the limited prohibition that might arise on the outbreak of a war, which is entirely outside the view of this Article. To stop the export of coal, except in this limited instance, would be as impossible as it would be to prevent the import of cotton or the extraction of iron from the bowels of the earth. You export 7,000,000 tons of coals at present, which represent a value of between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000, and by far the larger portion of that sum is paid for the wages of labour; so that it would be impossible for us to interfere with such a trade. But what is the state of the case with France? France has abundance of coal for those purposes that may be termed political; for the domestic use of the rich and for all the purposes of the State her coal is abundant; but for the purposes of commerce her coal is scanty, and the physical conformation of France, and the wants of her manufacturers have gone far to determine the manufacturing enterprise of the country. Easy access to the raw material and abundant supplies of fuel lead to the creation of manufactures. Put these two conditions together and you have the combination that makes South Lancashire a busy manufacturing county, with the great town of Liverpool behind it. The part of France in which there is the best access to the raw material, and therefore so far is the most desirable for her manufactures, is the sea-board of the Atlantic; but then it is farthest from her supplies of fuel, that lie on the south and the east. But give France this Treaty, and an assurance that for commercial purposes she can depend on a supply of coal from this country, and then the cheapest part for obtaining coal in France will be that part that gives easiest access to the raw material of manufactures. The places where cotton and other articles that come across the sea are to be found will also be the places where the coal will be lowest in price. I have been informed—and it is a credible statement—that there are already migrations of manufactures contemplated in France from the centre and eastern parts of the country to localities on the Atlantic seaboard, where cheap coal is expected to be obtained. That is the same process which has taken place in this country, where the iron trade of Sussex has gone to the neighbourhood of the coal-pits, and where the cloth manufactures of Wiltshire and Dorsetshire have moved into Yorkshire. You can conceive no process more beneficial for the commercial interests of France, or one better calculated to promote the advantage of the great mass of labour in both countries and to secure the peace of the world, than that a manufacturing industry should rise up in France dependent for its prosperity on the supply of English coal. The House will understand, then, why I declare that we could not take advantage of the inclination which the French Government at one time exhibited, that rather than allow the Treaty to be lost they would consent to an alteration of this Article. But there seems to be an honest fear in many minds that, after all, we ought not to part with our coal, as it is so valuable—that we have got so little of it that we cannot let any of it go abroad. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) most ingeniously laboured to cut down that estimate of coal, though he seemed rather afraid to state the result of his figures, and said that reliance could not be placed upon them. He rather evaded the point, and could not see the termination of our coal in less than some centuries. I am only sorry that my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Vivian), who so clearly disclosed the facts of the case, was not heard by a larger number of hon. Members. It is the fact that there is in the minds of the class of persons most closely connected with coal-mining in England not the slightest apprehension of an exhaustion of the stock. I have before me a letter from one of the best, most instructed, and most experienced coal-viewers in the north of England, in which I am informed that we have coal in this country to last for upwards of 2,000 years. I allude to Mr. Nicholas Wood. But, as my hon. Friend (Mr. Vivian) observed, that does not represent half the case; for you do not reckon the unworked seams; you do not reckon the deeper seams which are accessible; you do not take into view the hundreds of cases of new beds of coal which are discovered from month to month in England. This cannot, then, be meant for a serious objection. But, after all, is my right hon. Friend sincere in this Amendment? It does all very well as a subject for a speech in this House; but are we really afraid? Does my right hon. Friend economize the use of coal in his own house? No. ["Oh!"] An hon. Member says "Oh!" I agree with his sneer. The consumption of coal is 70,000,000 tons annually; the quantity sent to France is 1,000,000; if you are really alarmed about the exhaustion of the existing stock, if you really think there is any necessity for economizing, let us economize on the 69,000,000 not on the 1,000,000. Why we suffer ourselves to be stifled with smoke and endure every kind of nuisance rather than compel the economy of coal by enforcing the consumption of smoke. It would be absurd, it is said, when we consume 70,000,000 tons of coal at home, that we should export to another country 1,500,000 tons, which may increase to 3,000,000; we cannot afford it; and, therefore, we must retain power to restrain the export. Sir, these are not the grounds on which this House will carry an Amendment to the foot of the Throne. But I have done with this consideration. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), says he thinks a war with France and Europe would be better than that this Treaty should receive a final sanction. The hon. Gentleman was surprised when an involuntary emotion impelled some Members of the House to give utterance to their astonishment. It was a breach of rule, but it was called forth by an extraordinary occasion. It is not often we have the benefit of hearing a Gentleman stand up and with engaging frankness that carries with it the assurance of perfect sincerity, state calmly and coolly in this House that he would rather have a war with France and Europe than see this Treaty ratified, and he added in the same breath, that no man is more alive than he to the blessings of peace, but that great as are the blessings of peace, and awful as is the curse of war, this Treaty is a greater curse, and must be avoided, if possible. Sir, I must confess I do not feel at all disappointed at the course of the discussion with respect to this Treaty. I hope the hon. Gentleman will not think it disrespectful to him if I use free language, and if I confess I think that that one sentiment, and one or two others which he has used in these debates, are not worthy of the high standard of legislative wisdom which I am sure he would seek and desire to attain.

Sir, much has been said in the course of these debates that will not bear sober examination. Let us go back to the debates of 1787, and there we shall find that all the same foolish things and a great many others were said, and said, too, by very wise and distinguished men; but time and experience have cast a light over the events of those days which enable us to say that those predictions of evil have not been fulfilled. The mass of the country, at any rate so far as it can be tested by the ordinary records of the expression of opinion, has not shared in these apprehensions. I do not wish to overstate the case; but when the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire travels back to a debate which took place three weeks ago, and rather glorifies himself on the advice he then gave to the House, but which the House refused to follow, he ought to recollect that that refusal was uttered not only by the members of the Government, not only by the majority which a party can supply; but that into that majority there entered many of the most able and respected Members from the opposite side of the House, who usually vote with the right hon. Gentleman himself. He appeals to the future—to the future we also appeal. We do not, and we must not, presume to say that this treaty will control the course of political events. The experience of Mr. Pitt would warn us against any such presumption. But although the instrument which he concluded was not destined to last, it did not on that account redound with the less honour to his name, or less benefit for its time to the country; we do not the less believe that even for the time it existed it may have done much to allay the feelings of anger and excitement which in both countries followed the close of the American war, and to produce greater feelings of self-command among the English people in the earlier stages and the crisis of the French Revolution. It is not for us to describe, in exaggerated phrases, the influences which, by this Treaty, we hope to put in motion; but if, by the blessing of the Almighty, the spirit of justice, prudence, and moderation shall prevail in the councils of Europe, then, looking to the state of Europe—to the power of every country to attain strength and eminence through the development of its internal resources, and to the absence of all legitimate causes of strife and collision, we ought to hope that that state of circumstances may remain and endure under which this Treaty may produce beneficial effects beyond any power of estimating; and I must say that, in that case, I cannot but cherish the cheerful and sanguine expectation that it will, of itself, do something to make the year 1860 one memorable—memorable, because fruitful of blessings—in the annals of Europe and of mankind.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the 5th Article of the Treaty, which touched the larger number of commodities, applied to the commodities of other countries as well as those of France, or whether we were under bond to France. If they did not desire to see a system of joint government with France prevail in England, let the Government answer that the admission of these articles from all the world was not provided for by the Treaty.

MR. HORSMAN said, he was desirous of saying a few words in explanation. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had understood him on his own authority to state that there was a great difference of opinion between the French Emperor and the French nation. Those who heard him speak would remember that he quoted the language of the Emperor himself and of the French journals; beyond which he stated distinctly that he did not draw that distinction upon his own authority. He found that there was a feeling in the House that if his Amendment should be carried it would affect the whole Treaty; under these circumstances, in compliance with a wish that had been expressed by hon. Gentlemen who were in favour of the Amendment, he should not press it to a division.

[The House, however, calling loudly for a division—]

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to know, in reference to the article of corks, whether the fifth Article of the Treaty was general in its application, or whether it was limited to the produce of France or goods imported from France?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the legislation of the House applied in the same manner to corks as to all other articles. The only difference was that they separated into two parts the provision with regard to corks—first, that necessarily coming under the Treaty; and secondly, that relating to corks universally.

MR. NEWDEGATE wanted to know whether Article 5 applied to goods which were imported from France, or to goods from all countries.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that was a question with regard to the construction of an article of the Treaty upon which the hon. Gentleman had before refused to accept his opinion, and had expressed a strong opinion of his own. He was not of the same opinion as the hon. Gentleman; but if any point in the Treaty required to be elucidated, he would refer it to the law officers of the Crown.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to assure Her Majesty that, having considered the Treaty of Commerce concluded between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, this House begs leave to approach Her Majesty with their sincere and grateful acknowledgments for this new proof of Her Majesty's desire to promote the welfare and happiness of Her subjects:

“To assure Her Majesty that we shall proceed to take such steps as may be necessary for giving effect to a system which we trust will promote a beneficial intercourse between Great Britain and France, tend to the extension of Trade and Manufacture, and give additional security for the continuance of the blessings of Peace.”

Committee appointed,

“To draw up an Address to be presented to Her Majesty upon the said resolution:”—Mr. BYNG, Mr. BAINES, Viscount PALMERSTON, Lord JOHN RUSSELL, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Sir GEORGE LEWIS, Mr. Secretary SIDNEY HERBERT, Sir CHARLES WOOD, Sir GEORGE GREY, Mr. MILNER GIBSON, Mr. CARDWELL, Mr. VILLIERS, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for Ireland, the LORD ADVOCATE, or any five of them:—To withdraw immediately.

THE AFFAIRS OF ITALY—EXPLANATION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he rose to offer an explanation respecting a statement which he had made some evenings since. On that occasion a noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde) asked him whether he had received a certain letter. His reply was that he had not. But a few minutes afterwards a packet of letters, which had been offered to him when entering the House, but which he had then desired the messenger to keep for him, was put into his hands.

That packet contained the letter which had been referred to by the noble Marquess; but he was unable to communicate the fact to him, as the noble Marquess, immediately after he had made his own statement, left the House. For obvious reasons he could not more particularly refer to the purport of that communication. It came with no foreign post-mark, and the words "The House of Lords" were in a different hand-writing from the rest of the superscription. He presumed the noble Marquess must have been aware of the fact, having been himself the channel of communication. He had read and answered the letter, and he thought their Lordships would agree with him that he ought to leave the matter there, as it was one which had only come before the House by what had passed between himself and the noble Marquess. That noble Marquess had accused him of making a dangerous attack on the character and disposition of the Provisional Government of Florence, dangerous to the parties opposed to them; but the noble Marquess left the House without waiting to hear what he or any other Member of their Lordships' House might have to say in reply. The noble Marquess, assuming a prophetic tone, had warned him to be careful in the course which he was pursuing, or he might endanger the safety of those whose cause he was defending. Now, he did not believe that the party to which allusion was made was in such peril as the noble Marquess represented; though he knew that statements had been made to the effect that respectable persons in Florence and elsewhere had been warned by the Government to leave the country, as they were in danger from popular fury. But this alarm, created in common by the noble Marquess and the Provisional Governments of those countries, he believed, would prove utterly unfounded. The noble Marquess would excuse him for saying that his experience of Italy, with which he had favoured the House, was not very extensive. The noble Marquess had no need to flatter himself that the attentions paid to him in Italy personal merits—it

ment must have given a report which was the English people. In the course of the same debate the noble Lord, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, had expressed a doubt whether a letter, to which he himself had referred, really proceeded from a merchant of Leghorn, and he was now prepared with a document which he would hand to the noble Lord, the perusal of which he was sure must convince him that the gentleman in question was a merchant in Leghorn of the highest respectability.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE denied altogether that an imaginary connection with the noble Viscount at the head of the Government had in any way invested him in Italy with the character of one who might be presumed to speak for the English people or English Government. The only person who had expressed to him such an opinion in Italy was a nobleman, a friend of the old régime, one of the party to which the noble Marquess himself belonged; but when that Gentleman suggested to him that he was in Italy on a confidential mission from the English Government, he at once denied it in the strongest manner. In his tour through Italy he represented no one's opinions but his own, still less those of Her Majesty's Government. He would repeat what he said the other evening, that this reactionary party, though no doubt amiable and respectable, was of the very smallest dimensions both in numbers and influence, so small, indeed, that the popular feeling opposed to the restoration of the Grand Ducal Government might be said to be unanimous. It was utterly impossible for any man now to think of restoring the deposed Sovereigns of Italy, and, in fact, nobody, except, perhaps, the noble Marquess, did think of it—not even at Vienna. As to the Milan banquet, so far from his having said that he came there to express the feelings and sentiments of the British people, it was almost entirely by accident that he attended it. By his own arrangements he was in Milan the day before it took place, and he delayed one day in order to witness it—and very glad he was that he had done so, for he had never seen a more remarkable sight. On asking how it would be possible for him to witness it he at once received an invitation. At first he declined, because he did not wish to take part in it, and asked to be placed somewhere where he could see the sight without attending as one of the company; but that being impossible, he came to the conclusion, seeing that he heartily sympathized with the feelings of the people, that there was no reason why he should stay away; but it was on the specific understanding that he was utterly unconnected with the demonstration. His health was drunk, and in reply he stated his own individual sympathy with the feelings of the people. But so far from assuming to speak for the people of England, or the English Government, he distinctly stated that there were many considerations connected with the origin of the war which had rendered it peculiarly difficult for England to interfere in any way. Another matter was of much more serious importance. The noble Marquess had in his pamphlet accused General Decavero of levying a most grievous impost upon the country, of embezzling the proceeds, and of having been removed from his command on account of former delinquencies. Such a statement ought only to be made upon the clearest proof; but in this instance a most distinct and indignant contradiction was given, and the gallant General appealed to the head of the State to institute a searching inquiry into his conduct, because, he said truly, if such were his character, he ought to be instantly removed from the command which he now held. He understood that a letter of a similar import from the General appeared in one of the English newspapers that morning. It appeared that he had not been dismissed, but still held an important command. The noble Marquess had complained of the oppressive imprisonment which had taken place under the Provisional Government. The only object in making such exaggerated statements was to harass the existing Government in Italy. He supposed the noble Marquess included in his cases that of two foolish English ladies, who very possibly roused by the speeches and pamphlet of the noble Marquess, had made a demonstration. They endeavoured to post up proclamations against the Government in favour of the Grand Duke; but, fortunately for them, instead of being left to the tender mercies of the indignant populace, they were removed by the authorities and soon afterwards set at liberty with a caution to be wiser in future; and that was all the harm that had come to them. As to the imprisonment of individuals alluded to by the noble Marquess, it was the first duty of every state to secure itself against conspiracies and attacks; and the present Provisional Government had not existed long enough itself to have inflicted what was deemed by the former Governments a long political imprisonment in Italy. What were they compared to the long imprisonments that had been inflicted in Naples and Austria, and to the executions at Florence, after nominally the punishment of death had been abolished? The noble Marquess had failed to make out any case against the Provisional Government. He did not know whether the noble Marquess withdrew the charges which he had made against General Decavero, but he ought never to have exposed himself to such a contradiction as was published in to-day's paper, and it certainly did not tend to raise the character of their discussions when it was supposed, though erroneously, that such unfounded statements were made in their Lordships' House.

LORD WODEHOUSE appealed to their Lordships whether the course he had taken the other night was an unusual one. All he did was to read a letter to the House—not an anonymous one—signed by six British merchants in Tuscany, in order to show how the statements of the noble Marquess were received in Italy. The noble Marquess gave him the name of a merchant at Leghorn who communicated with him. The noble Marquess said he was a respectable man, and as the noble Marquess said so, he (Lord Wodehouse) was quite ready to believe that such was the case; but his name was not made public, while those of the six British merchants were published to the world.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY was about to reply, when

EARL GRANVILLE rose to call the House to order. Their Lordships did not object to short questions or short personal explanations before passing to the Orders of the Day; but the noble Marquess had already made a long statement, and gone through the debate of Friday last. The discussion had now lasted half-an-hour, and he, therefore, asked their Lordships to proceed to the business of the day.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he had no desire to detain their Lordships by making a second speech. He merely rose for the purpose of remarking that it was impossible for him then to reply to all the statements which the noble Marquess had, he thought somewhat unfairly, brought before the House. He wished, however, to know whether the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs admitted that the letter he had received came from a respectable gentleman.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he was quite prepared to accept the noble Marquess's assurance that the merchant in question was a respectable man, but personally he knew nothing about him.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY thought that the noble Lord was not quite candid, and that after the description he had given he (Lord Wodehouse) should have made a more complete recantation of the opinions he had derived from others.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.—THE ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.—A CONFERENCE.

"Conference had at the Desire of the Commons upon the subject Matter of an Address to be presented to Her Majesty respecting the Treaty of Commerce with France; and Report made, That the Commons had agreed to the following Address to be presented to Her Majesty, to which they desire the Concurrence of their Lordships:

"Most Gracious Sovereign,
We Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, having considered the Treaty of Commerce concluded between Your Majesty and the Emperor of the French, beg leave to approach Your Majesty with our sincere and grateful Acknowledgments for this new Proof of Your Majesty's Desire to promote the Welfare and Happiness of Your Subjects:

"We shall proceed to take such Steps as may be necessary for giving Effect to a system which, we trust, will promote a beneficial Intercourse between Great Britain and France, tend to the Extension of Trade and Manufacture, and give additional Security for the continuance of the Blessings of Peace."

Lords summoned for Thursday next.

"The Lord TAUNTON to move to agree with the Commons in the Address to Her Majesty on the Subject of the Treaty of Commerce with France, and to fill up the Blank in that Address with ('Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and')."

TREATY WITH FRANCE.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH wished to direct the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the third Article of the Treaty, respecting which he wished for some explanation. That Article was as follows:—

"It is understood that the rates of duty mentioned in the preceding Articles are independent of the rates the differential duties in favour of French shipping, with which duties they shall not interfere."

The Marquess of Normanby

Now, literally translated, the French Article would run thus:—

"It is agreed that the duties fixed by the preceding articles are independent of the differential duties established in favour of French shipping."

The differences were that in the English translation the word "understood" was used instead of "agreed," the word "mentioned" instead of "fixed," the word "established" was altogether omitted, and the words at the end, "with which duties they shall not interfere," were added. He could not discover any clear meaning in either the French or English version, and he wished the Government to explain what the meaning of the Article really was. It was important that an Act of Parliament should be most precise in its language, and it was equally important that a Treaty should be expressed in precise terms. Their Lordships had twice had occasion lately with respect to treaties with the United States of America to lament the obscurity of the language used, and he was most anxious that the same thing should not occur with regard to this Treaty. After reading this Article both in French and English he could not understand whether, under the words as they stood in either Article, France retained the power of raising the differential duties, or whether they remained fixed as at present, and liable to be diminished if the Emperor should think fit. If the French Government had the power of raising these differential duties they had the power of making it impossible to export from this country in British bottoms any portion of the various articles which it was the object of the Treaty to enable us to export. If this were an Act of Parliament the words would be very different. Care would have been taken before the word "established" to use the word "now" established, and there would have been a proviso guarding against the possibility of these differential duties being increased. If, on the other hand, it were intended that the French were to have the power of raising these differential duties the words used would have been "which now are or may hereafter be established," so as to give the power of raising the duties. He wished to ask whether the French Government had or had not under this Article the power of raising these differential duties.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he agreed that the language used in the French and English versions respectively was not very clear. Not being content with his own interpretation of the Article, he had consulted the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to ascertain whether his opinion coincided with his own; and he thought he was now in a position to state the views of the Government as to the interpretation of the 3rd Article. At the same time, he would admit that neither in the English nor French version were the words very clear and distinct, but of the two he thought the French the more clear, in the sense in which the Government understood this Article. The understanding of Her Majesty's Government was that the French Government would not retain any power of raising these differential duties as against Great Britain. He would not enter into any further discussion, as, no doubt, these and other points would be raised more fully on Thursday, when they would be more conveniently discussed.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH considered this matter as of too much importance to be left to the opinion and understanding of Her Majesty's Government, and he earnestly hoped that before their Lordships took this Treaty into consideration on Thursday the Government would communicate with that of France, and then they would be able to lay upon the table, he would not say an additional Article explanatory of the Treaty, but a written declaration on the part of the French Government that under that Article they did not consider themselves to possess the power of raising the differential duties now existing.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL doubted whether the noble Earl had not misapprehended the facts. There were no differential duties against British shipping engaged in the direct trade between France and England; but there were differential duties on the shipping of other countries, and Dutch or Swedish ships carrying English goods to France were subject to differential duties. This clause was, so far as it went, protective of the interests of British shipping.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH desired also to ask the Government whether it was their intention to lay upon the table of their Lordships' House, before Thursday next, a copy of the French tariff at present in force; because it was desirable to know what was the French point of departure as well as our own.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he had made application to the Board of Trade, and was informed that they possessed a copy of the French tariff as it stood on the 1st of January, 1859. The French tariff, as the noble Earl was aware, was one of the longest, most cumbersome, and most intricate of all the Continental tariffs. There was not the smallest objection to lay the document upon the table, but it would be impossible to have it printed so as to be ready for their Lordships by Thursday, or, indeed, for some days later; but he held in his hand an abstract of the French tariff, which had been published, which included all the most essential points of the document, which he would place in the hands of the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he was quite satisfied with the statement of the noble Duke.

EARL STANHOPE confirmed, from his own experience, the statement of the noble Duke as to the unwieldy nature of the document comprising the French tariff, and thought his noble Friend would get all the information he desired from the abstract.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 12, 1860.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Surrey, (Western Division), George Cubitt, esquire.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Mutiny; Inclosure.

2° Paper Duty Repeal; Consolidated Fund (£4,500,000); County Prisons (Ireland).

NORWICH ELECTION.

REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

“That the Right honourable William Countts Keppel, commonly called Viscount Bury, is not duly elected a Citizen to serve in this present Parliament for the City and County of the City of Norwich.

“That the last Election for the said City and County of the City of Norwich is a void Election.

“And the said Determinations were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.”

EVICCTIONS IN MAYO.

QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he rose, pursuant to notice, to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true that a troop of the 15th Hussars have been sent to Castlebar, County Mayo, for the purpose of aiding in the eviction of more than sixty tenants, representing 250 souls, from the property of Lord Plunket, Bishop of Tuam, at Partry, in that county; and whether it has come to his knowledge that the said evictions have been the result of the refusal of the tenants, who are exclusively Catholic, to permit their children to attend schools established by Lord Plunket, and which schools were publicly stated to be anti-Catholic in their teaching?

MR. CARDWELL said, he was sorry to say, that from the excited state of Castlebar and its neighbourhood it had been deemed necessary to send a small military force. That was the only portion of the question to which he was able to give an official answer. As to the motives inquired about as having induced a resort to the evictions he possessed no official information.

BRIBERY.—CONVEYANCE OF VOTERS, &c. QUESTION.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to endeavour to carry through a measure embracing the subjects of Bribery at Elections, Conveyance of Voters, Election Auditors (and other matters lately referred to a Select Committee), simultaneously with the final passing of the Reform Bill?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he should not be in a position to state what course the Government meant to take in reference to the subject until the Committee which had been appointed to inquire into it had made its Report.

THE KINGDOM OF NAPLES. QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose any Duty on the export of Rags from France when the existing prohibition shall be removed, and if so, the amount of such Duty; and whether any steps have been taken, or will be taken, by Her Majesty's Government for obtaining a free export of Rags from those countries in which the export is now either prohibited or restricted by heavy duties—namely, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Spain, and Portugal.

been a good deal of correspondence as to the reforms which should be made, particularly as to the reform to be made in the administration of justice in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. He had directed that the Papers should be prepared, and he hoped that in a few days they would be ready to be laid upon the Table of the House.

TELEGRAPHIC ARRANGEMENTS.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether an application has been made by the Submarine Telegraph Company for an extension of their Charter; and whether any steps will be taken thereupon before the Select Committee on Packet and Telegraphic Contracts have reported upon the subject of Telegraphic arrangements? He would also ask whether, if any Correspondence has taken place on the subject, there will be any objection to its production?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that an application had been made by the Submarine Telegraph Company for an extension of their Charter, but no steps would be taken in the matter till after the Report of the Committee on Contracts had been received. With respect to the production of the correspondence he was unable at present to give an answer.

EXPORT DUTY ON FOREIGN RAGS. QUESTION.

MR. FULLER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the intention of the French Government to impose any Duty on the export of Rags from France when the existing prohibition shall be removed, and if so, the amount of such Duty; and whether any steps have been taken, or will be taken, by Her Majesty's Government for obtaining a free export of Rags from those countries in which the export is now either prohibited or restricted by heavy duties—namely, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Spain, and Portugal.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he had to state that Her Majesty's Government had heard from our Ambassador at Paris that it was pretty certain that there would be a duty on the export of rags from France; but that he had not been able to ascertain what the amount would be. It was, however, hoped that the duty would not be large. With regard to the second question of the hon. Gentleman, Her Majesty's Government would take steps to obtain, if possible, a free export of rags from the other countries named in the inquiry.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION TO CHILDREN IN WORKHOUSES.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether any and what number of Unions have expressed objections to a certain Order of the Poor Law Board, dated the 23rd day of August, 1859, relating to the Religious Instruction of Orphan Children in Workhouses, and whether a large number of Unions have not positively refused to obey such Order; whether any steps have been taken to compel the Guardians so refusing to carry into effect the said Order; and whether the Poor Law Board have intimated, or caused it to be understood, that the said Order is not compulsory.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, the Order referred to was issued by his predecessors to 591 Unions. Out of that number thirty-eight Boards of Guardians had expressed some objection to the order, and nine had stated their intention not to give any effect to it. The Poor Law Board had not taken any steps to enforce it. Some doubt having been expressed as to its legal construction, the Board took the opinion of Counsel, and they had since caused it be made known that the order would not be compulsory.

LORD ELGIN'S MISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that although the discussion on China had been, most unfortunately, indefinitely postponed, he desired to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs one or two questions. Understanding that Lord Elgin, who has been appointed our Ambassador Extraordinary to China is about to embark for his destination in a very few days, he thought the House had a right to ask that the discussion which has been arrested by the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) should take place before Lord Elgin left the country. Moreover, he should like to ask the noble Lord whether Lord Elgin is proceeding to China merely to conduct the present negotiations, or whether it is intended that he shall supersede Mr. Bruce?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that on Friday his noble Friend (Lord John Russell) intended to make a statement with reference to our affairs in China, and that although Lord Elgin was going to Paris for a few days he would not leave for China before the discussion took place.

THE NEW SYSTEM OF PURCHASE IN THE ARMY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SMYTH said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War when he proposes to introduce or lay upon the Table his proposal for alteration in the present system of Army Purchase?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that he could not lay upon the Table a proposal for altering the Regulations of the Army. When the Regulations were amended they might be moved for, and presented to the House in their new form.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman intends to take so important a step as that of altering the system of purchase now existing in the Army without asking the opinion of that House upon it?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that the Army was governed not by the Votes of the House of Commons, but by the Queens' Regulations, and he should not be doing his duty if he produced any Regulation for discussion in that House before it had been decided upon by the Queen in Council.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask in what order the Customs Resolutions will be taken?

MR. KER SEYMER said, he wanted to know when the Wine Licences will be brought on?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he should not proceed, in Committee of Customs, with the Resolutions touching the Drawback on Wine or the imposition of minor taxes until Thursday or Friday at the soonest. He could not at present fix a day for the discussion of the Wine Licences with a view to a decision, because he thought, if it were necessary to take a preliminary Resolution, it would better to take it in a very general form, and to allow the discussion to come on upon the Bill founded upon it, which would include the Police Regulations and other matters, which, though necessary to the understanding of the subject, could hardly be expressed in a Resolution. That Bill was already prepared, and he hoped to lay it upon the Table to-morrow.

MILITARY ORGANIZATION. QUESTION.

COLONEL HERBERT said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War when he intends to move the reappointment of the Committee on Military Organization?

MR. S. HERBERT said, he had not yet communicated with the Members of the Committee, but he would give notice when he intended to move its reappointment.

THE FRENCH TREATY.—THE ADDRESS.

MR. BYNG brought up the Address to Her Majesty upon the subject of the Treaty of Commerce with France.

On Question that the Address should be agreed to,

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he desired that it should be understood that the Division on Friday night took place not upon the Motion for the Address, but upon the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman). Had the question been whether or no the Address should be adopted, he should have voted for the Address.

Address agreed to.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE TO FRANCE.—QUESTION.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the House would remember that the noble Lord opposite, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, had on a former occasion stated that notwithstanding the somewhat ambiguous language contained in the speech of the Emperor of the French, it was still the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that it was his intention to consult the great Powers of Europe previously to annexing Savoy to France. In consequence of certain statements which had since appeared in the semi-official French press he was anxious to repeat the Question he had formerly asked of the noble Lord, Whether, since the expression of opinion to which he had referred, he had received any further information from Paris as to the intention of his Imperial Majesty to consult the great Powers of Europe upon the subject?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

English Ambassador in French Government in in what form the great consulted. He had as Thouvenel had prepared subject, which he would to send by the next Wednesday, to the A different Powers of Europe the effect of that communication only say that he hoped great Powers of Europe weight with the Government.

MR. DISRAELI said apprehension as to the for Monday next—for understood the Motion of the Bridgewater (Mr. King) voy as well as the so Reform Bill was fixed venient if the Government what was to be the order that day.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL engagement had been of the Government and I Member for Bridgewater relative to Savoy should 19th, and it was his intention to move the the Reform Bill on that day.

MR. KINGLAKE: whether the Government fix the discussion on annexation of Savoy Friday night. I may be permitted House of the circumstances I ask this question. I on the Commercial Treaty and when several questions time to time put to the respect to Savoy, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to say that the Committee thus created were extra and appealed to the whether it would not set apart some particular and open discussion of ring by way of illustration which occurred in Well, in deference to was induced by several judgment I rely, to give on the subject, and I noble Lord whether performed our part understanding. It was logically to import a Savoy and Nice question into the discussion of the Commercial Treaty, but that was avoided. I did not address myself to the subject, and almost all who are interested in the question likewise abstained. I must, therefore, say I think we have nothing like a fair claim on the Government to assist us in fixing a day for this session. The noble Lord will also remark that I had my Motion on the paper, and the precedence of the Government, I must say I feel great regret that on Monday I was prevented from bringing the subject before the House, because the information I have received shows that time is in this matter absolutely vital. Only this morning I received intelligence that the Savoy deputies to the Sardinian Parliament had met at Chambery with the view of proceeding to Paris to do homage for Savoy to the Emperor of the French. I do not know whether intelligence of the same kind has reached the noble Lord, but there is no doubt that time is of the deepest importance in this matter, and I, for one, will not accept the responsibility of being the cause of any delay. That responsibility must rest strictly with Her Majesty's Government, unless as soon as possible we have this question discussed.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Gentleman not having concluded with a Motion, his proceeding was extremely irregular.

MR. KINGLAKE: I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

SIR ROBERT PEEL seconded the Motion.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: As the hon. Gentleman has made a statement, perhaps I may be permitted to make a statement likewise. My hon. Friend will recollect that what I asked on the occasion to which he has alluded was, not only that this discussion with respect to Savoy and Nice should not be mixed up with the discussion of the Commercial Treaty, but I told him that such discussions would be injurious to the public interest. I thought the hon. Gentleman had yielded to that suggestion. That was my opinion then and it is certainly my opinion at the present time. We have had a discussion on the question of Savoy and Nice, upon which the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir R. Peel) made a very eloquent speech, which produced a great impression in this House, and I think that the feeling of the House upon the subject could not be doubted. But it was to be considered whether there should be any definite Motion upon the subject. The discussion in the other House of Parliament, to which I alluded, was not a discussion that ended, or was intended to end, in any definite Resolution, or any proposal that the Government should take a different course from that which had been taken. As I then suggested when hon. Gentlemen spoke on the other side of the House, I ask again what is to be the meaning of a Motion in case it is made? If it is merely to express the opinion of the House, I am afraid that speeches will be made that will have the effect of producing irritation and exasperation. So far from being useful, I said that I thought such a Motion would have a very detrimental effect upon the public interests. There is a party in this House who, on the contrary, think that the question of the annexation of Savoy, however it may be brought about, even if it is with the consent of the King of Sardinia—if it has the consent either generally or partially of the people of Savoy, and if not actually opposed by the other Great Powers of Europe—still think it the duty of this country to resist it, and to go to war on the subject. Why, then, I say let them bring forward a Motion stating their grounds for that opinion. If my hon. Friend is of that opinion, it will not be difficult to obtain a day for that discussion. It is of great importance that it should not be long delayed; but to have discussions in which to express the opinion of the House with regard to Savoy which has been already sufficiently expressed would not be useful, and I think it is unnecessary in the present state of affairs.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I must say there is a great fallacy in the observations of the noble Lord, which, indeed, has pervaded all his remarks on this subject from the beginning. The noble Lord always assumes that the only conduct that ought to be questioned by the House of Commons is the conduct of the Emperor of the French. That, no doubt, is a matter of great importance; but I have yet to learn that it is not the right and the duty of the House of Commons upon questions of high policy to express its opinions. There is another portion of this subject, which opens a question of equal interest to the country—that is, the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. We want a discussion of this question of Savoy, that we may clearly understand that the course of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the whole of this matter, which now so much agitates Europe, is clear before the House and the country. The noble Lord, therefore, only begs the question when he assumes that it is merely the conduct of the Emperor of the French which we criticize and call in question. We want to know how far his policy has been favoured or occasioned by the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. That ought to be made clear to us, and with that view I agree that a discussion should take place in this House on the subject. It is quite natural that the hon. Member for Bridgwater, who takes so much interest in this question, should bring it forward. It may be he only wishes to bring it forward to express an opinion as to the policy pursued by the Emperor of the French; but I believe that there is another part of the question, in which the House of Commons and the country naturally take a very deep interest, as to the course taken by Her Majesty's Government, although I am not prepared to give a definite opinion of it in the present state of affairs. The conduct of the Government on the question of Savoy, however, does appear involved in great mystery, and requires much explanation. The noble Lord made no answer to the statement I made the other night—that the noble Lord, being perfectly aware, as the papers show, for many months of the policy of the Emperor of the French, has pursued that course in Italy which rendered that policy unavoidable. He has offered no explanation to us how, at the commencement of this year, he proposed four points for the settlement of Italy, and, as it appears, concealed from the four Powers that he was cognizant, if those terms were accepted, a Sardinian province would be annexed to France. The House of Commons, I must again say, has considerable desire to have that question discussed, even more than the conduct of the French Emperor.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am not disposed to dispute the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that there are two distinct propositions involved—two branches of the subject connected with Savoy—one in so far as the course of the transaction bears on the French Government and the Emperor of the French; the other branch is the degree in which it bears on the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. Now, my noble Friend stated—and I think has stated in a manner which no man in this House would be disposed to controvert—that this House having distinctly and clearly expressed its opinion on the policy and project of the annexation of Savoy to France, it was not desirable to repeat discussions on that subject from week to week, involving angry animadversions on the conduct of the French Emperor, and—I cannot forbear saying—personalities in regard to him not very useful or tending to the public interests, when stated in this House with regard to the Sovereign of a foreign country with whom we are on terms of friendly alliance. My noble Friend stated that, the question having been discussed, no good could arise from weekly repetitions of such discussions. I am decidedly of that opinion. But, on the other hand, a great deal of evil will arise—first, in regard to the issue of the matter in question; and, secondly, in regard to the relations in which the two Governments are to stand to each other. And, therefore, if the object of those who wish to renew the subject is simply again to express an opinion disapproving the project entertained by the French Government, I think my noble Friend has given ample reasons why it is not expedient that the House should take that course. If, on the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman opposite thinks that the other branch of the subject requires to be brought under the consideration of Parliament—if he, or any other hon. Member, is prepared to propose to the House a vote of censure upon Her Majesty's Government for the conduct they have pursued in regard to Savoy, that undoubtedly is a most legitimate Motion to propose to the House, and most proper for those who think that our conduct is deserving of censure. I can only assure the right hon. Gentleman, and any other hon. Members, who may concur in that opinion, that we shall be perfectly prepared to meet that discussion whenever it shall be brought forward. Therefore, I think it ought to be clearly explained whether those who wish to bring this subject of Savoy again before the House, do so with a view to renew expressions of censure on the Government of France, or to ask the House to concur in a vote of censure on Her Majesty's Government. I doubt whether my hon. Friend, the Member for Bridgwater, who has charged himself with this subject, has the latter object in view; but if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) entertains the opinion he has insinuated, that Her Majesty's Government have failed in their duty in regard to this matter, I say it is legitimate to make a Motion on that subject; but the Motion should be made precisely and clearly on the subject, expressing censure on the Government, and hon. Members should not content themselves with expressing their opinion that the Government was deserving of censure in a debate on a Motion which does not bear on the conduct of the Government, but on the conduct of an allied and friendly Government.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: My right hon. Friend has been very much misrepresented by the noble Lord. He has not indicated any intention of moving a vote of censure; he merely stated that certain questions which he had asked of the Government on a former occasion not having been answered, he felt entitled to call on the Government for explanations as to the line of conduct which they had pursued on this subject. I think the noble Viscount cannot deny that the circumstances are such as fully justify hon. Members on this side of the House in requiring from the Government some explanation on certain points involved in their proceedings, especially on that point to which my right hon. Friend adverted—namely, that, although the noble Lord does not appear to have made any remonstrance or expressed the opinion of Her Majesty's Government upon this subject till the month of December, it is clear that Her Majesty's Government must for a considerable period previous to that have possessed a knowledge of the intentions of the French Emperor, with respect to Savoy. As far as I remember what has passed in this House on this question the conduct of the Government is hardly fair towards the hon. Member for Bridgwater. The noble Lord appealed to that hon. Gentleman the other night to postpone his Motion, because to proceed with it on the day fixed would be injurious to the public service. The hon. Member readily acceded to that proposal. At the same time the noble Lord the Secretary of State expressed an opinion that, looking to the great importance which attached to the intentions of the Emperor of the French with respect to the annexation of Savoy, it was most desirable that a discussion should take place, not only in this House, but in the other House of Parliament. I certainly am at a loss to know what there is in the events that have lately taken place to induce the noble Lord now to change his opinion on that point.

MR. HORSMAN: I must say that if I

correctly caught the remarks of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, I think they are calculated to alarm the House and the country at the present state of affairs. This is not simply a question between the noble Lord and the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater. No doubt the Government have a heavy responsibility pressing upon them. A heavy responsibility also presses on the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater, who has given notice to bring forward a subject which has excited great interest not only in this House and out of it, but also abroad. I for one am content to leave the question in my hon. and learned Friend's hands, not merely because he has first occupied the ground, but because he has shown much knowledge and much earnestness upon it; and I am satisfied that no other hon. Member, from his general character and ability, could do more justice to it. But there is a great responsibility resting upon this House itself. In the course of this Session we have allowed ourselves to be kept, in regard to our relations with foreign countries in every part of the globe, in a state of ignorance almost unexampled. On this very question of Savoy papers have been laid on the table most scanty and meagre in their character; and on one very important point on which we require information—namely, as to the communications between our Government and the Governments of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, we are not told a single word. Yet it is by their communications with these Powers that in the event our Government must be judged; and the question we have to consider is whether the Administration of this country has in this crisis been placed in the hands of statesmen who have shown themselves equal to their position. I repeat, the statement of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary gives me great alarm, because he says there is one party in this House who think that if Sardinia is willing to do so, and no difficulty is raised abroad, Savoy ought to be given up.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: No; I said that if there were a party who thought we ought to go to war even if Sardinia were prepared to give up Savoy, they should come forward with a Motion to that effect.

MR. HORSMAN: That I heard distinctly; but I also understood the noble Lord to say there was one party who thought if it was matter of arrangement abroad, and Sardinia was ready to give it up, Savoy might then be given up; but that there was another party who would have us go to war. I understood the noble Lord to classify us all with one or other of those two parties. In that case I would ask, to which of those parties do Her Majesty's Ministers belong? The noble Lord is averse to war and on that point I believe that every hon. Member in this House agrees with him. But the whole question is this:—What is the policy that leads to war? Is it a policy of firmness? Because I cannot but recollect an occasion when divided counsels, leading to compromises and tending to weakness, did drift us into a most disastrous war; and I know there are people who think that a policy of more explicitness and firmness might have obviated that war. I am afraid there may be something of the same kind going on at the present moment. I am not sure that the counsels of the Cabinet are all at one; and I must say the tone of both the noble Lords to-night fills me with a good deal of apprehension. The hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater, on the other hand, has up to this point kept himself entirely right. He has evinced on this question great earnestness, but also great moderation, and has completely vindicated himself from any charge of undue precipitation. But he has a responsible duty to discharge. It is for him to consider, after the answer he has received to-night, what course he shall pursue. The matter is one on which he must be a good deal guided by the judgment of the House, but he must not be deterred by the fear of being left in a minority. This is a question on which he may feel that the opinions of the nation would not be represented in this House, and it is to the opinions of the nation he must look in the course that he may take. He has told us more than once that time is pressing—that events are marching to their accomplishment. The information received to-day confirms that impression; and I hope, therefore, that he will choose his opportunity and invite the judgment of this House—whose opinion, more than that of any other body in this country, or abroad, is urgently demanded—to determine whether or not, by a firm and vigorous display of what are the real sentiments of England, we may not do more to preserve the peace of Europe and our own honour than by a policy of timidity or vacillation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not think my right hon.

Mr. Horsman

Friend (Mr. Horsman) has a right to say that Her Majesty's Government have been chary in the information they have afforded to the House in regard to their foreign policy. I confess that on almost all subjects of foreign policy it appears to me the House has already been put in possession of information as rapidly following its receipt by the Government themselves as the time requisite for the production of the papers would permit. With respect to the apprehension expressed by my right hon. Friend lest there should be divided counsels in the Government, I, of course, entirely ascribe his fears on that head to the friendly interest he takes in our perfect harmony. The best opportunity, however, for trying that question will be when we come to the full discussion of the conduct of the Government, when it will sufficiently appear whether we have been united in our views or not. It is very desirable that we should clearly understand the position of the Government with regard to the intended Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater. My noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) has given his opinion, not of the inexpediency of all discussions relating to Savoy, but only of the inexpediency of discussions that are indecisive in their character, and which, referring to the conduct of the French Government, tend rather to irritation than to any practical or substantive result. The motive of my noble Friend at the head of the Government in dividing the question into two parts was, I think, to draw that distinction, and to lay down, on the one hand, that we could not be parties—especially by giving a Government day for the purpose, particularly while we have other very pressing subjects calling for our attention—to prolonging and renewing that class of discussions relating to Savoy to which I have adverted. But, on the other hand, he stated that if there be any disposition to censure Her Majesty's Government, there can be no doubt it is quite competent and quite just that any hon. Member of this House should take an opportunity of proposing a Motion to that effect. And the spirit of that observation was obviously this,—that if there be any disposition to discuss in any form, whether by asking for explanations or by proposing a censure, the proceedings of the Government, to no discussion of that nature, or aimed at that object, will Her Majesty's Government make any objection whatever. As my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is precluded by the forms of the House from again addressing it, he authorizes me to say that as he understands there is a desire, without moving a vote of censure, to call for more detailed explanations from the Government, he will take the earliest opportunity, in producing papers to-morrow relating to Italy, to make a statement with regard to the course that has been pursued.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: I must say that the observations made by the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) only tend to divert the attention of the House from the real and very serious subject before us, because the noble Lord addresses himself to this question as if there was a desire on the part of those who sit on this side of the House to cast a censure on the conduct of the Government. The real point of the case is this—that at the present moment we do not actually know what the conduct of the Government has been; and I beg to point out to the House that only four or five days have elapsed since the noble Lord the Secretary of State, far from holding his present opinion, expressed his belief that it was of the utmost importance there should be a discussion on this subject. And, not only so, but he spoke as if a discussion in this House was not sufficient, for he said he hoped the opinion of Parliament would be expressed on this question. Surely it is of the last importance that upon a subject like this there should be a full expression of the opinion of the House of Commons? What has been the language of the noble Lord himself with respect to this question of the annexation of Savoy? He has stated in his despatches that it will spread distrust and suspicion throughout Europe, and has reminded the French Government that it probably, or possibly, implies on the part of the Emperor of France the adoption of a policy which has already been most fatal to the fortunes of his family. If this is so, surely it is of the greatest importance that we should now be able to strengthen the hands of the Government in what I believe to be the course which they are disposed to adopt—namely, that of expressing their strong and emphatic disapproval of the course which has been adopted by France. Then there is another matter. In “another place” it has been stated that communications of a certain kind have passed between the noble Lord and the Governments of Russia, Prussia, and Austria. Surely it is of great importance that we should know what those communications have been; and whatever may be the conduct of those Governments, of this I feel certain, that the position of the noble Lord with respect to them will be greatly strengthened if it is known that there has been a decided expression of opinion on the part of this House. It is not at present desired to pass any vote of censure upon the Government, but we desire to be so fully acquainted with all the circumstances and with the policy of the Government, that if need be we can give them the full support of a vote of this House.

Motion made, and Question, That this House do now adjourn, put, and negatived.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Message from the Lords, That they do agree to a Conference with this House, as requested by Message of this day upon the subject matter of the Address of this House to be presented to Her Majesty, relative to the Treaty of Commerce concluded between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French; and appoint the same to be held presently in the Painted Chamber.

Ordered,

“That a Committee be appointed to manage the Conference:—And a Committee was appointed, of Mr. BYNG, Mr. BAINES, Viscount PALMERSTON, Lord JOHN RUSSELL, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Sir GEORGE LEWIS, Mr. Secretary SIDNEY HERBERT, Sir CHARLES WOOD, Sir GEORGE GREY, Mr. MILNER GIBSON, Mr. CARDWELL, Mr. VILLIERS, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for Ireland, and the LORD ADVOCATE.

“Then the names of the Managers were called over, and they went to the Conference:—And having returned:

Mr. BYNG reported, That the Managers had been at the Conference, which was managed on the part of the Lords by the Lord Privy Seal; and that they had delivered to their Lordships the Address agreed upon by this House, to which they desired the concurrence of their Lordships; and that they had left the said Address with their Lordships.

PAPER DUTY REPEAL BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he rose to oppose the Motion, and never had he addressed the House more strongly impressed with the justice of his cause than at that moment. He might, in the first place, be permitted to remind the House of the difference between his Amendment, as it first appeared, and as it then stood. When he intended to oppose the Resolutions in Committee, he had given notice that he should move the rejection of the 16th Resolution; and also that, as regarded the 17th Resolution, the word "ninepence" should be inserted in lieu of "tenpence." He thus intended to discuss the two questions of the Repeal of the Paper Duties, and the imposition of the extra penny Income Tax together, and as a division of the Budget perfectly distinct. He had, however, been obliged to alter that intention, and to urge his opposition to the proposals of the Government by a specific Motion, with which he should conclude his observations. He had no objection to the repeal of the paper duties in the abstract. He was a Member of the last Parliament, and he considered himself a party to the Resolution then come to, that these duties were not to be considered as a permanent source of income. Had the tea and sugar duties been removed, and had there been a surplus in the Exchequer, he would have been among the first to consent to the repeal; but at a season when they were labouring under a deficit, it was not the time to repeal a tax which, according to the best information he could procure in the absence of a return for which he had moved, produced a revenue of no less than £1,200,000 yearly. He had listened with the greatest admiration to the speech of his right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the introduction of the Budget, and to his lucid arrangement of the subject with which he was dealing. His statement was divided into three parts. In the first of these his right hon. Friend gave the income and expenditure of the last year, and the estimated income and expenditure of the coming year; in the second he stated what were the intentions of the Government with respect to the remissions of Customs' duties, and more especially the remissions in connection with the French Treaty, while he showed at the same time how he intended to meet the anticipated losses of revenue from those changes; and, in the third part, the right hon. Gentleman confined himself to his proposal to repeal the paper duty, and to add another penny in the pound to the income tax. Under these circumstances it would be impossible for him (Sir W. Miles) to discuss the question of the repeal of the paper duty, without at the same time adverting to the incidence of the income tax. In fact, the repeal of the paper duty and the imposition of a tenpenny income tax went side by side. If the duty was abolished, the people must pay a tenpenny income tax. If it was retained they would pay only 9d. If things were allowed to remain as they were with respect to the paper duties, and if the income tax were continued at 9d., the right hon. Gentleman would not lose more than £30,000 of his estimated surplus. Deducting the war duties, the income for the year would be £58,592,000. But, adding to that the renewed duties on tea and sugar (£2,100,000), the malt and hop credits (£1,400,000), and the income tax at 10d. for three-quarters of a year (£8,472,000), the grand total for the year would be £70,564,000. The estimated expenditure being £70,100,000, that would leave a surplus of £464,000. If, however, they took the income tax at 9d., that would give only £7,237,350, under the head of income tax; but, on the other hand, they would have to add to the grand total £1,200,000 from the paper duty. In that way the surplus would be reduced, but reduced only from £464,000 to £429,350. At the same time he had been informed—not upon official authority, for none such had been furnished—but on the best authority to which he had access, that the revenue from the paper duty was increasing, and that an additional sum of £300,000 would in all probability have been realized from that source in the course of the coming year. He would proceed to lay before the House a brief account of the origin and the growth of that duty. It had first been imposed in the tenth year of the reign of Queen Anne, and it had subsequently gone through a number of emendations, which he need not then bring under the notice of the House. He would therefore pass on to the year 1835, when a Commission, of which Sir Henry Parnell was the head, was appointed to inquire into that and other excise duties. A discriminating duty was at that time imposed upon paper, consisting of 3d. per pound on the higher class, and 1½d. per pound on the lower descriptions of the article; and the Commissioners recommended that that practice should be discontinued, and that one uniform duty should be levied upon all kinds of paper. The consequence was, that in the following year—the year 1836—the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day brought in a Bill, by which it was provided that the charge should stand at the uniform rate of 1½d. per pound. That measure was carried, and it put an end to much fraud. The duty had, up to that period, amounted to about £700,000 a year, and it was some little time before the revenue recovered from that change. But it did so in the course of a few years, for in the year 1840 it amounted to £800,000; and since that time it had gone on steadily increasing, with one single exception, from year to year. In the year 1855 the yield to the revenue from that source amounted to £1,094,146; in the year 1856 it amounted to £1,014,945—that being the only year in which it had decreased; and that result having, as he had been informed, been attributable to a diminution in the supply of the raw material; in the year 1857 it again progressed to £1,190,822; in the year 1858 it amounted to £1,242,732; and in the year 1859 to £1,281,023. So much for the elasticity of the tax. And now let him say a few words with respect to its nature. It was peculiar in this respect, that it entailed no interference with the manufacturer of the article on which it was levied; for paper did not come under any charge until it was actually made, and notice given to the Excise of the fact; and did not, therefore, necessitate that obstructive vigilance on the part of the Excise officers which was required in the case of malt, spirits, and other productions. Now, he was far from saying that the paper duty should be permanent; but, in the present state of our finances, when we were literally living from hand to mouth, and forestalling all our revenue, it would be a most imprudent thing to immediately abolish so fruitful a tax. The question might be asked, "What is paper?" [Hear, hear! from the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.] He was perfectly astonished to hear that cheer from the Treasury bench after the decision which had been given by the Lord Chief Baron last year, because nothing could be more distinct than the definition given in that judgment. The question, if he recollected rightly, was, whether what was called false parchment was to be considered really paper or parchment. The fictitious parchment was made of animal fibre, and it was endeavoured to be passed off not as paper but as parchment. Consequently, there was a surcharge by the Excise. That was repealed from, and the whole matter came before the Court of Exchequer, when the Lord Chief Baron decided that anything made in sheets of fibrous material, whether animal or vegetable, and used for the purpose for which paper was generally used, came under the denomination of paper. If that were the case no difficulty could arise, although it was represented that a difficulty had arisen. He would next refer to the Reports of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, in reference to the operation of the Excise laws upon that branch of industry; and he believed the House would unite with him in expressing a hope that they might never again have laid before them documents of so strangely contradictory a character. Nay more, the last Report had been placed upon the table to back up the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman in debate, but he hoped that such a proceeding would not be made a precedent, and that upon a question actually before the House the Board of Inland Revenue would not again be called upon to give their opinion. The first Report of the Commissioners was dated in 1857, and in it they stated that their regulations had been modified to meet the wishes of the manufacturers, that the duty was charged and collected without any appreciable restriction upon the trade, and that the complaints, at one time so frequent, had entirely ceased. In the Report of 1858 the Commissioners stated that there was scarcely any duty in the collection of which their interference was so little felt. He now came to 1859. It would be in the recollection of the House that in 1858 a Resolution was passed respecting the paper duty, to which Resolution he had already alluded, and the House would remark how different was the tone of the Report of 1859 compared with that of the two preceding Reports. In their Report of the year 1859, the Commissioners declared that "the expectation that the paper duty would be repealed on the first favourable opportunity, had been for many years a source of embarrassment in the collection." A source of embarrassment in the collection! Why, they had themselves stated in the years 1857 and 1858 that it had been very easily collected; but the whole tone of their observations upon the subject had changed after the House of Commons had passed their Resolution with respect to it.

When the House went into Conference, he was calling their attention to the difference between the three Reports of the Commissioners. In 1857 the complaints of the paper-makers had entirely ceased, and in 1858 there was scarcely anything said about the interference, so little was it felt. Then came the last Report, to which he had referred as being an extraordinary Report. In that Report the Commissioners took care to remedy their former error, and drew a comparison to show the competition existing in the manufacture of cardboard, pasteboard, and scaleboard, the pasteboard makers being subject to Excise survey, while the cardboard and scaleboard makers were exempt. Looking to the Act, he thought pasteboard was subject to the duty, but from what had been stated in the House he supposed it was not. There could be no doubt, however, that from 1848 to 1850 there had been no increase in the rivalry, and he could not, therefore, understand why that was put forward as one of the difficulties of the case. He now came to the consideration of the articles used in the manufacture of paper. He quite agreed that everything which had a fibrous texture could be converted into paper. They might make it from papyrus to old junk, filling up the interstices with anything they liked; but the question with the paper manufacturers was, could it be made at a profit? This question had been so much argued that he considered it unnecessary to say more than that it had been proved that good printing paper could only be made out of cotton waste or old rags. Take The Times, than which nothing could be better. That was made out of the best rags. It was true that other substances might be used; straw might be and had been used; but let them compare one description of paper with the other. Let them take The Standard, the paper of which was made out of rags and straw combined, and compare it with The Times, which was made of the best material, and say which was easiest to be read by old eyes. Undoubtedly paper could be made out of other materials, but none of them could compete with the materials which were now used. There was a description of paper which was under inspection below stairs, made of a fibre—a kind of grass—obtained from Spain and the north coast of Africa. The objection to that, however, was, first of all, that it would not bleach, and next that it would not receive a gloss. For the higher kinds of printing and writing paper such a material was perfectly useless. The Indian material, jute, was very much used for making paper; but it was imported not so much for the purpose of making paper as rope, and a vast quantity of common rope was made out of jute. The residue went to make paper. A pamphlet had been written on this subject by the great publisher, Mr. Bohn. What did he say of jute paper? Why, that it was hard, brittle, easily imbibed wet, and, from its silicious properties injured the printers' types. It was plain, then, from the failure of the substitutes that they must come back to the substances which had always been used, so that nothing remained but woollen and cotton rags, linen rags, and the refuse of the cotton and linen manufactures. On this point he would refer to a letter written by a firm of half a century's standing, who were very large paper manufacturers. They wished their names withheld, but he would be happy to show the letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was to the following effect:—

“ On referring to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech on the night the Budget was brought out, it will appear that he has been led to believe that there are hundreds of fibres which can be imported and used for papermaking, and thereby increase the manufacture of paper to an unlimited extent, and that carriages and almost everything else can be made of paper after the repeal of the duty. Now, the best answer to this statement is the fact that, although a large reward was offered some four years back to any one who would produce an article that could be used as a substitute for rags, and although hundreds of different things have been introduced and trials made of them, there are not two of them at this moment in use, neither have they been used beyond the trials made, in consequence of their being quite unfit for the purpose. The expense from the enormous waste in preparing them for paper exceeds in cost the price of the highest rags; and, even if they were less wasteful and more productive, there is another fatal objection to their use—namely, that they will not bleach. The New Zealand flax referred to at the meeting yesterday, and all other articles of that sort, are of more value in this country for other purposes for which inferior hemp is used than for papermaking purposes. These are facts which we, as a firm, can vouch for, after the experience of half a century as paper manufacturers and importers of the raw material for the manufacture of paper. We could not have believed it possible that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could have been so deceived by the representation of a few interested parties, thereby deceiving the public at large, who are led to believe that there are no bounds to the supply of the raw material for papermaking; whereas the supply depends only on the increased population and the prosperity of other manufactures, the waste from the latter contributing largely to the manufacture of paper."

The House ought to understand that there were few things of which really good paper could be made, while the capital employed must be very large. He now came to the objections which had been made to the existence of the tax. The tax on paper was said to be detrimental to the diffusion of knowledge. He had endeavoured to make himself master of this part of the subject as much as possible, and his inquiries had satisfied him that little or no decrease would take place in the price of the cheaper productions of literature read by the multitude in consequence of the paper duty being removed. Take the hundreds of penny papers now existing: did any one suppose that they would get them for a halfpenny when the tax was removed? Did they suppose that The Standard, The Star, or The Telegraph would sell for less? They must then, limit their inquiries to what would be saved on books. No doubt it was possible that the paper manufacturer and the publisher might be benefited to the extent of the removal of the duty. Mr. Bohn, the publisher, had given an exact statement of the sum which would be saved by the repeal on several standard works, and he was one of the largest exporters of books in the kingdom. He took four books, the Annual Register, Lord Macaulay's History of England, Colenso's Arithmetic, and the Cornhill Magazine — all being books having an extensive circulation, and books which by no repeal of the duty can be affected for the better. Mr. Bohn showed how the price of these books was affected by the duty. The Annual Register cost 18s.; the amount of duty on it would be 3d.; on the two last volumes of Macaulay's History, of which the price was 36s., the duty was 6d.; on Colenso's Arithmetic, price 4s. 6d., the duty was one halfpenny; on the Cornhill Magazine, price 1s., also one halfpenny. He would ask if the consumers of knowledge would be greatly benefited by the total abolition of a tax that formed only so small a fraction of the price of a book? The vast consumers of paper might be benefited to the amount of the duty, but the purchasers of books, the consumers of literature, would have no advantage. It should be recollected, too, that many of the common schools throughout the country were supplied with books by the National School Society and the British and Foreign School Society at less than cost price; when the duty on a standard school-book was only a halfpenny, how could the middle-class schools derive any benefit from its repeal? It was said the duty was an impediment to the manufacture of paper; the fact was, both the quantity manufactured and the quantity exported had increased. The only large export of books was to Hamburg and America; all the rest of the trade was with our own colonies. Now, what had been the export of paper from this country? In 1857 the quantity of paper charged with duty was 191,721,620lbs., of which 16,031,063lbs. were exported to foreign countries. In 1858 the quantity that came to charge was 192,847,825lbs., of this 16,548,828lbs. were exported. In 1859 the quantity charged with duty was 217,827,197lbs., of which 20,067,749lbs. were exported. Thus, comparing the year 1859 with the year preceding, the quantity of paper manufactured had increased by 24,979,372lbs., and the quantity exported by 3,518,921lbs. The home consumption and the foreign export had both immensely increased; it could not therefore be said that the duty impeded either the manufacture or commerce, which was the great objection made to the tax. It had been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, wherever there were streams of clear and rippling water, cheap labour, and healthy air, there the manufacturer of paper would settle. He lived in a county answering to this pleasant description, but he had seen both paper and cloth mills in existence which were now in ruins. Except in a few places in Somersetshire, cloth mills no longer existed; the manufacture had gone to the north. The paper manufacture had also left those villages, because, being established by men with insufficient capital, they had become bankrupt, or been obliged to shut up their mills, as unprofitable. The larger manufacturers, with greater capital, had been able to purchase the highly wrought machinery now used, and these men monopolized the trade. It had been stated that of 525 paper mills existing twenty years ago, there were now only 393. But by an old return he found that in 1813, before the great increase in the manufacture had taken place, there were in England alone 700 mills, and seventy or eighty in Scotland. The comparison might as well have been taken back to the ancient time, when all the labour was manual. With respect to the cheap labour market, he did not think that the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring back the halcyon days of paper-makers would be much relished by the agricultural interest, because farmers at present had the greatest difficulty in getting sufficient labour for their farms. As for giving more employment to labourers, he had some difficulty now in getting labourers on his own estate, and were it not for the machinery now used half his harvest would be spoiled; so that he did not thank the right hon. Gentleman for this boon. Immediately after the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made his financial statement, The Times, which was naturally anxious for a repeal of the paper duty, as its proprietors paid £40,000 a year for that duty, but whose articles upon the subject had been exceedingly fair, that journal made some remarks, in the course of which it said—

“ Alas! no village mills will ever again arise. These were all destroyed, not by the paper duty, but by Fourdrinier's paper-making machine, which rendered paper-making, like cotton-spinning, an affair of capital and machinery and great establishments. When handloom weaving again becomes a flourishing trade, and the distaff and spindle are seen in every cottage, then we shall have again the village paper mill, and not before.”

He (Sir W. Miles) had that morning had a conversation with Mr. Potter and his managing partner, gentlemen well known in Lancashire, and by them he was informed that the expense of erecting a paper mill, with all the newest appliances in machinery, would be from £4,000 to £5,000 if water power were used, and from £10,000 to £11,000 if steam power were used. That was, he thought, a sufficient answer for those who were of opinion that small paper mills could exist in the present day. He was informed by the same gentlemen to whom he had just referred that their outlay for engineers and smiths for attending to the machinery alone reached £1,200 per annum. He had voted against the paper duty as a permanent source of revenue, but still he must consider the circumstances under which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to meet the deficit of £1,200,000 that would be caused by the abolition of the duty. He hoped he had misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, but he thought he had declared that the income tax must be regarded as a permanent tax. If that was the opinion of the Government, now was the time to proclaim it distinctly, instead of asking the House to vote the tax from year to year at fluctuating amounts.

Sir William Miles

In former times the income tax was not resorted to, except in great emergencies. Until 1842 it was always considered to be a war tax. In that year the emergency was great, and when Sir Robert Peel introduced his Bill for the imposition of the income tax he did so, not in order to enable him to carry out a revision of the Commercial Code, but to supply a deficit that had been growing up for several years, and which would have reached to upwards of £10,000,000 in 1843 if that tax had not been imposed. That was the prime reason for its imposition, the improvement of the Commercial Code was merely subsidiary to the other. It was granted for three years, afterwards renewed, and then in 1852 came the memorable Budget of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who after his prophecies of the extinction of the tax in the present year ought to be the last man to propose any augmentation of it. He would, however, call the attention of the House to the class of persons upon whom the tax pressed with especial severity—namely, those who paid upon incomes between £100 and £150. He found that the total amount assessed under Schedule D, in 1855, was £819,754; in 1856, £1,065,705; and in 1857, £1,097,205; but those who were assessed for incomes not exceeding £150 were in the three years he had mentioned respectively £108,769, £239,953, and £266,937, so that in the last year one-fourth of the whole amount of assessments was upon income not exceeding £150 per annum. In 1857 out of 275,469 persons assessed under Schedule D no less than 150,200 were assessed for less than £150 a year, while in 1858 the number was 155,166 out of 274,205. Under Schedule E the number assessed under £150 was 52,943 out of a total of 87,493, and in 1858 the figures were 57,665 out of a total of 91,780. Taking the classes D and E together, in 1857 there were 203,143 persons assessed under £150; and in 1858, 212,831 under £150. He would make intercession on behalf of those persons, and urge the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider the course he was now pursuing. Was this the time to sweep away the paper duty, and to replace the loss of revenue by increasing the income tax? The class of persons to whom he was referring found it hard enough, God knew, to live respectably. They were among the most useful in the community; the greatest confidence was placed in many of them; they had, generally speaking, wives and families dependent upon them; and, he asked, how were they to be benefited by the admission of French wines and French silks? To many of them it was a constant source of anxiety how to square their daily expenditure with their daily income, and every farthing taken from them in the shape of taxation was therefore a subject of disquiet. Besides, what did the Commissioners of Inland Revenue say in their Report for 1858? They said—

“It would be almost impossible to convey to any person unacquainted with the practical working of the income tax a notion of the labour which it entails upon this office, of the great variety and complexity of the questions daily brought before us; and of the painful appeals which are made to our compassion and forbearance. To those who are aware of the numerous and troublesome inquiries necessary in each case of claim for exemption or repayment, the fact that upwards of 250,000 such claims are annually disposed of will convey a formidable impression of the difficulties experienced in the collection of this tax.”

He said, then, the House ought to be careful how they, except in cases of the greatest emergency, placed an additional farthing of income tax on such persons. He could give them no greater proof than he had done of the way in which the income tax operated to the injury and privation of what he might call the upper orders of the poor—for so he might designate persons with incomes of £100 and £150 a year—and he would ask the House to pause before they inflicted additional oppression upon that important class of the community. In conclusion, he would ask leave to place in the hand of the right hon. Gentleman the following Amendment, instead of the one he had put upon the paper:—

“That, as it appears the repeal of the duty on paper will necessitate the addition of 1d. in the pound to the property and income tax, it is the opinion of this House that such appeal is under such circumstances at the present moment inexpedient.”

Amendment proposed,

“To leave out from the word ‘That’ to the end of the Question, in order to add the words ‘as it appears that the repeal of the Duty on Paper will necessitate the addition of one penny in the pound to the Property and Income Tax, it is the opinion of this House that such repeal is under such circumstances at the present moment inexpedient,’—instead thereof:—

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

MR. BANKS STANHOPE said, he rose to second the Amendment, and he trusted that the House would permit him to give his reasons for supporting the proposition which was now before them. When about to reduce taxation they must consider whether the loss was to be supplied from any existing fund or by the imposition of another tax; and if they had to impose another tax it would be necessary to look into the character of the new tax, and to apply to it the same scrutiny which had been applied to the tax which they proposed to repeal. He believed if this course were taken there could be no doubt that the additional penny income tax would be found to be more burdensome than the paper duty. He submitted to the House that it was evident from the financial situation of the country, as described by the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other day, that without any additional income tax he would have been able to make all the customs alterations. The additional penny of income tax was therefore the immediate consequence of the repeal of the paper duty. It was stated, however, that the paper duty had been condemned by a special vote of the House of Commons, and that therefore it was incumbent upon them to repeal it without delay. But they should remember the circumstances of that vote. It was condemned in 1858 by the passing of a Resolution to this effect—“That the maintenance of the Excise duty on paper as a permanent source of revenue was impolitic.” Surely, if it were a tax upon knowledge now, if it were odious and untenable and impolitic now, it was equally so in 1858; and why, he asked, if the case were so strong against it, did not the House abolish it at that time, once and for all, instead of passing the general Resolution to which he had just referred? The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his able speech on introducing the Budget, had explained with much ingenuity why in 1860 he was unable to fulfil his promise given in 1853 of abolishing the income tax; and he said, “You cannot take off the income tax, because those expenses which are more immediately under the control of the House of Commons have been increased by £14,000,000 since 1853, and that is a circumstance which in 1853 I could not calculate upon.” But if that argument were good for anything as respected the income tax it was equally good against the removal of that paper duty in 1860, although it had been formally condemned in 1858. There was one objection which had been used for a great many years to the paper duty—that it was a tax on knowledge. Did they mean to say that the whole amount of the paper duty (£1,200,000) was a tax on knowledge? If so, it was an erroneous opinion. He had inquired of a large manufacturer, and though only an approximate estimate could be formed, he found that of the whole quantity of paper manufactured in this country in the year two-fifths were used for printing purposes of every description, inclusive of newspapers and periodicals, and one-fifth for writing, while the remaining two-fifths were used for packing and the general objects of trade. Now, if that were so, what became of the statement which had been paraded for years that the whole of the £1,200,000 was a tax upon knowledge? So far from that being case, of the £1,200,000 to be remitted this year, only £400,000 would be upon sources which contributed to knowledge, whilst £600,000 had no connection with printing, knowledge, or education. Mr. Bohn had stated, over and over again, that the remission of the paper duty would make no appreciable difference in the price of books, and Mr. M'Culloch, who was often quoted on the other side of the House, said,

“The abolition of the duty on paper would not make any difference in the price of books, newspapers, and other periodicals. The duty on a copy of a double sheet of The Times is about a farthing. On a number of The Edinburgh or Quarterly Review, which sold at 6s., it was twopence; and on Macaulay's History of England, which sold at 32s., it was only 6d. It is idle, then, to pretend that the existing duty on paper is any obstacle to the circulation of literature, or that books would be cheaper if the duty were abolished. It is customary, indeed, for those who are in favour of the abolition of the duty to call it in the cant of the day a tax on knowledge, but the larger portion by far of the paper which pays duty is neither used for books nor newspapers, but is used for the humbler purposes of wrapping up parcels.”

That being the case, he (Mr. B. Stanhope) could not understand how it could with justice be argued that the repeal of the duty would tend to the spread of literature among the lower classes. If they took off the tax let them do it upon fair grounds, and not say it was to spread education among the working classes. The paper duty might be objectionable to the trade, but it was not a tax upon knowledge. Another objection which was made to the paper duty was, that it was untenable. He believed that if they were to ask the same question of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue concerning any other tax, the Commissioners would say that it, too,

Mr. Banks Stanhope

was untenable. He believed that maltsters were much more inconvenienced by the excise than the manufacturers of paper. Another objection was, that it so interfered with freedom in the manufacture of the article as to prevent its being made of several materials which were not now employed for the purpose; but in opposition to that statement he might quote from the Report of the Inland Revenue Commission of 1858 the opinion of Mr. Phillips, of the Laboratory Department, who stated that the regulations under which an Excise duty was charged on paper did not in the slightest degree preclude the introduction of new material or interfere with the manufacturer in the alteration or improvement of his processes, as paper, unlike all other excisable articles, was perfectly free from fiscal interference during its manufacture, and it was only when the article was finished and ready for the market that an account was taken of it and the duty charged. They had formerly an Excise duty on glass, which, by increasing the price of the article, to a great extent prevented the lower classes from making use of it, thereby acting most prejudicially to the public health, while it caused such an interference during the process of manufacture that it was impossible the English maker could compete with the foreigner. So also with regard to soap—a very useful and necessary article, which should be used much more extensively than it was at present. The Excise on soap had not merely the effect of making the article dear, but from the way in which it was levied it prevented substances being used to make it sufficiently good to compete with the foreign manufacture. The Excise duty on malt was still more odious. Those who had read a series of papers which appeared in Blackwood's Magazine, written by Mr. Johnston, relating to the different articles of food and drink, would not fail to remember the details which were given of the impurities and objectionable substances which were introduced in the manufacture of beer; and he therefore said the malt-tax really did act most injuriously both on the morals and health of the people. He thought, then, that he had answered the three points for the repeal of the duty, that it had been condemned by Parliament, that it was untenable, and that it was an odious tax. If he might be permitted, he would now refer to the income tax; but before doing so he would offer one or two observations on the statement made the other day by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the great increase of profits and rental of land assessed under schedule B to the income tax. The right hon. Gentleman said that while there had been a small increase in schedules A and D from 1843 to 1858, in schedule B, which represented the profits of farmers, there had been an increase of 19 per cent. Now, he had gone into the figures, and was prepared to maintain that the calculations of the right hon. Gentlemen were totally erroneous. On what ground the right hon. Gentleman had based his statement it was impossible to find out. There was no printed paper which furnished the data or gave any return at all like his calculations. So far as he could ascertain, the Chancellor of the Exchequer must have founded in the one instance on the net assessment in schedule B, and in the other on the gross, the same returns being represented very high in the gross, and ludicrously small in the net produce. He had inquired of the Inland Revenue authorities how the apparent discrepancy could be explained, and he found that the net assessment under schedule B indicated half the net rentals in England over £200 per annum, the deduction of one-eighth and exemptions having been previously allowed. The net assessment under schedule B was the amount on which the income tax was charged to duty. The gross assessment under schedule B represented the actual amount of rental of land in England, upon a portion of which above £200 per annum the occupier paid income tax. This in no way indicated the profits of tenants. Now, he could prove three things—first, that schedule B neither by net nor by gross assessment indicated the slightest increase; secondly, that the increase in the income tax received was attributable solely to an increased area down to incomes of £100; and thirdly, that landed property had not increased in annual value from 1843 to 1858. There were two returns on this subject to which he would for a moment refer. The first was moved for in 1852 by Mr. Miles, the other by Lord Monteagle in 1858-9. The amount of income tax actually received under schedule B in the year ending April 1853, at 7*d.* in the pound on incomes of £150 was £282,000. In 1854 they made a considerable change. A tax of 7*d.* was imposed on incomes of from £100 to £150, and an additional tax of 3*d.* above that amount. In consequence, in 1854 schedule B sprang up at once to £349,000—an increase, not, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, of 19 per cent, but of 22 per cent in one year; while in 1858 the amount was £383,000 at 7*d.* on £150 and 5*d.* on £100, showing an increase from 1854 to 1858 of only 10 per cent. This increase was due to the tax being extended from farms of £300 a year to farms of £200 a year. Another reason was the tendency to increase the size of farms. When small farms were given up they were united to larger farms, and as the small farms had not been subject to the tax the increase was in that way partly accounted for. From 1843 to 1858, though there had been some considerable variations, there were no material alterations or advancement in the actual rental of land. Still there were variations. Thus in 1843 the gross assessment under schedule B represented a sum of about £41,000,000 a year; in 1849 the rental increased to £42,500,000; in 1852 it had diminished to £41,000,000; and in 1858, on a new assessment, it again went up to £41,700,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the return under schedule B indicated the amount of the profits made by the farmers, but really that was a mistaken idea. The return quoted the other night of the gross assessment under schedule B merely showed the amount of the rental of land in England, and the net assessment showed the amount of rental above £200 a year; but it had nothing to do with the profits of the tenant; on the contrary, any inference drawn from the schedules might be exactly opposite to the fact. Thus in the years 1849-51 the gross assessment was £42,500,000, or an increase of four per cent, whereas those years were the most disastrous to the farming interest that had ever been known. They were the years in which the pressure of free trade was most felt by the British farmer, and they were years in which there was not only no profit, but actually a considerable loss. On the other hand, the years 1853-7 were years in which farmers had made great profits, and had considerably retrieved their previous loss; but in those years there was positively a diminution in the assessment of four per cent. The returns were actually less in the years when agriculture was very prosperous than in the years in which it was being ruined. He had already referred to the argument that the paper duty had been condemned by the House of Commons. He maintained that the income tax had been still more emphatically condemned. All that had been done against the paper duty was, the House of Commons had passed an abstract Resolution stating that at some future time it would be well to take it off; but the income tax had been positively repealed. Unless it were re-imposed before the end of this month it would expire; and therefore he maintained that any argument that could be brought against the paper duty on the ground of its censure by the House would apply with treble force to the income tax. But it was said that the paper duty was untenable as a permanent source of revenue. Was the income tax tenable? Would those hon. Gentlemen who agreed with the hon. Member for Birmingham say it was tenable in its present shape? ["No."] He was sure that he should receive that answer. But if not tenable in its present shape, in what shape would it be tenable? Those who were in the House in 1853 would not soon forget that marvellous budget speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in which the right hon. Gentleman went at length into the subject, and showed that the moment you attempted to obviate the injustice or to repair the anomalies of the income tax, you began to commit more striking injustice and plunged into still grosser anomalies. The hon. Member for Birmingham had lately proposed his scheme for amending the tax—a scheme remarkably simple, remarkably lucid, and remarkably unsatisfactory. The hon. Gentleman merely proposed to capitalize all property, and to charge it with a general tax of 8s. per £100; but no one that had considered the effects of such a plan could have failed to see that in many cases it would really amount to confiscation. But that was not all. The right hon. Gentleman's (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) speeches in 1853 and 1854 were in fact able historic papers on the value of the income tax as a war impost; and he showed in them that just as we ought always to keep our armouries and arsenals prepared for hostilities, we ought likewise to have our income tax always in reserve. He pointed out the error of Mr. Pitt—whom he professed generally to admire—in not having availed himself of it sooner, a step by which he might have saved £200,000,000. Even in the late war the House had had an illustration of the justice of the right hon. Gentleman's argument. In that war they had had to raise £40,000,000 by loan; but if the income tax had been imposed for the special purpose of carrying on the hostilities, it would have saved £19,000,000 of that loan, while they might have made an arrangement to pay off the remainder by means of a sinking fund. At all events they would have avoided what now appeared to be the inevitable calamity of a deficit, with Exchequer-bonds perpetually floating before their eyes, of which successive Chancellors of the Exchequer were compelled to promise payment, but of which, so far as they were able to judge, there appeared to be very little probability. Ask any one they pleased, and from one and all they would get the same answer. Even professional men, who were to gain so much by the remission of the paper duties, would join with his neighbours in declaring that the income tax was the very worst and the cruellest tax that ever was imposed. The question really before the House was not whether they would repeal the paper duties, but whether they would increase the obnoxious income tax? That was the question which they had really to answer; and on which they would have to explain their answer to their constituents, to whom they had now-a-days to pay almost an annual visit. If the House really represented the views of the community, they would indorse without hesitation the opinion that it was impolitic by taking off a tax that was burdensome at most to but a small portion of the public, to render it inevitably necessary to increase one of the most odious imposts that was ever levied upon the country.

MR. NORRIS said, the two hon. Gentlemen had spoken of the income tax as having grown to such hateful proportions as to have become offensive to the entire body of the people; and at the same time had treated the paper duty as something so light and airy as to be borne by the public with indifference, if not with complacency and satisfaction. He submitted that neither of these descriptions correctly represented the state of the public opinion as it existed at that moment. No doubt the public were not much in love with either the income tax or the paper duty, but it was a choice between two evils, and he believed that the community would rather accept the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget as it stood than accompanied by the supplementary budget of the hon. Baronet the Member for East Somerset. It was quite true that if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) continued to charge the same assessment upon incomes of a precarious as upon those of a fixed character, its unpopularity would in time sweep away before it the reputation which the right hon. Gentleman had so well earned by his financial scheme. But the proposal respecting the income tax he understood to be for one year, and for one year only; and the hon. Baronet, with all his strong objections to the impost, only proposed to abate it by a tithe of its amount. If the hon. Baronet thought that the fact of the income tax having always been a war tax till 1842 was a reason why it should not be continued in time of peace, he (Mr. Norris) had a right to claim all that portion of the hon. Baronet's speech against the paper duty, for it was first imposed in 1711, in order to enable Queen Anne to carry on the war then raging, until she had made a good and lasting peace. With regard to the effect of the paper duty, let him call into court an adverse witness. Mr. Bohn, the publisher, whose name had been so often mentioned in the debate, said,—“The public will naturally inquire why I have troubled myself to advocate the maintenance of a tax which, as one of the large payers of it, ought to be as objectionable to me as to anybody.” And he added:—“I shall lose the drawback, which, as a considerable shipper of books, yields me several hundred pounds per annum. At this moment I hold half a million of volumes in stock, which are equitably entitled to drawback, but I have no doubt it will be denied.” From this it was plain that if Mr. Bohn retained his half million volumes for sale in this country, in competition with untaxed books, the several hundred pounds a year which he would lose by the repeal of the duty would go into the pockets of the public. The paper duty amounted to a charge of 5 per cent on some of the elementary school-books used by the poor; on many it was 10 per cent; on more, 15; and on most 20 per cent. If then it was only equivalent to 6d. on two of Lord Macaulay's volumes, which cost £1 12s., upon other works that cost 10s. it amounted to no more than three-halfpence, and on others that cost 20s. to no more than 2d., its incidence was most unfair. It was a tax that pressed heavily on the necessary school-books and cheap literature which reached the labouring man and his children, while it let the luxuries of the rich all but entirely escape. The income tax had been spoken of during the debate as though it were an impost which was now to be felt for the first time. But when an income tax of 7d. had been proposed by Sir Robert Peel in 1842, by the noble Lord the Member for London in 1849, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks in 1852, the gross expenditure of the country being but £50,000,000, he (Mr. Norris) did not think the hon. Baronet need be surprised, when an enlarged expenditure had to be met, that the tax proposed to be increased was that which had been sanctioned by those three great statesmen in succession. He could not doubt that the country, which had demanded this expenditure, would cheerfully bear an income tax of 10d. in the pound rather than recommend the further and continued imposition of the paper duty. His hon. Friend opposite had spoken of the expenditure having grown to an enormous amount; but however oppressive a tax might be, nothing was more offensive than a tax imposed unequally upon the shoulders of the people. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the definition of the Court of Exchequer, that paper consisted of “a fibrous matter knit together in sheets.” But there were thousands of articles manufactured by ingenious people in this country which would come under that definition. He rather thought the clothes he had on might be defined in that way, and by a stretch of the powers of the Excise might be made liable to duty. He ventured to say that there were a number of paper mills producing articles which, in the districts of the country where they were situated, the Excise authorities claimed to be paper, and assessed and charged as such, as to which, in another part of the country, the Excise authorities took a different view altogether; and if his hon. Friend succeeded in his Motion, he must bring in a Bill to define accurately the distinction between what was paper and what was not, and to draw out such a Bill he would need the assistance of the most ingenious people who were engaged in the manufacture of cloth, and of the ablest chemists. The officers of the Inland Revenue had themselves declared that without going into details, it was sufficient to state that the card-makers were exempt from duty, while the pasteboard-makers were subject to it. This distinction was merely nominal. They concluded their Report by saying that they were unable to deny the existence of these evils, or to suggest any remedy except the abolition of the duty complained of. He should like, however, to refer once more to the serious impediments which this tax placed in the way of those benevolent persons who advocated the spread of education among the poorer classes of this country. In 1840 the first sum of money was voted, namely, £10,600, which went by order of the Privy Council in aid of the education of the country; and so popular was the grant that, from time to time up to 1849, in those nine years it had increased to £109,000. Onward it went like a tide, until it reached the amount of £886,000. He had even heard it predicted that it would increase until it reached £3,000,000. But looking at the actual facts, if the Government granted £886,000 last year, the House knew that the proportion of the Government grant to voluntary subscriptions was as two to three. Consequently the public must have contributed voluntarily more than £1,250,000. Adding these two sums together, it followed that more than £2,000,000 was paid for education during the financial year 1859. It was difficult to ascertain the precise proportion of this large sum which was spent on school books, but the operation of the paper duty must in this way have necessarily circumscribed the usefulness of the benevolent persons who were engaged in this holy work. In addition to the objections to the tax which were derived from the difficulty of accurately defining what was and what was not paper, there was also the objection that a number of persons were exempted by order of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. Under all these circumstances he hoped that the House would by a large majority reject the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for East Somerset.

MR. A. MILLS said, that the question before the House, as he understood it, was not as to the merits or demerits of the Excise duty on paper, but whether they would impose upon the country an income tax of 10*d.* in the pound in order that they might abolish that duty. He quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down and with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, that this was a duty which ought at the earliest opportunity, consistent with the exigencies of the public service and the position of the public revenue, to be got rid of. The question was, whether this was such an opportunity. In 1858 the question was argued by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, upon such grounds that he had a right to expect they would on the present occasion support the Amendment. On the 21st of June, 1858, when the present President of the Board of Trade proposed a Resolution simply declaring that when the time came at which the finances of the country could afford it the Excise duty on paper ought to be abolished, the noble Lord said:—

“The House would recollect that last year the then Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed that the income tax should be kept up at 7*d.* in the pound, and that instead of 1*s.* 3*d.*, the duty on tea should be 1*s.* 5*d.*, and that there should be a proportionate increase in the duty on sugar. This year they had allowed the income tax to fall from 7*d.* to 5*d.* in the pound, but they had kept up the duty on tea at 1*s.* 5*d.*, and also retained the proportionate increase in the duty on sugar. It was, therefore, almost a matter of good faith, when next there was a reduction in taxation, that the duties on tea and sugar should be reduced, which were, in fact, war duties, and there could be no greater claim for reduction in taxation than in those articles of consumption which entered so largely into the comforts of the people.” [3 Hansard, cli. 133.]

On the same occasion the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department expressed himself thus:—

“They were told that in a particular year the income tax was to be abolished. That announcement was received with approbation by many hon. Members of this House. But it must be remembered that it involved the fact that in three years they would abandon £5,000,000 of taxation. The question then arose under these circumstances, not whether any other tax could be remitted, but whether some new one must not be created.”

Although he would not say that hon. Members in that House or the Members of a Government were to be bound in 1860 by the reasons they had put forth in 1858, yet it seemed difficult to understand how, after using these arguments, either the noble Lord or the right hon. Baronet could with consistency oppose the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Somersetshire. With regard to their ability to abolish this tax at the present moment, it appeared to him inexplicable how the House of Commons could impose an enormous tax upon the whole body of the people in order to enable the producers of penny newspapers to drive a profitable trade against the natural course of affairs. No doubt the proprietors of those papers would say they were losing money. His reply to this was, that they should not have engaged in a losing trade. The immediate abolition of the excise on paper might be very advantageous to those whose capital was embarked in the manufacture of that article; but if this advantage was to be purchased by a large increase of war taxes in time of peace, the question really lay between the interest of the whole community, and that of those who were concerned in a particular department of manufacture. It was with the greatest reluctance that he gave any vote which might seem to be in the slightest degree opposed to the present Conservative Government; but the Amendment so approved itself to his judgment, and was so entirely accordant with the past policy of that House and with the general feeling of the country, that he could do no less than give it a cordial support.

MR. BLACK said, he should support the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, on the ground that it would really be economical to the country to abolish this tax, as the revenue derived from it was collected at great expense. Let hon. Gentlemen consider the course of paper from the time it left the maker till it reached their hands in the shape of a book. The paper-maker, as soon as he had a sufficient quantity of paper, disposed of it to the wholesale stationer. He, of course, had his profit, not only a profit on the material, but a profit on the Excise duty which he had already paid. As the book passed through the hands of the publisher, the wholesale bookseller, and the retail bookseller, each of these persons charged a profit upon the duty paid, and before the book came into the hands of the reader, the tax was doubled or trebled. On one work he published himself, on which the paper duty amounted to between £3,000 and £4,000, he calculated that before it reached the public the purchasers would have to pay £7,000 or £8,000. Surely that was a most uneconomical method of raising a tax of £1,200,000 a year. It was much better to pay an additional penny on the income tax—not that he loved the income tax. He hated it for its unjust and inquisitorial nature, but as the tax was to continue, at any rate the additional penny did not increase its evils; a man who paid income tax on £100, and had three or four children at school, would save it all on school-books. The abolition of the paper duty, therefore, would greatly benefit those who had most reason to complain of the income tax. Great capitalists, indeed, who paid enormous amounts in the shape of income tax, would not be benefited to the same extent, but he looked upon their sufferings with the utmost composure and serenity. He believed that if the paper duty were abolished, there would be an immediate reduction in the price of all articles manufactured from paper. When the duty was reduced from 3d. to 1½d., the manufacturers wanted him to pay the old prices; but he refused to do so, and the consequence was that ultimately every farthing of the reduction was given up. So it would be in the case of total abolition. But that was not all the benefit they would derive from the repeal of the duty. They would get quit of the army of excisemen they were now obliged to keep to watch the paper mills. It had been said that the higher-priced books would not be affected; that might be true; but there was a large class of useful publications on the price of which the reduction of the duty would make a material difference, and as the money must be found for the Exchequer, he was certainly in favour of raising it by an additional penny on the income tax rather than by retaining the paper duty.

MR. MAGUIRE*: Sir, I have listened with the greatest attention to the speeches of the Mover and Seconder of this Amendment; and I must admit, as the result of that attention, that not only are my previous opinions unchanged, but the convictions which I entertained ere I heard those speeches are ten times stronger than they were before. The hon. Baronet, the mover of the Amendment, has favoured the House with an account of the number of mills that existed in England and Scotland in the year 1813, showing that there were then 700 mills in England and 80 in Scotland; and he stated that somewhere about 400 of the mills which then existed had since ceased to exist. Was that fact an argument in favour of the hon. Baronet's proposition? If it proved anything, it proved this—that these 400 mills were crushed under the heavy pressure of Excise restrictions. It was said that those mills were crushed out of existence because the owners had not sufficient capital to work them. But is not that the argument of the monopolist? Is a tax to be maintained which is to serve the rich and crush those of small means?—are men to be excluded from a profitable branch of trade because they are not millionaires? The hon. Member who seconded the Amendment believed he was using an irresistible argument when he said to the advocates of abolition—

“Do not sail under false colours; it is all very well to pretend that you are urging the abolition of the paper duty for the intellectual improvement of the people, and the more general diffusion of knowledge; but it is well known that two-fifths of the duty is imposed on paper used for the purposes of trade.”

My answer is, the argument tells quite the other way, and against the Amendment; because those who use this paper—traders, shopkeepers, many of them of small means—are the very persons who would derive the greatest advantage from the abolition of the duty, and who, in obtaining cheaper paper for their business, would have more than an equivalent for the income tax which presses now so heavily upon them. It is the strongest argument to prove that the repeal of this duty would benefit not newspaper proprietors, publishers, and booksellers alone, but that the whole retail trade of the country would gain an advantage from this proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Now, Sir, I must say it is a disingenuous mode of arguing this question to pretend that it is one between a 10*d.* income tax and the repeal of the paper duty. Under any circumstances, and even at the worst, it is a question of a penny additional; but this penny should not be considered as an equivalent for the paper duty, but as the means of enabling the Chancellor of the Exchequer to carry out all kinds of useful reforms in the commercial system of this country, and to institute great fiscal improvements. The hon. Baronet said there were no returns from Ireland as to the number of mills in that country in 1813; but the hon. Baronet had not evidently looked in the right quarter for them. I have here a passage from an article in The Times, which though applied to this country, graphically, if not poetically, describes the state of things in Ireland; and the language is so similar to that used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that I do not know but that the right hon. Gentleman has borrowed his thunder from the Thunderer. In concluding a very able article in favour of the repeal of the paper duty, The Times of June 22, 1858, used these words:—

“Take away the duty, and you open the manufacture, opening also hundreds of small mills in the quiet valleys, and on the clear streams of the midland and southern counties. One has only to look at one of these ruinous mills, to see the old men who worked in them half their lives and hear their sad story, to feel the excessive hardship of the duty under which these mills were gradually impoverished and crippled, and finally brought to a stand-still, while all other trades have been continually assisted by the Legislature.”

The hon. Baronet, no doubt, wishes to learn some information with respect to the manufacture of paper in Ireland. I can afford him a little light on that subject. I shall not speak of Ireland generally, nor even of an entire county; I shall confine myself to a mere district of the county of Cork. Within a ten mile radius of the city of Cork there were at one time no less than seven paper mills at work, and that at a much later period than that spoken of by the hon. Baronet with respect to England and Scotland. How many mills are there now? Only one; and the ruined gables and mouldering walls of the others throw their shadows upon as beautiful streams as any that ever flowed through the sweetest valleys of England. And yet, if there is any part of the United Kingdom which was more than another suited for the successful manufacture of paper, it was Ireland; for there were to be found cheap labour, a cheap and abundant—perhaps a too abundant—supply of the raw material, and numberless streams of pure water, now, unhappily, flowing idly to the sea. If the duty be abolished, as I earnestly hope it will, I venture to prophecy that before this day ten years there will be a larger number of new mills started in Ireland than have been extinguished in that country under the crushing oppression of the Excise. Let us consider for a moment how the abolition of the paper duty will affect the trader and shopkeeper, I care not what his particular business, or what his class—let him be grocer, ironmonger, haberdasher in extensive business, or let him be a huckster carrying on a brisk trade in the midst of a poor population. Every person in trade, especially in the retail trade, uses an immense quantity of paper to wrap up articles purchased in his shop. The small shopkeeper who wraps up thousands of articles a week in the cheapest and coarsest paper, upon which the duty is heaviest, will benefit far more than he will have to pay in additional income tax, supposing that 1*d.* in the pound represents the equivalent to the revenue for the remission of the paper duty. Even the poor shopkeepers in the village must wrap up the smallest article—the half-penny worth of sugar, the pennyworth of tea, the pennyworth of butter, for the breakfast of the labourer—in paper which is taxed to the very highest amount; for it must be remembered that while the perfumed note paper used by the lady of fashion pays the smallest amount of duty—from 5 to 8 per cent—the coarser paper used by shopkeepers pays from 50 to 60, and even 75 per cent. To such a class the Chancellor of the Exchequer proved himself, by the proposal to abolish this onerous tax, not an oppressor, but a benefactor. The tax is also an unfair tax upon the honest manufacturer, because he has to encounter an unfair competitor in the smuggler. Let the manufacturers in England, Ireland, and Scotland be asked what was the most serious cause of embarrassment to their trade; and their answer will be, that the smuggler was their great enemy. The fact is, there is an enormous amount of illicit trade and smuggling going on with reference to this duty, to the detriment of the honest manufacturer and trader. A letter which I will take the liberty of reading will throw some light on the subject. It is written by a friend whom I instructed to make inquiries for me on the subject generally; and it gives the information which he obtained from a gentleman of the highest respectability and greatest intelligence—Mr. Greer, of the Dripsey Mills—and it gives it almost in the words of Mr. Greer himself. The letter says:—

“ In the first place, there is an immense amount of smuggling going on at present, which, apart from all other evils, places the fair trader at a great disadvantage. Mr. Greer pays £10,000 a year duty. The whole duty does not exceed £1,200,000. In that case he should make a hundred and twentieth part of the whole paper of the United Kingdom, which he has very good reason to know he does not. The smuggling takes place chiefly in the inferior descriptions of paper, on which the duty bears the largest proportion to the intrinsic value. The disadvantage to him is therefore the greater. If, for instance, on a coarse paper worth 3d. he pays 1½d. additional, it is quite manifest he is placed at an immense disadvantage to the man who makes it without paying duty. Again, some time since, about the year 1840, the excise added 5 per cent to the duty. This pressed mainly on the manufacturer, as he could not charge so small a sum to consumers. He could not ask for 5 per cent on 1½d., or on ten times 1½d.; while on the whole of the duty (£10,000) which he paid, he was taxed an additional £500 a year—no small burden on his industry. The duty presses heaviest on the lowest descriptions of paper. Fancy paper, on which ladies write perfumed notes, pay but 8 or 10 per cent ad valorem, while a grocer, for wrapping paper, pays 50, 60, or even 75 per cent.”

The hon. Baronet has evidently adopted the fallacies of Mr. Bohn, who, being one of the great publishers, perhaps loftily disdains the benefit to be derived from a repeal of the duty; and the hon. Baronet argues that because the remission of duty will be of no advantage to such works as Macaulay's History, for which publishers can afford to give several thousands of pounds, therefore it will be of little benefit to the public at large. An humbler man than the hon. Baronet, or it might be than Mr. Bohn, but certainly a more practical man than either, has conclusively answered Mr. Bohn's fallacies; and I shall ask permission of the House to read an extract from the pamphlet of Mr. G. W. Petter, written in reply to Mr. Bohn. I rest upon it as a conclusive refutation of the assertions of the hon. Baronet:—

“ In considering the effect in price, Mr. Bohn ignores the existence of such publications as Cassell's Illustrated Family Paper, published at 1d., and Chambers's Journal, at 1½d., and which are essentially publications for the masses, and rests his argument upon such high class works as Macaulay's History, published at 36s., and upon other works issued respectively at 18s. and 10s. 6d., and finally upon the Cornhill Magazine, published at 1s. He deceives himself by despising the halfpenny saved on the latter, as we shall presently see; but the expensive books are absolutely out of court in the argument before us. Taking, then, the circulation of Cassell's Family Paper at 250,000 weekly, we will assume that it is affected by the difference represented by the smallest coin. Starting with paper at a given price, one farthing per pound gained in 250,000 copies amounts to a gross sum of £15 per week—of itself a handsome profit—but if, on the other hand, only a farthing per pound be added to the price of paper, the profit on the whole vanishes, and a further advance of a farthing would leave an intolerable loss.”

He (Mr. Maguire) would call the attention of the hon. Baronet and the House to this passage:—

“ Herein lies the secret of the abandonment of many enterprises, the success of which would have been for the advantage of the general public. Demand in any quarter for an increased quantity of paper, under the ‘existing monopoly’—that which the House should now put an end to—is the signal for an advance in the price of all the paper actually supplied, and this acts with the most destructive effect on the very publications which are in most demand.’ This is the fact, to which large publishers could bear painful testimony.”

Mr. Bohn, with the notions of a prince of booksellers, looked down with contempt on halfpenny savings, and even the hon. Baronet seemed to deride the advantage of a halfpenny saved in the publication of such a work as the Cornhill Magazine. Now, in all probability, if the duty be taken off, this magazine may not be sold at 11½d. instead of a shilling—nor, indeed, need those who purchase a work of the kind care about the difference. But the public would have the benefit of a still better article; for the saving on the publication of this magazine, on its circulation of 70,000 a month, would be somewhere about £1,800 a year, which would thus enable the publishers to give better prices to writers, artists, and engravers, and thus, if necessary, ensure the greater merit of the magazine. I assert that the repeal of this tax will materially tend to the diffusion of knowledge amongst the masses. You boast of having taken off the duty on glass, and thus given the peasant in his cabin and the mechanic in his humble home larger windows and more abundant light. But is there no other light that is even more precious, which it should be the policy of the Legislature to let in upon the human mind? Knowledge is the light emanating from God, who is the author of all intelligence; and by the diffusion of good and wholesome literature, by which knowledge is best conveyed to the masses, you render the people better citizens, more obedient to the laws, more faithful and loyal subjects, and more determined to stand up for the honour and liberty of their country. But, Sir, I have one source of consolation for the hon. Baronet who on this occasion so worthily represents the agricultural interest, and I say to him there is balm in Gilead—a drop of comfort in the bitter cup he is asked to swallow. This I shall proceed to show him. According to the returns of the flax grown in the United Kingdom, and especially in Ireland, it appears that the quantity is considerably on the decrease; but I believe that the cultivation of flax will be materially promoted by the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the inferior description, as well as the refuse, can be used, and would be more generally used if the duty were taken off; thus a new field of industry would be opened up, which would principally benefit the agricultural classes. I take the following passage from Mr. Petter's pamphlet, and I commend it to the consideration of the proposer of the Amendment:—

“The use of flax straw as a staple for paper offers still greater advantages from the fact that this material contains many of the properties of the very fibre from which linen stuff is made, and that its cultivation on the soil of Great Britain and Ireland would open new fields of labour and capital. Up to this time flax has alone been of value to the linen manufacturers, who will buy only of the finest kinds, and then of certain lengths; so that immense quantities are left to waste. Were this material rendered available for the manufacture of paper, by the abolition of the Excise (which is the main hindrance to its commercial success), the cultivator, who has hitherto grown the plant for its seed only, would find a ready market for his straw and refuse, and a great impetus would be given to agricultural industry.”

This seems to be a most excellent reason why the hon. Baronet, on cooler reflection—and I willingly give him to twelve o'clock to consider—should withdraw his Amendment. If, as the hon. Baronet admits, the produce of the paper mills was greater last year than ever, that is no argument in favour of the tax; it simply proves that there was an increased demand for the article, and in spite of the Excise regulations. In my opinion, there are conclusive reasons why this tax should be abolished. It has been solemnly condemned by this House, and it is high time that the Government should carry out the wishes of the House, and realize the expectations of the country. Would the hon. Baronet, had he succeeded in getting the House to condemn a tax which fettered industry and obstructed trade—would he be satisfied if the Government, whether of the one side or the other, refused to ratify the solemn decision of Parliament by the abolition of the obnoxious tax. And, surely, it is time in 1860 to abolish a tax condemned in 1858. It has been also condemned by the Excise—condemned by the Board of Inland Revenue—by those whose interest it is rather to maintain than to abolish taxation, inasmuch as it increases their duty, adds to their staff, and, perhaps, establishes a claim to higher salaries. The fact is, the subject is surrounded with the greatest difficulties, which are every moment increasing. It is as hard now to know what paper is as who Junius was. “Who was Junius?” was the literary puzzle, but “What is Paper?” is now the Excise puzzle. Here is duty charged on one article, and not on another, although they are made out of the same raw material, and actually spring from the same root. Then the trade and the country expect that the tax will now be put an end to. Even the nineteen-twentieths of the trade are in favour of its abolition, notwithstanding that it is certain to bring a new race of competitors into the field. We have heard much of the cheap newspapers in this question, and I shall say one word in allusion to them: Is this House—is this country—ashamed of the cheap newspapers of the day? I ask, are the Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House ashamed of The Standard? The hon. Gentleman under me (Mr. Roebuck) says, "it cannot be read." My answer is, abolish the duty, and the publisher can afford to give better paper for the money. Then take The Star and The Telegraph, and see what they are. Contrast those papers with the papers in America. How are those papers conducted? Morally and honourably. It is true they are faithful to their friends, but they are also fair to their opponents, and, thank God, there is to be found in their columns none of that shameful and abominable licence which degrades some of the journals at the otherside of the Atlantic. Is it not, therefore, of advantage to know that these cheap papers circulate in thirty, and forty, and fifty thousands a day amongst the people, and especially amongst the working classes, seeing that newspaper literature has so large a share in the education of all classes of the inhabitants of this empire? Education does not entirely consist in what is learned at the mother's knee, or in the book at school; it is going on every day of one's life, and principally through the medium of newspapers, even of the cheap newspapers, that are so admirably and so intelligently conducted. It is, therefore, the duty of this House to facilitate the acquisition of knowledge, that which does not debase the mind, but ennobles and dignifies the man. Another argument may be adduced in favour of the repeal of the duty on paper—namely, that it would facilitate the circulation of the Bible. Now, a friend of mine, Mr. James Duffy, of Dublin, published the greater portion of 100,000 Catholic Bibles that were published within a period of ten years, and yet he had not the advantage of the drawback allowed to the publishers of the Protestant version. But when the tax will be abolished, Mr. Duffy will be enabled to publish his Bibles at a cheaper price; and thus the peasant of Connemara or of Cork will become, if not as great a Bible reader as some, no doubt, wish him to be, certainly far more so than those to whom whole cartloads of Bibles are now sent, but by whom they are never read. Many there are, perhaps, in this House, who only think of sending Bibles to the blacks abroad; but I would ask them to assist my excellent friend, Mr. Duffy, in publishing cheap Bibles for the whites at home. On every ground it is expedient that this tax should be abolished; and I am most anxious to see a fair chance given to Ireland, an opportunity of recovering a fair portion of what, considering all circumstances, may be termed one of her natural branches of industry. It is the bounden duty of Parliament to afford Ireland every opportunity of developing her resources and employing her people; and I hope to see the day when Irish manufacturers, of even moderate capital, will be able, under a free system, to hold their heads safely above the strongest tide of English competition. The hon. Baronet expresses his horror of the income tax. Now, if he will favour me with a stronger term, I will adopt it to express my own feelings; for I loathe and execrate it—but I believe, under existing circumstances, it is a necessary evil, that cannot at present be got rid of. Hating this tax as I do, I am still willing to pay an additional penny in the pound, if by doing so I can thereby open up the sources and lay the foundation of new industry and greater enterprise. Still, Sir, I do say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should at once deal justly and fairly by the different classes who pay this income tax. It is idle to pretend that it is but a temporary imposition; for I do not fancy that any Gentleman in this House is so Arcadian, or so green, as to believe such a statement. But even supposing it to be a temporary tax, and that it was to exist for one year, or for six months, that is no reason why it should press unequally on different classes—why the trader, whose profits depend altogether upon the fluctuations of business, and the professional man, whose means depend on his physical or mental constitution, should have the same pressure put upon them as upon those who derive certain and fixed income from land or from the funds. The income tax is one of those questions with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer should himself deal boldly and resolutely the moment his Budget is passed, and its benefits are secured to the country; and in doing so, he will bestow a great boon on the industrious classes of the community. I shall vote, Sir, for the second reading of this Bill.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that in the abstract no one wished for the continuance of a tax. A tax was an abominable thing in itself; therefore the question really was not whether they should or should not repeal a duty. Those who argued the matter merely in that way, did not put the case as it should be stated. What the House had to decide was a question of the balance of taxation—not whether or no there should be a paper tax, but whether or no at this time it was preferable to pay the paper duty or another 1*d.* of income tax. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer shook his head, and was, no doubt, ready to prove what he said to be a fallacy, but at the present moment the paper duty yielded £1,000,000 or £1,200,000 a year, and a 1*d.* of income tax produced much the same amount. He might say, therefore, that the one counter-balanced the other. It was desirable every tax should be repealed, if possible; but, in spite of the Resolution of the House passed as he thought somewhat unfortunately two years ago, he ventured to think the paper duty was distinguished, in contradistinction to other taxes, by two features which placed it very low down in the order of those that should be repealed. In the first place, we depended for a large portion of our most valuable raw material on certain foreign Powers, who were deplorably unenlightened in regard to the question of free trade. We got our chief supply from Spain, Portugal, and Italy; and it was possible the present prohibition on the export of rags in France and Hungary would be modified. But all those countries charged very high export duties; and they would tax the paper manufacturer to about the same extent as the present excise duty on paper. The consequence of repealing the duty would be to create an increased demand for paper, and, the cost of the raw material being raised by high export duties, the price of paper would remain as it was. The only difference would be that the £1,100,000 which at present fell into our own Exchequer would be transferred to the Exchequers of various foreign countries. The second peculiarity about the paper duty was, that the supply of raw material for the manufacture of that article was absolutely limited. He was aware that in saying that he trenched on controverted ground, and that for weeks past the newspapers had been filled with pleas, replications, rejoinders, and sub-rejoinders on the subject. If any new material had been discovered by science in substitution of the present raw material used in the manufacture of paper there would not be any doubt about the fact. The fact that there was any controversy on the point only proved to him that no such discoveries had taken place. The Chancellor of the Exchequer quoted the case of Indiarubber combs as an instance of the improvement of manufactures. But there could be no doubt about the existence of the Indiarubber comb, for you had only to go into a hair-dresser's and buy one, and then there was no need of writing to the newspapers to affirm or deny the fact. If in like manner any new stuff had been discovered which could be made into printable paper there would be an end of the controversy. People talked of the discovery of some Spanish fibre, &c., but until paper made of this material was practically employed upon a large scale, and brought into the market, he had a right to assume that no material had yet been discovered as a substitute for rags in the manufacture of paper. But upon this single fact the whole of the operation of the paper duty abolition depended. If nothing had been substituted for rags there could be no relief from taxation. The paper manufacturer would put into his pocket what the Chancellor of the Exchequer now received for the coffers of the State, while the consumer would pay the same for the printed paper he purchased. That however, was a very unsafe and unwise fiscal measure. There was no single fact upon which any two members of the trade were agreed. A great deal had been said about the duties being a tax on knowledge. No doubt that was a grandiloquent, high-sounding, and sentimental cry. But of the £1,250,000 now raised by the paper duty only two-fifths were paid by the paper on which books and newspapers were printed. That reduced the taxes on knowledge to £500,000. Then, although books of large price and great volume paid a good deal, yet the price of these works was so high that no appreciable relief would be felt by the consumer. They might, therefore, take out of the tax the whole of the sum which these larger works represented. Hon. Members had talked of the hardship of taxing books of education, and what great folly it was to take out of the pocket of the people with one hand what the State put in with the other. This, however, was merely a matter of detail, which might be regulated by exempting from paper duty books which were sanctioned by the Committee of Education in the same way that Bibles were now exempted. Therefore, if they excepted dear books and books of education, the tax upon knowledge limited itself to very cheap books and very cheap newspapers—to books like Cassell's Illustrated Bible, and the penny papers. Now, he was a little inclined to doubt whether the tax upon the penny papers could be said to be, in any proper sense of the word, a tax upon knowledge. Could it be maintained that a person of any education could learn anything worth knowing from a penny paper? It might be said people might learn what had been said in Parliament. Well, would that contribute much to their education? They might read the foreign intelligence, of which many would understand very little, and they might see the opinions of the editor of the paper on a variety of topics. No doubt, all this was interesting to hon. Members of that House, but it did not answer any true idea of education, or carry any real instruction or true training to the mind. It was a prostitution of the word education to talk of this tax upon the penny papers as a tax upon knowledge. Then, again, no one liked to pay odd sums in this country. Booksellers charged 1s. for a book, and if they could not afford to sell it for this sum they charged, not 1s. 3d. or 1s. 4½d., but 1s. 6d. They would never get him to believe that when the paper duty was taken off he should be asked 11½d. at a railway book-stall for a 1s. novel. Prices for books would remain very much what they were, and the whole profit would go into the hands of the producers. The dogmas of political economy they were told declared that what would benefit the producer would benefit the consumer. But how did it happen, then, that such large sums of money were made in trade? They heard of the large fortunes amassed by men in the work, but that was not the honest interest of money, or a fair profit upon their time or capital. These huge sums were accumulated by accident, by speculation, by remission of taxation, by a rise of price here or a fall of price there. They were sums that ought to have gone into the pockets of the consumer, according to the dogmas of political economy, but had been intercepted half way by the producer. So, also, the very large proportion of the benefit from the abolition of this duty would be intercepted half way by the producer. Then they were told that this tax was a restraint upon industry. The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) had spoken of a time when every stream in Ireland had its mill and when rural industry flourished. But was paper-making the only industry that had been driven from the rural districts? The linen manufacture used to flourish where it was now extinct. Was not the silk trade going northwards? In France was not the silk manufacture betaking itself from the smaller towns and rural districts to the city of Lyons? This was not in consequence of any fiscal duty, but was the operation of the inevitable law that all manufactures were carried on more cheaply where labourers were congregated together. The tendency of all industries was to gather together in the larger centres and to leave the rural districts. The paper manufacture would follow the same law, whether the paper duty was repealed or not. The hon. Member further said there was smuggling in Ireland, and that the profits of the Irish paper manufacture were diminished by the competition of people who evaded the Excise duty. That was probably true, because Ireland was the home of smuggling.

MR. MAGUIRE observed, that he had not complained of Ireland, but had complained of the whole of the United Kingdom.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he had never doubted the readiness of any Irishman to attack the whole of the United Kingdom; but had the hon. Member never heard of smuggling in the income tax? Had he heard of no unfair returns? Had not the honest trader to contend against those who made false returns? If smuggling and evasion were grounds for the abolition of a tax, there was no tax so exposed to that charge or which ought to be so determinedly swept away as the income tax. The last complaint was that the paper duty was untenable. The hon. Baronet (Sir William Miles) had disposed of the last Report of the Revenue Board, and it would be enough to say of it that it seemed to him like a report made to order. On what ground did they condemn the duty? Not because it was diminishing. If they had said the paper duty was untenable on the same grounds as the wine duties, he should have understood them. The revenue from the wine duties was lessening through the introduction of counterfeits, but the paper duty was increasing. Nor did they say the tax was unjust. They condemned it because they were continually getting cases before them which they found it difficult conscientiously to resolve. They found it difficult to draw the line with logical accuracy between what ought and what ought not to pay duty, and being unable to make a satisfactory distinction between what was just and unjust, they declared the tax untenable. But surely the paper duty was not the only case in which an arbitrary line had to be drawn somewhere in levying a revenue from the public. They need only turn to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself in a former Session to see that the income tax was more full of these waving lines of justice on the one side, and injustice on the other, than any other tax that was imposed; and if the difficulty of being able to draw a philosophical line of distinction between them was to be taken as a reason for abolishing a tax, then the income tax ought to be repealed to-morrow. It had been argued the other night by the right hon. Gentleman, that at the beginning of the Russian war the House laid down certain plans and principles on which the people of this country were to be taxed, and that the proportions between direct and indirect taxation were then fixed. He (Lord Robert Cecil) denied that any fixed or definite plan was laid down by the House at that time. It was found necessary to raise a large amount of revenue to maintain the honour and dignity of the country during the war; and for that reason a large amount of direct taxation was imposed. There was then in the House a man—Mr. Joseph Hume—not a Tory, who thought that the higher classes had been unjustly treated, and the lower classes unduly exempted from taxation; and he proposed that the income tax should be levied on incomes of £50 and £60, in order, as he said, that the lower classes might not be encouraged to demand a war, the expenses of which they did not pay. But whether the balance of taxation between the direct and the indirect payers was established in the way stated on the other side or not, the question now was whether the basis on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proceeded was a fair one. The right hon. Gentleman took the direct payers in one hand and the indirect payers in the other, and balanced them against each other while he made his calculations; but what he asked the right hon. Gentleman to do was to descend from his abstract ideas of direct and indirect taxation—to take the individuals of each class, ascertain what they contributed towards the war, and see whether they each paid a fair proportion of their incomes. In this way they would be able to judge whether they now owed a debt to the class that paid indirect taxation, and whether they were bound to abolish the paper duties. He would take the case of the family of a curate with £200 a year, and of an artizan with £90 a year—the former paying income tax, and the latter indirect taxes only, and ask which of them paid most in proportion to his income towards the support of the Russian war—the articles paying indirect taxation being tea, sugar, and beer. Now he would suppose that the artizan to whom he referred consumed one pound of tea every week and half a gallon of beer every day. That was certainly a liberal allowance, and with it he would have paid in the shape of war duties, during the last six years, a sum of £8 16s.; but the curate with an income of £200 a year, consuming the same amount of tea and of beer, and paying besides the war income tax, would have contributed to the increased charges of the State during the same period a sum of £36 6s. The annual contribution of the artizan would thus amount to 4d. in the pound on his income, while that of the curate would amount to 8d. in the pound on his income. There was an entire fallacy in the ordinary mode of dealing with the question of direct and indirect taxation. The proper way was to set the payments made by individuals in one class against the payments made by individuals in the other. The usual plan of estimating the amount paid by each class led to erroneous conclusions, and, moreover, exerted a mischievous influence by setting class against class. If you called upon one man to pay 8d. in the pound towards the support of the State, while another man occupying not a very different station of life was made to pay only 4d., you were committing a great injustice. According to every principle of sound finance all classes ought to pay alike, and if that were so the indirect taxation of the country would be considerably increased and the direct taxation considerably diminished. At present direct taxation pressed so heavily upon the classes with more than £100 a year that they were called upon to contribute out of all proportion towards the burdens of the State. Now, the armaments of the State were not maintained for the benefit of the rich alone. What classes would be most injured if an invasion were to take place, or if the peace of society were seriously menaced by internal convulsion? The man with a large fortune in the funds might go to some safer land where there was no danger of invasion and where the peace of society was never menaced by demagogues. But as to the poor man, trade would be stopped in case of any such disturbance, capital would cease to be invested, there would be no demand for labour, and his only support would thus be destroyed. The poor man, therefore, had the greater interest in maintaining those protective agencies by which the State defended capital and labour, and ought consequently to contribute at least as much towards their support. It was not just to claim the abolition of the paper duty on the ground that it was an indirect tax, and that something was owing by the payers of direct to the payers of indirect taxation. The right hon. Gentleman had taunted his hon. Colleague (Sir Stafford Northcote) with advocating what he called a "stationary finance," but his notion of progress seemed to consist in substituting direct for indirect taxes and in shifting the burdens from the poor to the rich. If such a policy were persisted in it would weaken the stability of the State, and it ought least of all to be pursued just at this moment when they were going to hand over the government of the country to those who were not to pay for it. Such a plan of finance was really a plundering finance; it practically amounted to confiscation; and therefore on higher grounds than those of mere detail he contended that those who paid indirectly towards the support of the State ought not to be relieved by placing a heavier burden on the shoulders of classes who were already overweighted by taxation.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: I think the noble Lord who has just addressed us has travelled somewhat beyond the question immediately before the House. He has descanted upon general theories which I think it is hardly necessary to consider, while we have before us so limited a proposal as that of the hon. Baronet (Sir W. Miles). Before coming to a vote upon the question of the repeal of the paper duty we must take into account the decision already come to by the House in reference to the Budget and the French Treaty. Now I may, I suppose, assume that the House, after full deliberation and after several divisions, has given its assent to the French Treaty. That being so, you have bound yourselves by one of the Articles of that Treaty to admit foreign paper at no higher rate of duty than the Excise which shall be levied on the home manufacture. Protection, therefore, for the home manufacturer is gone, and the question is, whether being offered the total repeal of the duty, you will now insist on retaining the Excise and admit the foreign paper at no higher duty than that imposed on the home manufacturers. Another point to be remembered is, that by a formal vote on the Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Du Cane) the House has approved the general policy involved in the financial scheme of the Government, the effect of this policy being that, although during the present year it was necessary to provide for a large additional expenditure, nevertheless you would remit a certain portion of indirect taxation for the benefit of trade and industry. ["No!"] I understood the division upon the hon. Member's Motion to be a deliberate acknowledgment that that is to be the financial policy of 1860. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in introducing his financial scheme, announced that the amount of remission which he proposed upon indirect taxes was about £2,200,000, being the sum which would arise from the falling in of the Long Annuities. I take it, therefore, to be the understanding, on both sides of the House, that something like that amount shall be given to the trade and industry of the country. The French Treaty has swallowed up £1,190,000 of that sum. Supplemental reductions of Customs' duty have been made besides, but these have been compensated by new charges, and therefore, in order to carry out the proposed remission of £2,200,000 to the trade and industry of the country, you still have above £1,000,000 to dispose of. Well, then, the question is whether, in fixing upon the paper duties for remission, we have made a judicious selection. It is not a question between the paper duty and income tax, but between that duty and some other branch of indirect taxation. The hon. Baronet gave notice that he would oppose the second reading of the Bill on this subject; but he has now moved a Resolution which, though I have no wish whatever to stifle discussion, or to raise objections on technical grounds, I think he ought not to have placed on the paper. I must say when the House considers this Resolution, whatever it may do with this Bill, it will be unwilling to place such a Resolution on the records of

Parliament. What does it say? It says, "as it appears that the repeal of the duty upon paper will necessitate the addition of 1*d.* upon the property and income tax, it is the opinion of this House that such repeal is at this moment inexpedient." I want to know where "it appears." I am not aware that it has been made to appear that the retention of the paper duty involves the remission of a penny on the income tax. That may have suggested itself to the hon. Baronet, but to place upon our records that some past proceeding justifies such a statement, I do not think this House will consent to do, whatever it may do with the Bill before it. I do not think my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will agree that a penny of the income tax and the paper duty have any connection with each other. My right hon. Friend may say that if you insist upon keeping the Excise duty upon paper he will consider whether the sugar duty may not be lowered, or whether it would be proper to make a reduction in the war duty upon tea. It does not at all follow that my hon. Friend opposite will get his penny in the income tax even if he succeeds in retaining the present paper duty; and when his Friends consider the real meaning of the Resolution I do not think they can consent to vote with him. But why has the Government selected the paper duty? I suppose it will be admitted that, having taxes to remove, it became necessary for the Government to make a careful review of the various items of indirect taxation, and to decide which items presented the strongest claims for remission. What did they discover? I think, in considering the claims for remission, hon. Gentlemen opposite will admit that the Government could not overlook the paper duty after all that has passed. The Government found that for the last twenty-five years those who were entitled to have the greatest weight with Parliament had looked forward to the repeal of the paper duty as an object to be carried out as soon as it was possible to do so. From time to time opportunities were taken by Commissions and Committees to condemn this duty as a permanent source of revenue, beginning with the Excise Commission of 1835, of which Sir H. Parnell was chairman; for although the Commission did not recommend the immediate repeal of the paper duty, they did anticipate a future repeal of the tax, and carefully guarded themselves against being supposed to give any sanction to the paper duty as a permanent method of taxation. I am not about to quote the writers of books or the opinions of theorists elsewhere, but I am entitled to ask the House to attach weight to the advisers it has itself selected, to Commissions of Inquiry, and the opinions of those men of different political parties who have guided the deliberations of Parliament. Ten years ago I brought forward a Motion for the repeal of the paper duty, not asking for immediate action, but to make preparation for it, because I felt that the instant abolition of a tax of such magnitude was not a proposition that a Member of Parliament was entitled to make to the House. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) was one of those who sympathized with the terms of my Motion, "that such financial arrangements ought to be made as will enable Parliament to repeal the Excise duty on paper." What did the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks say on that occasion? He said, "Was there a man in the House who entertained an opinion different from that of the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Motion? Different opinions might be entertained as to the effect of the duty upon advertisements and upon newspapers, but no financial evil was abstractedly greater than an Excise duty, while in the present instance it was aggravated because to a physical a moral disadvantage was added;" and he went on to say, "in his opinion it was a prudent, a politic, and a beneficial Motion." The right hon. Gentleman followed up his emphatic speech by his vote in favour of my Motion. Now, I say that the requisite financial arrangements are made; and, therefore, I claim as a matter of right the vote of the right hon. Gentleman. Coming down to a later period, I find the same views were held in other quarters. I had the honour of several interviews with the Earl of Derby, when he was in power, upon the subject of this duty. His Lordship not once, but on several occasions, expressed his opinion on the remission of these duties. In the last interview I had with the noble Earl, when I accompanied a deputation to him on the subject, he reminded us that he was expressing an opinion he had formerly expressed when he said that the paper tax was bad alike in principle and in practice, and that as soon as possible it ought to be repealed, and he held out hopes that if a Conservative Government should remain in office for two years, seeing the disposition there was to economy among the Conservative party, the paper duty would be repealed. I find a uniform and constant enforcement of the doctrine that the paper duty was not to be looked upon as a mode of raising revenue that ought to be maintained. I now find that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue themselves distinctly say in their Report that it is so universally believed that the paper duty is doomed and about to cease, that they found it extremely difficult to make those necessary changes of regulations, or to apply to Parliament for power to make those alterations which varying circumstances require from them to regulate the levying of the tax. I do not dwell alone upon the last Resolution of Parliament, but I contend that it is only part of a long-continued uniform system of condemnation of this tax. The House of Commons by a unanimous vote having decided, in terms placed upon its records, that the paper duty is not to be a permanent source of taxation, could the Government, I ask, having undertaken to remit a certain amount of indirect taxation, venture to overlook this particular tax? Is that Resolution which I have referred to, to remain a dead letter upon your books? The hon. Baronet the Member for Somerset (Sir W. Miles) has some idea that one day or other he will agree to the repeal of the paper duty. I think, however, the latter part of his speech did not quite agree with the first part, for he took pains to show that the paper duty was not such a bad tax, and was not so injurious as it was represented to be, while in the first part of his speech he said he was not prepared to maintain the paper duty permanently. I do not know why he should not maintain that duty as an ordinary branch of our revenue, if he is satisfied that it is not an injurious tax, or a pernicious mode of raising money. It appears to me that it was impossible for us to overlook this question, for I do not agree that Resolutions of this House are to be considered as trifling matters. I am not in favour of Resolutions being moved, especially with reference to taxation, unless hon. Members mean to do their utmost to procure the repeal of the particular tax; but a Resolution having been placed upon the records of the House, it would have been a neglect of duty on the part of the Government if they had given it the go-by, and treated it as a mere unmeaning paragraph in the journals of Parliament. The very first person who would have had a right to reproach us for such a course would have been the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks, who would have told us, "You come with a repeal of indirect taxation, but have omitted to notice the tax which Parliament has condemned, and which has been uniformly reprobated by the leading men on both sides of the House." Admitting, however, for the sake of argument, that all these authorities to which I have referred are to be disregarded, and that perhaps the paper duty is to be retained, what do we find as a preliminary difficulty? That it is necessary to come to Parliament for a Bill to enable the collectors and assessors of the tax to carry out such rules as they believe are necessary and just for the trade of the country. The noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil) says the report of the Commissioners is one got up for the occasion. That is a monstrous charge to make, unless the noble Lord is prepared to substantiate it. Does he mean to say that the Gentlemen who put their names to that Report have deliberately asserted what they do not believe to be correct merely to serve the Government? The question is, is the Report true as to the difficulties which lie in the way of the collection of this tax? I am prepared to maintain that it is true, and if you mean to maintain this duty, I say you must bring in a Bill forthwith to define the article on which the duty is to be levied and apply it to a number of articles which now come into competition with paper, but on which the duty is not charged. You cannot adopt a system of arbitrary exemptions. Such a course would be contrary to the principles of our institutions, and is one which, I am sure, this House will never sanction. But we are told that the definition of paper is to be found in the decision of the Court of Exchequer in terms clear and precise. The Court of Exchequer defined paper; the Act of Parliament did not. All that the Act said was that paper, however made, whether by a wet or a dry process, and of whatever material, should be deemed to be paper. But the Court of Exchequer having to define what paper was, said:—

"That paper may perhaps be described as a manufactured substance composed of fibres adhering together, in form consisting of sheets of various size and of different thickness, and used for writing or printing and applicable to other purposes for which flexible sheets were applicable."

But that definition covers a great many articles to which the paper duty does not apply. For instance, it covers the article of felt, which is extensively used for roofing, and I ask if you are prepared to take the decision of the Court of Exchequer as your definition of paper, are you prepared to apply the Excise survey and the imposition of the Excise duty to the article of felt? You must do that, if you carry out the principle of the declaration of the Court of Exchequer. The Board of Inland Revenue feels this difficulty strongly, and says, "Make up your minds whether you mean to maintain this tax or not; if you do mean to maintain it, we will ask you to pass a law that will enable us to assess the duty fairly and justly between the different trades and manufactures." Can anything be more reasonable? To say you will not do it now is only to prolong all this injustice and difficulty, and to leave the trade in uncertainty. I say it behoves Parliament to make up its mind now whether this duty is to be maintained; and that, if it be their deliberate opinion that it is unfit to remain as a part of our permanent revenue, this is a fitting moment for its total abolition. I hold in my hand the third Report of the Board of Inland Revenue, published last year, during, I believe, the administration of the Earl of Derby, and, therefore, I presume, not got up to order. What do the Commissioners say?—

"The expectation that the paper duty would be repealed on the first favourable opportunity has for many years been a source of embarrassment to us in the collection of it. In all duties which are levied on articles in the process of manufacture, the continual introduction of new methods of working, of new materials, and of new inventions to suit the taste of the public, requires corresponding alterations in the laws under which the duty is chargeable, and in no case has there been so great a necessity for those alterations as in that of the Excise on paper."

Who are the persons most competent to advise Parliament in a matter of this sort? I assert there are no men to whom the Government can more properly look for advice on such a subject than the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. I believe the extract I have just read contains the honest and deliberate opinion of the Commissioners, and I have no doubt that it would have been the same whatever Government were in power. I trust, therefore, the House will be guided by their advice, and I feel that if the Excise system connected with paper had not been administered in a most considerate manner it would not have been possible to maintain this duty for so long a period. I say, therefore, there is no mode of escape from their difficulties except by a total repeal of the duty, and that this House will hesitate before it places itself, in a matter of this kind, in opposition to men so experienced. Seeing, then, that we are met by these difficulties—first that the tax had been condemned by a uniform course of authority, and, secondly, that if we are to maintain it, we must legislate to enable us to collect it—the question remains, is the tax of a character that we should desire to maintain it? What is its effect on trade? I admit that its operation in impeding the diffusion of knowledge is not the only argument in favour of its repeal. The commercial argument is a most important one. In the first place, is the consumption of paper in this country at all in accordance with our population, or with what we should naturally suppose to be the demand of a country like England, having regard to the progress of education and trade? Is it commensurate with what we find in other countries under similar circumstances? The consumption in the United States, with a smaller population, I believe is three times as great as that of England. The population of the United States is about 23,000,000. We have in this country some 29,000,000 of people. The 23,000,000 in the United States make a much larger quantity of paper than we manufacture in this country. Is there any reason why that should be so? Paper is susceptible of a great variety of uses, and in a country with such an enormous trade as ours, we should be the first producers and consumers of paper in the world, in proportion to our population. Mr. Rawlings, a large paper manufacturer at Wrexham, who has seen the way in which paper is made in the United States, states that the processes there are so much improved that a man and his children can make paper by themselves, and turn out a much greater quantity than a similar number of persons in this country. Mr. Rawlings produced a brown paper made in the United States of, among other things, old leather, flax straw, Indian corn stalks, palm leaves, and damaged marsh hay, and sold at a price below the sum charged for duty in England. He also exhibited a sheet of paper of remarkable gloss and fineness, which was produced by two persons at the rate of 100 reams in eight hours. Do not tell me we cannot do in this country what is done in the United States; we have peculiar advantages in England, both in mechanical skill and command of the raw material, and yet here the production of paper is limited and crippled; and I have a right to assume that the Excise duty and the Excise survey have something to do with this important difference. Again, with regard to our exports, the paper duty acts as an export duty on several kinds of manufactures. The duty is paid on the paper boxes in which those goods are sent abroad, and sometimes forms a small percentage on the value of the articles the boxes contain. You increase the difficulty of our manufacturers in competing with foreigners in neutral markets if you place a duty on the boxes in which their goods are packed. Such a duty must have a pernicious effect in a great exporting country like England. The duty forms an enormous percentage on the value of coarse papers. A paper manufacturer of Birmingham told me that, on an average, he made paper of a coarse kind to the value of £33,000 in a year. The amount of duty he paid on that quantity was £12,800 a year. That is an enormous tax; as he graphically stated the case, he was obliged to work twenty-two weeks out of the fifty-two to make enough to pay the duty for one year. I can prove also that the duty limits the power of producing an article for which England is admirably suited. England abounds in auxiliary raw material for paper-making, much of which cannot be applied under the Excise system. The statements of the scarcity of rags in this country are no novelty. They were urged in 1836, when the duty was reduced. It was said the manufacturers would only put the remitted duty in their pockets, because no greater quantities of the raw material were likely to be imported. What are the facts? From 1815 to 1836 the average price of rags was perhaps 40 per cent higher than the average price since 1836. I believe the quantity of paper made is 90,000 tons per annum; previous to the reduction of duty in 1836 it was only 40,000 tons; you have thus added 50,000 tons to the production of paper, or nearly trebled it, and yet the price of the raw material has not risen since 1836. Is this consistent with the statement of a deficiency of the material? I firmly believe that what happened before will happen again; that if you repeal the duty the production will be greatly increased, and the demand for the raw material will bring it into this country; and the price of the raw material will not be enhanced. It should be remembered that every country imports rags from time to time. We have heard much of France prohibiting the export of rags; but France imports rags, and some small quantity even from England. Belgium and other countries also import rags; we ourselves export rags to various countries every year. It is a mistake to suppose there is any deficiency of this article if you take the whole world as the source of supply instead of two or three particular countries. The price of the raw material may rise a little, but I believe that the cost will be equalized gradually in different countries, for it will be impossible to maintain any great difference when you place the great English market on the same footing as those of France and Belgium. As foreign paper is to be admitted duty free the argument of the home manufacturer being able to put the amount of the remission into his pocket loses its force. There is one article likely to be extensively used in the manufacture of paper, to which I would call the attention of the hon. Baronet (Sir W. Miles)—it is flax refuse. I have before said that the repeal of the paper duty is to some extent a farmers' question. I believe the agricultural interest did not think me serious in saying so; but I am quite serious. I believe that the manufacture of paper is the only rural manufacture that in these days can be carried on with advantage. It is a manufacture in the extension of which the agricultural community is greatly interested. I have received a letter from an agriculturist stating that he had always grown flax with a larger profit than wheat, by using the seeds to fatten cattle and converting the straw into flax fibre for the Leeds market; and he adds that flax is not, as commonly supposed, an exhausting crop. Thus, if there are any complaints of the low price of wheat or other grain, the prospect of a development of the paper manufacture is worth the farmers' consideration. I believe that large quantities of straw may be converted into the material of paper; and that other auxiliary raw materials which are now burnt, such as couch-grass, may be made a source of profit to the agriculturists if they will only lend the Government their assistance on this occasion to repeal an obnoxious system of Excise regulations that cripple an important manufacture and prevent its full development. A word on the effect of the paper duty on the diffusion of knowledge. Giving this Excise duty the name of a "tax on knowledge," has been called something of a clap-trap; I am not responsible for that title; it was used many years ago; I believe the right hon. Member for Hertfordshire (Sir B. Lytton) in a speech on a repeal of the duty, was one of the first who gave that definition of the tax. But the term of a tax on knowledge is fairly derived from the Act of Parliament itself. In one of the clauses I find these words: "that for the encouragement of learning" the duty shall be remitted "on all books printed in the Latin, Greek, Oriental, and Northern languages." If you remit the duty on books printed in these languages "for the encouragement of learning," you certainly admit that the tax on paper is a "tax on knowledge." That is a logical deduction, and if in the days of Queen Anne it was thought advantageous to remit the duty on books in the Latin, Greek, Oriental, and Northern languages, surely in the days of Queen Victoria, when we are educating the people, it is right also to remit the duty on books printed in the English language. Under the existing law we are not entitled to levy a tax on books printed in the Northern languages, and I see no reason why the English language should not come within that category. But, be that as it may, the paper duty is a tax on knowledge, because it is a tax upon the means—the principal, perhaps the only means—of diffusing knowledge throughout the country; for how, I should like to know, is information to be distributed throughout the mass of the people? Is it not through the medium of cheap publications extensively circulated? Yet you who are opposed to the repeal of this duty argue as if it would in no way affect the spread of information whether the tax were 1½d. or 6d. per lb. Now, I dare say it is very true that an increase of the duty to that extent would not appreciably add to the cost of a book the selling price of which is three guineas, and which weighs only two or three pounds, and that a man who is prepared to pay that price would not have any very strong objection to the payment of an additional shilling; but then you must bear in mind that this line of argument is applicable to any amount of duty, however high. The real question for us to decide is, how the existing duty ~~acts~~ on publications which are low in price, and by means of which useful knowledge is extensively diffused, using large quantities of paper. I recollect the right hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire, when, on a former occasion, he advised his political friends not to put themselves in the wrong on this question, told them that by doing so they would continue to impose obstacles in the way of the improvement and refinement of the people. He went even still further, and maintained that the principles which that party professed would be promoted by the removal of the impediments which stood in the way of the circulation of knowledge. He placed so much confidence in the justice of Conservative principles, that he expressed a wish to have a cheap organ established by which those principles might be widely promulgated. That wish has since been gratified. The Standard, a most excellent paper, has been published at the price of 1d. I call upon you, in accordance with the argument of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire, to remove the impediments which lie in the way of its more extensive circulation. For what, let me ask, does it pay in the shape of paper duty? I understand that nine numbers of The Standard are sold by the publishers at the wholesale price of 6d. Those nine numbers, I believe, weigh 1lb., therefore out of every 6d. that is received upon the wholesale price, 1½d. has to be paid to the Government—that is to say, 5s. on every £1-worth that is sold. That amount represents the direct payment; but the 5s. originally advanced by the paper-maker and afterwards by the wholesale stationer eventually reaches, if I am not misinformed, some 7s. or 8s., which is probably the amount of duty paid directly and indirectly on every £1-worth of the paper to which I am referring. ["No!"] I know this calculation to be correct as applied to other papers, and I see no reason to doubt its accuracy so far as The Standard is concerned. Well, if that be so, a great impediment must thus be thrown in the way of the success of that journal; for, be it remembered, in fixing its price you must take a coin which is in general use, and cannot raise its cost to 1½d. Suppose, for instance, the circulation of The Standard amounts to some 25,000 copies a day, which probably may be the case, I dare say, the amount which it pays in the shape of duty must be somewhat like £20 per day; at all events, it cannot be very far short of that sum; so that the obstacles against which it has to contend in this respect are very considerable. It, therefore, does appear to be perfectly monstrous to wish for a cheap Conservative organ, with an extensive circulation in the country, and at the same time to maintain a tax which must eat up all the profit. But the question is not one altogether of a cheap press; it involves also moral considerations of no ordinary value. It is not only desirable that we should have cheap newspapers, but that we should render them as agents in the communication of knowledge as good as they can be made, instead of perpetuating a system of taxation which impoverishes them, and which may, instead of their being productive of benefit, cause them rather to be productive of injury to the community. Let me now take the case of periodicals, and of those publications of a religious and philanthropic character the diffusion of which throughout the country we ought to be desirous, as far as possible, to promote. I daresay the noble Lord who last addressed the House is a great supporter of religious tract societies, but he will be surprised to learn, on the authority of a gentleman who is well informed on these matters, that one of the largest of those societies pays in the shape of duty on the paper which they use, and in charges for printing, binding, and packing, a sum bearing no small proportion to the annual subscriptions which it receives; so that nearly the whole of its income goes into the coffers of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Now, to show still more clearly how this tax operates against the diffusion of cheap tracts among the working classes, I will take the case of two periodicals published by the Religious Tract Society — The Leisure Hour and The Sunday at Home—[a laugh]. Hon. Gentlemen may laugh at the mention of these names, but I am quite serious in addressing myself to the subject, for I am of opinion that those who promote the circulation of these tracts are entitled to our approbation. Well, then, I may shortly state that the duty on those two works amounts to £3,000 per annum, which nobody can, I think, seriously contend does not operate as a barrier against their more extensive diffusion. I may here observe that I some time ago sat with the hon. Baronet the Member for Somersetshire on a Committee for the promotion of education, and that I then found him to be a great stickler for what he called exclusive religious instruction; yet now he comes forward in support of a tax which lays upon these religious publications the heavy burden which I have mentioned, and is prepared to maintain that the Religious Tract Society ought to pay the Government £3,000 a year as a fine for the permission to circulate two of their publications. But these are not the only facts which I have to adduce to show the House how injuriously this duty operates. Mr. C. Knight, who was for a considerable time engaged in the publication of books, states that for a period of twenty years he paid a sum of £80,000 to authors for their literary productions, but that in order to circulate that amount of mind throughout the country he had been obliged to hand over a sum of £50,000 to the Government. Do you mean to tell me, then, with these facts before you, that this is not a tax upon knowledge? Is it mere clap-trap or the statement of a simple fact when I place the paper duty in the list of such taxes? For my own part I cannot believe that by maintaining it you do not trench materially on the fund out of which literary labour is paid, and greatly add to the cost of literary enterprise. I say the paper duty is not only a tax upon knowledge, but it is also a grievous and oppressive trammel upon the freedom of authors. I am quite sure it must trench upon the fund by which authors would be paid; for if the large sum I have stated as having been paid by that eminent publisher in the shape of paper duty had remained at his disposal competition would have forced him to give the public the benefit of it. The money that went to the Exchequer would have gone to provide other, and perhaps superior, authorship, and thus the country at large would have had the advantage. I do hope, this opportunity having arisen for the repeal of the paper duty,—now that you are about to remit indirect taxation, and seeing the great public expectation that has been excited in reference to this duty, the House will hesitate before it gives its support to the hon. Baronet the Member for Somerset. I give him credit for bringing this Motion forward with all sincerity; I think he is grievously mistaken in the course he has taken; and I trust with full confidence that this House will read the Bill now before it a second time by a large majority.

MR. HORSMAN: I have listened, Sir, with great interest to the speech of my right hon. Friend who has just sat down, and I am sure the hon. Baronet who has moved this Amendment must have listened to it with great satisfaction, because he must have perceived how carefully, how significantly my right hon. Friend declined his challenge to discuss the principle of this Bill. My right hon. Friend has been lively on the Tract Society—he was very eloquent upon rags, but upon the principle of the Bill he declined to say one word. He said this measure is a very limited proposal; that there is no principle at all involved, and it is merely a question of Parliamentary consistency. You voted for the Treaty, he says, you have passed the Budget, you have rejected the Motion of the hon. Member for North Essex; can you refuse to pass this Bill? And so, as by a skilful process of Parliamentary manipulation, it was arranged that the Treaty carried the Budget, and the Budget carried the Treaty; now the Budget and the Treaty combined are to carry the repeal of the paper duty. My right hon. Friend must be quite aware of the truth of what fell from the noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil) when he said we could not discuss this Bill on its abstract merits. All taxation is a matter of comparison. Taxes are a necessary evil, and it therefore fell to my right hon. Friend to show that not only are there great evils connected with the paper duties, but that they are greater than those connected with other taxes, and especially than those connected with the direct tax which it is proposed to increase—[MR. M. GIBSON: I compared it with indirect taxes.] My right hon. Friend corrects me, and I accept and will deal with his correction. I will not discuss the case, I will not degrade it into a mere question of detail. My objection is that, under the semblance of a small and apparently insignificant remission, we are called on to agree to a change which, as I said once before, is the most important financial change ever submitted to Parliament by any Minister in our day, not only because of the principle it involves, but for the consequences to which it must lead. I cannot really allow my right hon. Friend to separate, as he has endeavoured to do, the income tax from the remission of the paper duty, because we must recur to the speech he has found it very convenient to forget or ignore, delivered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he introduced the Budget. What did he tell us? He said, in effect this—"I am proposing a repeal of taxes now in fulfilment of the promise that in 1860, when the annuities fell in, the nation should receive a remission of taxation. Well, now, this remission of the paper duty is in part fulfilment of that promise." I have nothing to do to-night with the rest of the Budget, to which my right hon. Friend endeavoured to commit us; but, in order to make the real question before us clear and intelligible to the House, and to make it impossible for the Government to evade it, I will put it so that I defy my right hon. Friend to get out of it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer makes a calculation of the income and expenditure of the year, and he balances the account with the income tax at 9*d.* per pound. Up to that point I have to-night no fault whatever to find with the arrangement. The annual income and expenditure are there accurately balanced. But after that point he performs another operation. He then makes a remission of the paper duty, by which he creates a deficit of upwards of a million, and he fills that deficit by adding 1*d.* to the income tax. Now, it is on this last point that I proceed to grapple with my right hon. Friend. I have said that this remission is in part fulfilment of the promise made that a remission of taxation should take place in 1860; and the first remark I make on that is this—that when you remit the paper duty and substitute 1*d.* additional income tax, it is in reality not a remission of taxation, but a mere shifting of taxation from the paper duty to the income tax. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised there should be a remission of taxation, we understood it in a general sense, and applied it to the whole community; and we hold that that pledge has not been redeemed when he gives the benefit of that remission to one class at the expense of all the rest. In this case in reality there is nothing but the extension of protection to that class, and under the pretence of free trade and competition, a mere return to favouritism and monopoly. In the remission of taxes my right hon. Friend corrected me, and said he made the comparison, not with the income tax, but with other indirect taxes. I will meet him on that point; I say, in the remission of indirect taxes the great rule to be observed is that the first to be remitted in time of peace are the exceptional taxes imposed for the purpose of war, especially if these are taxes of which the remission had been promised, and still more if they are taxes that press on commodities consumed by the poorer classes. The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted this difficulty in his Budget speech; the tea and sugar duties, to the reduction of which he stands committed more than any other man, both on fiscal and moral grounds, immediately met him in the face. He got over the difficulty. How? He determined to remit the paper duty, and not to reduce the tax on tea and sugar. How does he reconcile this with anything like consistency and justice? By one of the most daring flights of fallacy that I venture to say any great rhetorician ever ventured on. He coins a new maxim of political economy, and presents it to this House with a faith in his own powers of persuasion that I must say deserved to remove a whole chain of mountains. He says, if you would confer the maximum of benefit on the labouring classes that is to be done, not by removing the taxes on the commodities they consume, but on the commodities through which they get employment. That is the principle of the right hon. Gentleman. Is it a true principle? It is very novel, it is very bold; but I will venture to assert it is as false as it is novel and bold. And first let me apply to it, not the scientific, but the practical test. Suppose that during the last autumn, when the Liverpool Financial Association were endeavouring to resuscitate the League with the view to get the taxes on tea and sugar and other commodities consumed by the poor repealed, some gentleman, a disciple of my right hon. Friend's school, had got up in the middle of the room and moved an Amendment that in the opinion of the meeting the operative classes would be more benefited by a repeal of the taxes on the commodities used by their employers than on those consumed by themselves at home, I should like to know what reception such a proposition would have met with. In these educated days probably the mover of an Amendment to that effect would have been laughed out of the room; there were days when he would have been assisted to a more summary exit. Take a still more practical test. Suppose my right hon. Friend had sent down an emissary to Rochdale, and turned out the hands in the establishment of my hon. Friend, who generally sits here (Mr. Bright), and it had been said to them, "The Chancellor of the Exchequer has sent down

£1,000 which he wishes to be distributed for the benefit of the operatives in this establishment; say, shall you be most benefited by giving it to the employers of your labour or to yourselves, to buy comforts for yourselves and families at home?" Everybody probably anticipates the answer; but what I ask is this—would that answer have been at variance with the truths of political science? My right hon. Friend says, "I will remit the duty to the paper manufacturers because that will stimulate the paper trade, and by that means give increased employment." But, I ask, would not the remission of the tax on tea and sugar stimulate employment exactly to the same extent? The question turns on the very elements of political economy, and I am almost ashamed to discuss it in this House. A million of taxes is to be remitted—shall we take it off paper or off tea and sugar—"I take it off paper," says the Chancellor of the Exchequer, "because, by so doing, I increase employment." But I say if you remit the tea and sugar duties to this extent you increase employment in either of two ways. In the first place, by the remission of a million on those duties, you enable the consumers of tea and sugar to purchase a million's worth more of those commodities, which have to be imported from abroad and paid for by articles exported from home, and you consequently increase employment at home precisely to that extent. If the consumers do not devote this million so remitted to the purchase of tea and sugar, they lay it out on other commodities likewise requiring labour, and you thus increase the wages of the labouring classes in an equal ratio. The obvious and vital difference between the two remissions is—in one you give the advantage to the consumers of paper, and in the other you confer it on the consumers of tea and sugar. Putting aside the fact that the latter class are paying a war tax, of which the remission has been promised, I ask the House which has the better claim? The consumers of paper are generally a richer class, and the remission of a million is not, after all, a benefit to them to that amount, for paper to them has been artificially cheapened, and they pay the duty in another form, being the payers of the income tax which has been substituted for it. But the consumers of tea and sugar are the labouring classes; and the reduction to them is a clear boon—first, in the gift of a million directly to them; and, secondly, in the increased demand for labour to produce the commodities which are to be exported in return. There is another consideration of the utmost moment connected with this question—namely, that it is of great social, moral, and political importance that the operative classes should receive the best wages they can command for their labour. We know that wages can be increased either by larger money payments or by a diminution in the cost of living. Money payments are, of course, regulated by the cost of labour, but you may reduce the cost of living by a reduction of taxation; and if you remit a million of taxes to the consumers of tea and sugar, you enrich them to that amount, and you enable them either, according to the principle of Sir Robert Peel, to increase the revenue by a larger expenditure on these very articles, or you enable them to spend more in improving their houses, or their clothing, and in educating their children. You elevate them in the social scale; the State becomes safer and rests on a sounder basis. I agree with what was stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the operative classes should contribute their share to the burdens of the country, but that is not the question raised by this Bill. The question is—assuming that the object is to benefit the labouring class, by which remission do we most benefit them?—and on that point the Chancellor of the Exchequer put forth a fallacy which I do not think he will venture to repeat. I have to apologize for detaining the House with a dry treatise of political economy; but I think the fallacies which the right hon. Gentleman has propounded deserved to be refuted. When he prefers the abolition of the duty on paper to the remission of that on tea and sugar, I say it is a deliberate and flagrant abandonment of the principle of Sir Robert Peel, which was, by the reduction of duties to get a larger consumption and a consequent increase of revenue. If he had reduced the duties on tea and sugar he would have acted consistently with that principle; but what does he do? He takes the paper trade, a most flourishing branch, and one in which the consumption has enormously increased, which would be a prolific source of revenue for future years, and, instead of reducing it, according to Sir Robert Peel's principle, he abolishes the duty altogether. At the very moment when it is most expanding, at a time when the Exchequer most requires replenishing, and when an enormous deficit is already in existence, he abolishes altogether a most flourishing, prolific, and increasing source of revenue. And how does he supply the deficit? By an increase in the income tax. The remission of the paper duty has within the last ten years been frequently proposed; all its evils have been stated, and all the arguments with reference to the increase of labour which may be expected to ensue from its abolition have been so often brought forward, that on the present occasion there was nothing for the House either to learn or to acknowledge on the subject. On every occasion, excepting in 1858, the circumstances of which were so exceptional as hardly to have rendered it worth quoting,—in 1850, in 1852, and in 1853, the Minister of the day, supported by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, admitted the evils of the tax, but refused to repeal it, on the ground that there was no less objectionable tax which could be proposed, and if it were removed there was no alternative but to substitute direct taxation. On every occasion the House supported the Minister in the conclusion at which he had arrived. What, I ask, is your justification for doing in 1860 that which you refused to do in 1850, in 1852, and in 1853? Is your Exchequer more flourishing? On the contrary, you have told us there is an unexampled deficit. Does the income tax press lighter on the country? It was 7*d.* in those days, and, even without the addition of the 1*d.*, it is 9*d.* now. I want to know, when all the circumstances which usually justify the remission of taxation are so much less favourable now than in previous years, why you venture to do what was not politic and not safe on former occasions? We must all remember that in the interim between the debates which ended in decisions against the change Reports were issued from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue condemning such a change, and showing that the evils complained of had been gradually removed. The hon. Baronet who moved the Amendment has read a paragraph in the Report of 1858, which was previously quoted by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge. When that paragraph was quoted the Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was an "old Report." He has since given us a new Report, and the hon. Baronet who moved the Amendment commented upon it, and the noble

Lord who spoke at the other side characterized it as a Report "made to order." That phrase created some sensation on the Treasury Bench, but I must say that I believe it to be a just description of the Report. I am very sorry, under the circumstances, that it should have been asked for, or produced to this House. It is dated the 1st of March—a date subsequent to the speech and quotation of my right hon. Friend. And what does that Report say? Why it tells against the Chancellor of the Exchequer, although it was produced in his favour. The concluding paragraph says,—

"Such inequality of pressure as we have mentioned appears to afford more valid-ground of objection than the mere amount of pressure that is insisted on with so much earnestness and ability by proprietors and publishers of newspapers."

They admit, therefore, that the pressure is not, but that the inequality is all that is to be complained of; and my right hon. Friend admits that these inequalities can be done away with at any moment when the Government think fit to exercise the power which they possess of introducing and passing a measure on this subject. I repeat, Sir, that I extremely regret that the Report has been produced under such circumstances. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue are gentlemen of capacity and character and the independence of one branch of our civil establishments is intrusted to them; and I say it was not dignified nor becoming in the supreme chief of that department to call on them to furnish a Report in direct contradiction to all they had said before; and the furnishing a Report so opposed to their known and recorded opinions, is not, I think, creditable to them; and in the direction that my right hon. Friend has desired it, will certainly not influence the deliberations of the House of Commons. They say now, Sir, that it is a question of inequality; but is it to be pretended for a moment that the inequalities of the paper duty can compare with the inequalities of the income tax? Who has painted this inequality so effectively, so eloquently, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, when he stated that the tax could not be retained because, more than any other tax, it corrupted and demoralized the community? But then you are told that you get rid of the paper duty altogether, and you only add 1*d.*—one-tenth—to the income tax. Now, do you increase its evils only by one-tenth?

As the tax rises higher, as the payment becomes more difficult, do not the temptations to evasion and fraud, and the inquisition and the irritation by which they are to be counteracted, increase? Are not the evils of the tax multiplied in a greater ratio? But, says the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is only continued for one year; you shall reconsider it next year. But is he not making it impossible for us to reconsider it next year? You cannot reimpose the paper duty. And if, with a deficit of £9,000,000 to be made up by an income tax of 9*d.*, you think you are justified in repealing a prolific source of indirect revenue, and substituting an addition to the income tax, I want to know what are the circumstances in which you anticipate that you will ever discontinue that tax, or, rather, what is the point at which its increase is to be arrested? For, observe the false principle you are following and the vicious precedent you are establishing. A very important interest, with plausible arguments in their favour, put a pressure on the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and get him to repeal the paper duty by increasing the income tax. You thus set a precedent from which previous Chancellors of the Exchequer have shrunk, and which the House of Commons have hitherto repudiated. How long do you think you will be allowed to rest on it? You say the income tax is established for this year only. Remember there are representations made to the operative classes that the taxation of the country weighs disproportionately upon them, and favours the rich. If that injustice exists, or is believed in, what are you now doing? You have already repealed the taxes on French wines, silks, and other luxuries of the rich. You are abolishing the duty on paper, which is also paid by the rich. ["No, no!"] Well, it is not paid by the poor. Why, Sir, I will not condescend to squabble about phrases. I do not say that every farthing of the duty is paid by the rich; but I put it to the candour and common sense of every man in this House whether, speaking generally, paper is not an article of which far more is consumed among the monied than among the operative classes? And I am drawing a distinction between the operative classes and those above them. Well, at the very time you are doing this there is one tax upon a commodity in general consumption among the poor of which the remission has been promised, it being a war tax, but which you leave still untouched. And, while you are acting thus, you are, as we were reminded by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by a change in the constitution of the country, admitting the operative classes to a large increase of political power. When we meet next year to discuss questions of finance under our new constitution, do you think the new representatives of these intelligent men will not remind you of your broken promise? Will they not tell you that the case of tea and sugar is much stronger than that of paper? Will not they quote this precedent against you? Will not their claim be irresistible? Will not you be compelled to remit these £2,000,000 on tea and sugar, the addition put on in time of war, and does not your temporary income tax at once leap up to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's "neat shilling?" And how long will it stop there? Next year comes and then you have a deputation waiting upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer to tell him that the £2,000,000 of war taxes have certainly been remitted, but that still there are no less than £9,000,000 levied from these articles of prime necessity to the poor. They will tell him that this is a heavy tax on temperance—that the workman's wife complains that her husband is driven to the public-house because his tea and sugar are taxed at home. As a friend of temperance, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they are sure, cannot wish that; of course he cannot—especially with his own precedent to smooth the way. Let us see—£9,000,000 divided by £3—only £3,000,000 more—and the 1s. rises to 15d. But this will not be done without a murmur. The towns now begin to cry out. They will say, "Why is the industry of the country to bear so much of our direct taxation? Let it be put upon property." Aye, and you will and must lay it on property. And thus this small precedent of increasing a deficit by repealing an indirect tax, and substituting in time of peace an augmented income tax leads, by a smooth, direct, natural, and inevitable process, to a complete fiscal revolution. It is here, then, that I join issue with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and challenge him to vindicate the course he is pursuing. The question between direct and indirect taxation is the great problem of the day. It is full of the most dangerous difficulties. No one felt that more strongly or expressed it more emphatically than Sir Robert Peel. And

I say that a great financier, with the ability and authority of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, professing to review our whole financial system and place it on a new and solid basis, ought to have gone into an inquiry on all the great principles involved, into the proportion in which the taxes of the country are paid by each class of the community, and the ability of each class to pay them. He should have done this openly, in broad daylight, and after full notice of what he was doing, and ought not to have arbitrarily assumed that the pressure of indirect taxation was too heavy, the pressure of direct taxation too light, and shifted the burden from one class to another without a single word of inquiry or explanation. Observe how you are placing the whole of your indirect revenue at the mercy of those who pay it, and giving a premium to agitation to class interests. The Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot plead that he has no surplus. A surplus is not required. There stands your beast of burden. Place your load on him. He has a broad back, which cannot easily be broken; and thus, Sir, not avowedly and publicly, but stealthily and by a side-wind, the whole of our taxation is transferred to the shoulders of one class, and being so transferred without any investigation as to its justice, it becomes arbitrary and tyrannical class legislation of the worst description and, ultimately, confiscation. I say, do not let us mince matters. Let us give honour to whom honour is due. This is not the Budget of the Government, it is the Budget of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright). During the autumn my hon. Friend made a most able and frank exposition of his financial policy, and I can well imagine the Chancellor of the Exchequer receiving the report of that oration. I can imagine him writing to the hon. Member for Birmingham, and in these terms:—"I have read with great interest your speech at Liverpool. You have made a convert of me. I beg you to come by an early train to Downing Street and help me to frame my Budget." And can we not imagine, Sir, that when the twain financiers were closeted in council, my sagacious Friend the Member for Birmingham may have said to the right hon. Gentleman, "Don't go too fast—you are too impetuous?" (Converts always are.) "Be advised by me. There are the tea and sugar duties, yielding £11,000,000—don't touch them; there is the tobacco duty, bringing in £5,000,000 from another comfort of the poor—don't touch that. Begin with paper—it is of only a penny tax; ring the changes on that penny. That penny will get in the point of the wedge. Trust me, that once in, all the rest must soon follow. And when in process of time we are enabled to table our whole financial scheme, my revolutionary projects of finance, embellished and disguised by your rhetoric, we will astonish the world by the production of what in Manchester we should term a prime article—the last and best sample of the Oxford mixture." Well, Sir, we have had two samples—first, we had the Treaty, which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham told us was the object of his warmest affections; but we know that it was also a child of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But, however, as all progenies must have two parents, we may assume that while the Member for Birmingham enjoys the pride of paternity, it was on the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there devolved the pains of labour. The firstborn was "Master Treaty," and in fulness of time appears "Miss Budget," with every prospect of a numerous progeny. We have already had timely notice of a third approaching birth. I hold in my hand a letter, signed with the right hon. Gentleman's name, addressed to a clergyman in Wales who had written to him, complaining as clergymen may well complain, of the burden of the increased income tax, and who complained also of the grievous burden of the rating to the poor. The Chancellor of the Exchequer replies, and in reference to the rating to the poor he begins of course by knocking down the poor Clergyman, as he knocks everybody down who attempts to dispute with him; but as to the income tax he really has the courage to write and publish this reply. He says, "I must remind you that the increase of the income-tax is not in the will of the Ministry, but in the will of the nation, which a few years ago was content with an expenditure for military services of—" I can't read the figures exactly, but say of so many millions.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Pray read what I wrote.

MR. HORSMAN: It runs, I think—"The nation, which a few years ago was content with a Supply service of £21,000,000, [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Hear, hear!] but which now thinks fit to spend on the same service £21,000,000"—[Cries of "Oh!"] I cannot read the figures, but I understand my right hon. Friend, to contend that the increase was in the military service.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I wrote nothing of the kind.

MR. HORSMAN: Well, I cannot read the extract clearly, so I will not press the point. So far I have stated frankly, in strong language I own, but not stronger than the opinions which I hold demand, my views of the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman. Perhaps he may meet me to-night, as he met me on Friday night, by telling me that on this, as on previous occasions, Her Majesty's Government, to use his own words, "have not been so fortunate as to find favour" with me. Perhaps he may meet me, as, departing from his usual good taste, he met me on Friday night, when he endeavoured to catch a cheer—which I am sorry to say—an aberration from the usual good taste of the hon. Gentleman who sat behind him—he succeeded in catching—by telling me that, in reference to my proceeding, my "sense of duty had better remain inscrutable." There have been, I confess, three great occasions during this Session on which I have thought it my duty to criticise the measures of the Government. Two of them were involved in the measure before us—the third was the Reform Bill. If my right hon. Friend inquires why I criticise the measures of the Government I will tell him that I do so because—to use a vulgar expression, for which, perhaps, I ought to apologize, as I remember the right hon. Member for Bucks once rebuked us for using it here, because, he said, it was not English—I am an enemy to all "shams." When the Government proclaimed their Treaty as a proof of confidence in France, I looked on that as a sham, and said so at the time. Again, when the Reform Bill was put off for a whole month, there being no business before the House, I considered it was a sham, and, if I may say so without offence to my right hon. Friend, who himself has set the example of diverging into these personal matters, in the estimation of most people probably his presence on that bench as a leading member of a Reform Government was the greatest "sham" of all. Having voted for the Reform Bill of the previous Government, with an eloquent protest against its having gone too far, that he should be the keystone of a new Administration, of which the great measure was to be a much larger reform, was enough to startle any one. Well, Sir, I thought the same description was applicable to the Treaty and to the Budget, and I have stated my opinions in regard to them, and vindicated them in the face even of so formidable an antagonist as my right hon. Friend; but I must appeal to the House whether I have on any one occasion exceeded the bounds of fair Parliamentary discussion. I think, therefore, the expression of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with which he gained a cheer when he told me my sense of duty "had better remain inscrutable" was entirely uncalled for. Now, Sir, let me give my right hon. Friend a word of advice. He is the last man in the House, I say, who should diverge from political questions to invite a war of personalities, because within the four corners of the British Empire there lives not a politician so vulnerable as my right hon. Friend. No man has owed so much to the forbearance of the House of Commons. No man has been so largely indebted to the generous indulgence of the country. No man has ever insulted him by asking whether the epithet inscrutable was applicable to any of his political eccentricities. Can any man describe those eccentricities? Shall I endeavour to describe them? I will treat my right hon. Friend with more generosity than he has treated me, and I will set him an example in this respect which it would have been better had he set me. No one, Sir, knows better than he—no one has had cause to feel more acutely, that when in our wars of parties and political strifes any public man in this House chooses to separate himself from the intrigues of cliques and the manœuvres of faction, he is sure to be assailed with petty personal aspersions, which coming from an ordinary quarter no man of sense or character will trouble himself about, but which are very different when they proceed from one in the elevated position of a Minister of the Crown. It is the character of this House, it is the independence of every man in it, which is struck at when a Minister of the Crown condescends to make himself the mouthpiece of most dangerous character. Now, what I want to warn the House against is this:—The Chancellor of the Exchequer is claiming the confidence and support of the country in the new career upon which he has entered, on the ground that he is following in the footsteps of Sir Robert Peel. I maintain, and am ready to prove, that he has in every respect abandoned the principles of that great statesman; that he has left the school of Sir Robert Peel, and attached himself to a newer and bolder one. With the exception of that little chasm in his financial proposal which he himself described, which he made and filled up, there is not one feature of his scheme which is not a plain and flagrant abandonment of the principles of Sir Robert Peel. ["Oh, oh!"] I will show you that it is so in a few words. The great guiding principle of Sir Robert Peel's policy was, to carry the country over future years by establishing its finances on an intelligible and sound basis, and to secure it against frequently recurring deficits. The Chancellor of the Exchequer begins by clouding and embarrassing the future with inevitable deficits. By anticipating the revenue of future years he creates a deficit, which he knows must be repaired by an increase of direct taxation—which must in its turn be the precursor of further deficit and embarrassment. Sir Robert Peel so operated on the national finance as to facilitate the discontinuance of the income tax. The Chancellor of the Exchequer throws additional impediments in the way of that discontinuance by employing it as a substitute for a flourishing branch of the indirect revenue. Again, with respect to the measure before us, Sir Robert Peel's principle was to reduce taxes, and by increasing consumption to enlarge the revenue; but once more in this Bill the Chancellor of the Exchequer tramples upon that principle, by abolishing a flourishing source of indirect revenue, and substituting for it a war tax. Sir Robert Peel denounced class legislation, and his Budgets were wise and just boons to the operative classes, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer's is a middle-class proposal; it enriches the manufacturing employer, and withholds from the operative the promised remission. Sir Robert Peel, again, most carefully, most cautiously approached the apportionment of direct and indirect taxation, in order that he might arrive at just conclusions after full inquiry and public discussion; but on the present occasion the Chancellor of the Exchequer avoids that discussion, ignores the difficulties, and seduces us into a precedent which in succeeding years may serve as the basis of further fatal operations. Above all, and with this I shall conclude, Sir Robert Peel admonished his countrymen and his disciples that they should treasure the income tax as a great national resource, in order that foreign nations might know that we had for emergencies a great expansive force, which as it was a mighty engine for war, so it might also be a guarantee for peace. The Chancellor of the Exchequer prostitutes that great element of national strength into a relief fund for agitating class interests. The paper-makers get it to-day, the sugar-dealers will scramble for it to-morrow, the licensed victuallers may coerce him in a future year, until year after year, the principle violated and this great reserve broken down, when the hour of trial comes—a bad harvest, a commercial pressure, or a war, we shall awake to the magnitude of our folly, and to the reality and extent of that financial disorganization which history warns us is too often the precursor of national convulsion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, at any period of the evening, but especially at the late hour at which we have now arrived (twenty minutes after 12 o'clock), I should endeavour to be very short in my reply to that part of the speech of my right hon. Friend of which I was myself the subject. If really, of which I was not aware before, I gave occasion to that terrific attack by an unhappy and casual expression which dropped from me in the rapidity of debate on Friday night, and if that expression has wounded the feelings of the right hon. Gentleman, I can only say that I am extremely sorry for having used it. The right hon. Gentleman is not, I think, quite right in supposing, as he appears to do, that he has always been remarkable for moderation of speech. It was not in my mind on Friday night—I had entirely forgotten it until I heard something of the same sort again this evening—but I do recollect that on a former evening he stated, with a blandness of manner not quite in harmony with the words, that, while Sir Robert Peel conducted the finances of this country in the spirit of a statesman, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer commenced as a spendthrift and finished as a footpad. And,

Sir, vivid as has been the contrast which the right hon. Gentleman has drawn to-night between the policy of Sir Robert Peel and that of the present Government, I do not think that any of the touches which he gave to the picture succeeded in producing a sharper antithesis than his very first effort after the Budget had been brought forward. Now I pass entirely from that subject to what is more important, because it stands in some relation, at any rate, to the question which we have to decide to-night; and here I cordially agree with the right hon. Gentleman that he has not minced the matter, for he has drawn such a picture as would be perfectly wonderful from any hand but his. The abolition of a duty of excise—that is the proposal which is before the House, and in it he sees—what does he not see? He sees the triumph of the hon. Member for Birmingham, and he imagines the letter which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has written to that hon. Member. Observe how much more easily he deals with his imaginings than with his facts. Although he could not make out the letter which he had extracted from a newspaper, and which, I believe, was really a letter of mine, although he entirely failed to decipher that, the letter which was written only on the tablet of his own brain he read verbum verbo to the House, and never stickled at a point or a passage. A predominance of this faculty is necessary to my right hon. Friend. Is this really the first proposal that has been made to repeal a duty of Excise? Why is my hon. Friend to imagine that a series of horrors are to follow this beginning, each one of which, as he enunciated it, drew increasing cheers from a small but enraptured band, and which he led up to its climax by deliberately asserting that the natural consummation of the Budget of the present year would be in a system of general confiscation! There may be here and there an hon. Member of this House who shares that opinion, but, for my own part, I frankly own that, rather than waste the time of the House in dealing with statements of that kind, I should prefer to leave sentiments so extreme and so extravagant to stand confuted in the public view by what I must venture to call their own absurdity. In the course of those portions of my right hon. Friend's speech where his flight was less high, I felt inclined to ask, "How does he mean to vote to-night?" because the Motion of the hon. Member for Somersetshire is not merely a declaration that the repeal of the paper duty is inexpedient—it is, as far as I can understand it, also a declaration that this House is determined not to vote the income tax at the rate at which it was proposed by Her Majesty's Government. But that is not the sense of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman consisted almost throughout of an ingeniously reasoned contrast between the claims for the repeal of the paper duty on the one side and of the tea and sugar duties on the other. All the horrors of which we are guilty, at least at the present moment—the rest remain locked in our breasts—but at present the great horror which we have committed, according to his speech, is, not that we have proposed the repeal of an indirect tax, but that we have made a bad choice and are going to repeal the paper duty instead of the tea and sugar duties. Well, I want to know what is the real view of my right hon. Friend. Does he agree with us that this million of money which is in question ought to be bestowed upon the repeal of an indirect tax? Because, if he does not, what was the meaning of all those appeals to the feeling of the House respecting the claims for the repeal of the tea and sugar duties? I must say that if he did not mean that, if while taking credit for the humanity and wisdom of giving that relief to the consumers of tea and sugar, who are the mass of the population, he had in his own mind the intention of giving them no relief, and was merely playing off that part of the question against the repeal of the paper duty, then I really must say that I think his speech, undoubtedly without any intention of his own, could only tend to bewilder and delude the House. If, on the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman thinks that we are right in proposing to grant the benefit of this remission to the trade and industry and to the commercial classes of the country, but only thinks that we have made an error in the choice of the subject, that I must confess is, in my opinion, a very immaterial difference. We carefully examined the case between the tea and sugar duties, or rather the tea and sugar duties on the one side, and the paper duty on the other, and we came to the conclusion that the repeal of the paper duty would be far more beneficial to the community at large. I never denied, as my right hon. Friend seems to imagine, that the repeal of the sugar duty would cause a considerable increase of trade. That proposition is perfectly clear; but he says that whether we repeal one tax or repeal another tax we shall produce an exactly equal increase of trade. That was the doctrine propounded by him in the lectures on political economy, which he delivered to the House; but I entirely differ from him upon that point. I dissent from the doctrine that all our taxes are equally beneficial or equally injurious. The reasons which induced us to propose the repeal of the paper duty in preference to that of any other tax were founded, as I have said, upon a careful examination. By repealing the war tax upon sugar you would undoubtedly cheapen a most important commodity of almost universal consumption, and give rise to a considerable trade, through the exchange of British labour in one form or other for the additional sugar you would consume; but when we looked at the paper duty, it seemed recommended to us by peculiar and powerful considerations. There is no commodity of more universal use than paper. It is a great error to suppose, as my right hon. Friend has supposed, that paper is consumed exclusively by the rich. The rich, no doubt, are the largest consumers for mere writing purposes, but paper is consumed to an enormous extent by the poor, who can scarcely purchase a single article of daily consumption, or of the small comforts of their lives, which is not wrapped in paper that enhances its price. [A laugh.] Yes, I repeat, that enhances its price—not in the same degree, I admit, as the paper consumed by the rich, who use the better sorts of writing paper and finely-printed books, that are taxed at the rate of three, four, or five per cent. But the poor are large consumers of paper that is taxed at the rate of twenty, thirty, forty, and even fifty per cent, and the paper duty, therefore, is no light matter to them. Again, my right hon. Friend seems to forget that there is another great use of paper, which is this—that it is a most important raw material of your manufactures, in the sense of its being a necessary accessory of your export trade. Of the £1,200,000 which the paper duty yields, a very considerable proportion is nothing more nor less than a charge upon the export of manufactured goods. The quantity of paper used for packing manufactured goods is so large as to form a large portion of the whole supply. But that is not the whole case with respect to the paper duty. I am sure my right hon. Friend has taken no pains—otherwise, with his sagacity, he would have arrived at a different result—to examine into the real condition of the paper trade. It is perfectly true that as regards the known, usual, and ordinary qualities of paper the duty is easily levied; but the great facts of the case lie beyond the bounds of that proposition. We are really dealing with an almost unlimited mass of raw material which is applicable, not only to the known uses of paper, but to an almost unbounded diversity of uses, but which is arrested on its way to those uses by the operation of your Excise duty. That is a view of the case which my right hon. Friend has never had before him at all, but it is one which Her Majesty's Government took into consideration when they came to the conclusion that by repealing the paper duty you would be removing not simply a duty levied at a certain stage upon certain goods, but that which operates with the power and effect of a prohibition upon a number of trades that, but for its existence, would spring up and flourish. I hold in my hand a material which is as rigid as corrugated iron. It weighs about a fourth of what the same bulk of corrugated iron would weigh. It costs a very small fraction of what corrugated iron would cost. It is entirely unflammable. It is not in any degree acted upon by temperature; it is made entirely impervious to moisture by a coating of pitch. It is a sheet of corrugated paper made for the roofing of houses, and I venture to tell my right hon. Friend that if we had been in possession of this material in the winter of 1854, when shelter was wanted for our troops in the Crimea, and when the best expedient we could devise was to send out thousands upon thousands of tents and wooden huts, which, when they arrived at Balaklava, could not, on account of their weight, be taken up to the camp, we might have saved not only a vast amount of treasure, but many thousand valuable lives. The inventor of this article writes to me that he invented it nearly four years ago; that he took out a patent for it, and that the material is admirably adapted for emigrants' houses and military huts, but that in consequence of the existing excise regulations he is unable to manufacture it. He adds that, if those regulations are removed, there are hundreds of thousands of tons of raw material, now considered perfectly useless, which can be employed in the manufacture of corrugated paper.

If it were earlier I should enter more at large into this part of the subject, but I must pass by many interesting questions connected with the operation of the paper duty, especially with respect to the enormous scope there is in so many directions, not for the mere relief of existing manufacturers from the burden they now bear, but for the removal of what operates as a positive prohibition to the creation of a multitude of new trades, which you might as well prohibit by your law as prohibit by excise regulations. I hope I have shown more clearly why it is the Government have thought they acted wisely in proposing the repeal of the paper duty in preference to the repeal of the duty on tea or sugar. It is because we felt that in all likelihood through the repeal of the paper duty you may call into existence twice or thrice as much trade as you would call into existence by a corresponding sacrifice in the shape of a reduction of the tea or sugar duty. My right hon. Friend says we know nothing about the principles of Sir Robert Peel. He has got exclusive knowledge of them. Sir Robert Peel's grand principle, it seems, was to reduce duties, but not to abolish them. My right hon. Friend, before he undertook to instruct us in the policy and principles of Sir Robert Peel, ought at least to have made himself acquainted with the subject. Who abolished the duties on exports? Who abolished the duty on wool? Who abolished the duty on cotton? Who abolished the duty on glass? It was Sir Robert Peel; and I do not hesitate to say that taking the paper duty question, not in the state in which it was ten years ago, when much less was known, but in the state in which it now is, there is a far stronger case for repeal than there ever was for the repeal of the duty on glass, the duty on soap, or any of those excise duties which we have abolished within the last quarter of a century. It is true that the paper duty is an increasing duty, which, prima facie, is a presumption that it is not one of those which have the greatest claim for repeal. But the duty was an increasing duty at the time this House condemned it, when my right hon. Friend joined in the condemnation, and when he said the duty ought to be abolished as soon as possible. Here has now come a year in which £2,000,000 of annuities are falling in, when there is some claim for the revision of indirect taxation arising out of the state of the tea and sugar duties, and when

£1,400,000 of casual receipts are going to be applied to the expenditure of the year. When could we find a better opportunity for redeeming the pledge given by the House, that the duty on an article of such universal use should be repealed. The other policy simply means that you will take whatever you can and throw it into the gulf of expenditure, and that, while compelled to maintain a high income tax, you will depart from the principle upon which renewals of the income tax have hitherto been proposed, namely, that of associating the income tax with a further prosecution of reforms in your commercial law. My hon. Friend brought forward his Motion in a manner to connect as far as he could the question of income tax with the question of the paper duty. He has done it without any notice, which I much regret. It is only a few days ago that the Government were accused by the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) who sits below him of a desire to stifle discussion because the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Byng) only gave two or three days' notice of an important Motion. I will not retort that charge. I am sure my hon. Friend had no such intention. All I regret is that the Motion, as it stands, is untrue. It states as an undoubted truth that which is not only disputable, but the exact reverse of the truth, and it tends to mix up together questions which ought to be kept quite distinct. I will notice, first, what my hon. Friend said, that the paper duty is an increasing duty. Why is it an increasing duty? For this reason, that paper is in most cases an accessory, and, being only an accessory, it is subject to causes which act powerfully on things which are accessories. Not long ago we surrendered large revenues from advertisement duties and newspaper stamps. That gave a great impetus to newspapers, but the increased demand for newspapers is no proof that the paper duty is a good duty. We have set free, generally speaking, the whole commerce of the country. You cannot export manufactured goods without paper to wrap them up. Your exports have nearly trebled. How is it possible that the paper duty should not increase? Supposing you were to lay a heavy tax on mustard, that would not materially check the consumption of roast beef, and paper is in much the same relation to exported articles as mustard is to roast beef. I say that you can draw no argument from the increase of the paper duty in favour of the duty. The duty is burdensome in varying degrees, but on the whole it presses heavily, and by far the most heavily on common descriptions of paper, which, whether in literature, furnishing, or the wrapping of commodities, are used by the lower classes. Perhaps the House will permit me to observe to them the very singular state of things generated by the paper duty. In the book trade and the production of books, the effect is the creation of one chain of monopolies. The whole way, from the maker of paper to the reader of books is occupied by a succession of monopolies. I speak of monopolies not offensively, but as bad and exclusive trade which is the result of bad laws. In the first place the publisher cannot deal with the paper-maker. He must deal with the wholesale stationer. The stationers stand, as a body, between the paper-makers and all who use paper, and they have a complete monopoly of the market. Next to them come the publishers, and we know that, notwithstanding the cheapness of all other manufactured goods, for the best class of books this country is still the dearest in the world. France with her protective system and many disadvantages, produces books of the same value at a half or at a third less than we do. Take the railway library of England and compare it with the railway library of France. It is most unworthy of England, who prides herself on pre-eminence in manufacture. The monopoly of the publishers is so rigid that only a few years ago the general body refused to supply books to any retail bookseller unless he would covenant not to take off more than a certain amount of discount in selling to the public. But that is not all. Besides the publishers' and stationers', there is the printers' monopoly—the printers' combination, of the most formidable kind, which proceeds on the proposition, as first and foremost, that no woman shall be employed in printing. Perhaps some hon. Gentleman, on hearing that, may be inclined to laugh, but I believe, on consideration, it will be obvious enough—or, at least, probable—that women are admirably adapted for that particular trade, because they are endowed with a niceness and a smallness of finger which handles types far preferably to that of a man. Notwithstanding this, women are absolutely excluded from the trade by the printers' combination. The result of the paper duty is that, beginning by restraining the trades which can be carried on, it ends in producing a group and cluster of monopolies at every point in the progress of the trade between the making of the paper and the selling of a book. But the great reason of all against the duty is undoubtedly the enormous expansion of trade which appears to be prevented by its operation. And here I come to a reason which was made very light of to-night, and handled in a manner which I could not listen to without pain. My hon. Friend referred to the report recently made by the Board of Inland Revenue. I only wish that those who followed him in the debate had followed his example in the tone in which he alluded to that Report. He most properly, with that feeling which always distinguishes him, and has made him the object of universal respect, criticised the proceedings of the Government and my proceedings in producing that Report, but he cast no aspersions on the able, independent, and honourable men who conduct the Board of Inland Revenue, that vast department, with its vast public interests, officered, as it is, in a manner which makes it a credit to the country. But the noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil) who followed was not so generous, for he rose and said it was a Report made to order. Sir, he had no right to cast that slur. I cheered the noble Lord at the time, and I did so as a warning of the ground on which he was treading. It is an abuse of the privileges of a Member of Parliament to use language concerning men employed in the public service whose feelings are as acute and whose honour is as high as ours, and to allow it to go forth that they are capable, in contradiction of their deliberately expressed opinion, of sending us Reports to order. I hope the noble Lord is sorry for having used that expression. At any rate, I am persuaded he did not see its force when he employed it. This is no Report made to order. My hon. Friend the Member for Somerset said we had improperly produced the Report, and he hoped we should never do such a thing again. Certainly, if fault has been committed by the Government, it is impossible to let us off more easily. But my hon. Friend was guilty of that error in reasoning which may be called, to use an agricultural simile, putting the cart before the horse, for he said the Chancellor of the Exchequer formed his opinion that the paper duty should be abolished, and having done that he brings out the Inland Revenue and requires them to support his opinion. He puts the cart before the horse. It was the Board of Inland Revenue who formed this opinion first, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government in coming to that opinion were mainly influenced by the opinion of the Board of Inland Revenue. And surely my hon. Friend will not tell me that if that was the case we were wrong in acquainting the House that those who are responsible for the protection of the revenue had given us fair notice that the revenue from paper, from causes beyond their control, was rapidly approaching an end. It would be a breach of duty if they shrank from informing the Government, and a suppression of truth on our part if we shrank from stating it to the House. This House thought proper to pass a vote promising the repeal of the paper duty in 1858. In 1858 the difficulties were not found insurmountable, nor even very serious. They were increasing, but were not very serious; but since the vote of the House proceedings have taken place which have reduced the Board of Inland Revenue almost to despair. Does my hon. Friend consider what will be the effect of carrying his Motion? There must be a new set of laws for enforcing this excise, with a new set of restrictions on trade and a new set of penalties to enforce them. All this must be done to enforce a duty which has been condemned two years ago by the unanimous vote of the House of Commons; and I want to know of my hon. Friend whether, as a practical and sensible man, he thinks it very likely any Government can be found to propose to carry such laws through the House of Commons. I will not pretend to say what is possible or impossible, but that is a task most undesirable to undertake. The case of the paper duty and of the sugar duty is one which had to be decided on practical considerations. I am very sorry to see that my hon. Friend gave no weight to the argument that the repeal of the paper duty bears directly on rural labour and the disposal of rural commodities. Those are two branches. If I take the disposal of rural commodities, I understand there is a highly hon. Person, much given to the cause of protection even now in its decline, who has lately taken an active part in establishing a society for promoting the growth of flax, when the duty is taken off, on the ground that, although the production of flax, when grown for the linen manufacture alone, will not pay, yet if the refuse fibre can be applied to paper manufacture flax will become a profitable crop. With regard to rural labour, my hon. Friend will feel that his argument is a very weak one when he said, "For Heaven's sake do not bring mills into my neighbourhood. It is extremely well adapted for them, but they are the last things I wish to see, because even now there is hardly labour enough to get in the harvest." That is a very good argument for my hon. Friend, but for the labourers in his neighbourhood it is the worst in the world, because it shows that my hon. Friend has to pay dear for getting in his harvest, and that if paper mills came into his neighbourhood he would have to pay dearer still. I am sure that he will willingly do so for the good of his country; but, however that might be, the Government are bound to make a proposition which would give an increased impetus to the labour of the country, and, above all, to the rural labour. The best object that attention could be directed to was, in parts of the country where wages were low to endeavour to multiply the means of employment. Without saying a word more on the paper duty, I will beg the attention of the House to the fact that we have got to dispose of two very different questions. My hon. Friend wants to dispose of the repeal of the paper duty, and also wants the House to vote at the same moment that there should be no further remission of indirect taxation. Those two things are combined in his mind, but they are not so combined in the mind of the Government, and I think I shall be able to show that they ought not to be so combined in the mind of the House. This question, whether we should stop in the course of the remission of indirect taxation, is not altogether a new one; but what was the announcement with which the financial statement was introduced to the House? It was

£2,000,000 of indirect taxation ought to be repealed. I may say with truth, that that was understood by the House and the country to be the principal announcement contained in the financial plan of the year. The matter, however, did not rest there, for the hon. Member for Essex (Mr. Du Cane) made a Motion condemning the remission of indirect taxation at the present time, and that Motion was rejected by a large majority. I ask, then, whether the country did not understand by the rejection of that Motion that the House accepted the principle that £2,000,000 of indirect taxation were to be repealed. That is our belief, and that is the belief on which we propose to act. I do not think my hon. Friend the Member for Somersetshire will succeed in his Motion; but if he does, our first duty would be to remind the House of the claims so eloquently put forward to-night by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) in favour of the remission of indirect taxation, and to invite it to take it into consideration with the view to reduction of the war duty on sugar. Besides this there are the claims of the holders of the Exchequer bonds to be paid off. It is not therefore a question between the acceptance or the repeal of the paper duty on the one hand and an escape from the tenpenny income tax on the other. I do not see how you can escape from that tenpenny income tax, because if you do not accept of the repeal of the paper duty we should take the earliest opportunity—within a few days probably—of inviting the House to repeal the war tea and sugar duties. But as the tea duty is unfavourably circumstanced at present, in consequence of our relations with China, I should probably invite them to repeal the sugar duty. And, let me ask, what security will you have for your revenue if you do that? We should have given away the sugar duty, which at all events is a perfectly intelligible and tenable duty, and one which the people are content to pay as long as they are satisfied that it is required for the public service. But if we give up the sugar duty, which we can keep this year, the next year we should be asked to give the paper duties, in accordance with the expressed Resolution of the House and the opinions of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. That, I apprehend, would not be a profitable or safe course to adopt. It is better, in my opinion, to adopt the course we now propose—a course which will stimulate the trade of the country and obviate the inextricable difficulties of levying the paper duty. The question, then, which we have to consider really is, not whether £1,000,000 of indirect taxation shall be repealed, but simply in what manner it shall be repealed? That is the principle on which we shall act. I believe that the House will adopt the proposal of the Government, and I have the more assurance of that from the fact that I have not been able to understand from the speakers on the other side what duties they would propose to repeal. My hon. Friend the Member for Somersetshire did not quite see the inconvenience of introducing the income tax as he introduced it in this debate. He founded his appeal on its hardship as applied to the lowest class of payers of income tax; but it is not a question as to them; no one proposes to add a penny to their income tax—the addition to it is, as far as they are concerned, only a halfpenny; but let me remind the House that the question as to what exemption from income tax shall be allowed still remains to be dealt with. The hon. Member for Lancashire has given notice of a Motion for the partial exemption of all incomes up to £500. I do not think that such a change will be adopted by the House, because it would be beyond precedent, and not only inconvenient but dangerous. But the question what amount of exemption shall be given to persons of very small means is a question entirely open, and with respect to which latitude may be allowed to the House in perfect conformity with precedent derived from the history of the income tax in former years; but let me ask my hon. Friend if it is a fair test of the income tax to take only its incidence on the very lowest class who pay it? The income tax is a grievous tax in its incidence to that body of persons, and for my own part I should neither be astonished nor should I complain if the House were disposed to increase the partial remission which it makes on their behalf now or at some future time. It is impossible to deny that it is a grievous tax as it affects persons of small incomes, and especially of small fixed incomes. I have heard it said that I have given a full account of all the vices of the income tax. I have described them, and my opinion remains now very much what it was before upon that subject. I think the vices of the income tax are many, great, and manifold; but I said that why you retain it, in my opinion, was because it was essential to assist in giving those great benefits to the people which alone made it endurable, and caused it to be endured. It has many vices, but it has one great virtue, which is this—that in the main, without any injustice in its general scope, without any of those idle dreams of plunder and confiscation which we have heard to-night, it does make the property of the country subservient to the uses of the State within limits which are safe and for purposes which are beneficial. The income tax, as administered, has no tendency to unsettle the foundations of property. What it might be in the hands of those who seek to give it a more speculative perfection I will not undertake to say. The position of the Government, then, with respect to the paper duties is this: We think it part of our public duty, part of the pledge we gave to the country which has given such a general and warm support to our financial measures, that we should redeem the pledge which we gave a month ago—namely, that under the existing circumstances of the present year, we should ask for such a repeal of indirect taxation as should not exceed two millions of money. We desire the House to exercise an impartial judgment on the question—what is the best mode of applying that sum; but for all the reasons I have stated, we submit that the wisest and most prudent choice we can make is to determine to repeal the paper duty, and to give freedom to a great branch of industry, which we have great reason to hope will develop itself in a thousand directions, and add to the demand for labour, and through the demand for labour to the prosperity of the country, in a degree out of all proportion to even the considerable amount of revenue which the duty now represents.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I hope even at this late hour I may appeal to the House for a very few moments to listen to one of that small and enraptured body to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded, and of which I avow myself to be one. I understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to insinuate, and the President of the Board of Trade more distinctly to affirm, that the House had entered into some engagement upon the falling in of the Long Annuities to apply that amount to the repeal of the indirect taxation of the country. I utterly deny that any such understanding or engagement was ever come to by this House. On the contrary, if there was any understanding more clear than another, it was that that amount was to be applied to the reduction of the income tax. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was a party to that arrangement, and in my opinion there never was a Minister more pledged to any point of policy than the right hon. Gentleman to the repeal of the income tax in the present year. I implore the House not to proceed to a division without considering the condition of that class to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has just adverted, but for which his Budget does nothing, or worse than nothing—I mean the working classes of the country, and the holders of small fixed incomes. The Budget deals liberally with the holders of coals and iron, with the large manufacturers of Lancashire, with the rich generally in reducing the duty on the wine they drink; but what does it do for the working classes? It maintains a high duty on tea and sugar, and on the holders of small incomes, it inflicts the grievous hardship of increasing the income tax. I should like further to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the amount of duty we are now going to abandon. The right hon. Gentleman has not been quite candid in the matter. He has more than once spoken of the receipts from the paper duty as about £1,000,000; but I believe that in 1861 it will amount to £2,000,000, the repeal, of course, not commencing till July. The repeal will be permanent, and therefore we ought to deal with the gross amount of the duty. Last year it yielded nearly £1,300,000, and there is a rumour that in the current year that ends at the close of this month it will be about £1,500,000. I want to know whether that is true or not; and if not, whether there is any advance on the £1,300,000 of last year? That is a most important question when we are about to abandon so large an amount of revenue in the face of a deficit of £9,000,000, and under the necessity of imposing an increased income tax on the country. Most of us on both sides of the House were supporters of the Resolution of 1858, and we are not disposed to recede from that Resolution; but the question we have now to decide is, not whether the paper duty shall come off, but whether this is the proper moment for abandoning it. As to the corrugated paper which the right hon. Gentleman produced, I may remind him that the soldiers in the Crimea had a preparation of felt which was quite as light and valuable. The ground upon which we are going to divide is not that the duty is a good impost, but that the Budget bears hardly on the poor and industrious classes. Is there any man in this House who believes that Mr. Pitt or Sir Robert Peel would have sacrificed £1,500,000 of revenue in the face of a deficit of £9,000,000. At this moment it is unwise and improvident to make such a sacrifice, and I shall oppose it by giving my support to the Motion of my hon. Friend.

Sir John Pakington

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the right hon. Baronet had asked him to explain his reference to the amount of revenue to be lost by the repeal of the paper duty. He had not stated the details that night, but on the first night, when he made his financial statement, he spoke of a million, because that was precisely the sum which he found, by the estimates of the Board of Inland Revenue, would be lost by the repeal of the duty during the next financial year, supposing that repeal to take place on the 1st of July; of course, if the repeal were postponed, it would be somewhat less; but the further amount which would take place in the next financial year would be £230,000 more, in addition to the £1,000,000, making for the next financial year, according to the estimates with which he had been furnished, £1,230,000. Against that, there were three direct sets-off to be made—one being for the savings in the Inland Revenue establishments, a second for the savings on the whole of the paper used for Government purposes and in the Government establishments, and the third being the saving by the abolition of the impressed stamp and by the changes in the regulations, the amount of which would be altogether, he supposed, £100,000 or £150,000 a year. He knew nothing whatever of the rumour which the right hon. Gentleman had mentioned about the million and a half.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, March 13, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILL—1^o Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday.

2^o Benefit Societies Rules Amendment; Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland); Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts).
3^o Administering of Poison.

SELLING AND HAWKING GOODS ON SUNDAY BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. READ 1^o.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that their Lordships would recollect that he had a few evenings before presented a petition signed by no less than 20,000 tradesmen engaged in business in various parts of the metropolis, praying that there might be an amendment in the law as regarded Sunday trading; and that on a previous evening he had presented a petition from Bermondsey to the same effect. In pursuance of a pledge which he gave to their Lordships on that occasion he now asked leave to introduce a Bill on the subject. He would briefly explain to their Lordships the extent to which he proposed to legislate on the matter. He would do so in as clear terms as possible, because he believed that previous Bills which proposed to deal with Sunday trading had failed in consequence of their not having been properly understood. It was no wonder that the consideration of Parliament should have been engaged by this subject. When they considered the enormous extent of the evil to be remedied, the generally pernicious consequences that resulted from it, and the numbers of persons who would be relieved by any change in the law, and who were most anxious for such change, he ventured to think that it might be deemed a matter of reproach that all their previous attempts at legislation of this character had been entire failures. Select Committees had been appointed to investigate this subject in 1832, in 1847, and in 1850; and the results of the labours of those Committees were contained in three or four large volumes; but the extent to which the evidence went was of such magnitude as almost to deter any one from perusing it, however anxious he might be to inform himself on the question. After the Report of the Committee of 1847 a Bill on the subject was introduced in the other House, and in 1850 their Lordships' attention was directed to the subject by a Bill introduced by a noble Friend of his (the Earl of Harrowby), and that measure, after having passed through their Lordships' House, was sent down to the House of Commons, but unfortunately at too late a period of the Session for it to be passed. In 1852 his noble Friend Lord Ebury, at that time Lord Robert Grosvenor, introduced in the House of Commons a Bill very much, though not entirely, to the same effect as that which he (Lord Chelmsford) now asked their Lordships' permission to read a first time. That Bill of his noble Friend was almost unanimously approved of by the House of Commons; was read a second time, and several of its clauses were passed. But it unfortunately happened that in the previous Session an Act for limiting the hours during which public-houses should be kept open had been passed. That measure had excited a good deal of dissatisfaction, and it was supposed that the Bill of his noble Friend was intended to impose further restraints; agitation was consequently excited, a great deal of misrepresentation took place; and ultimately the Bill was abandoned. The difficulty of passing any moderate Bill on the subject had been very much increased by injudicious attempts at legislation on both sides. On the one side, Bills had been introduced to enforce a better observance of the Sabbath—Bills which, from their nature, were calculated to affect only the lower classes, and which certainly were open to the objection that it was sought to render people religious by Act of Parliament. On the other hand, proposals had from time to time been made for the opening of the British Museum and other such places on Sunday, which attempts had induced many religious and conscientious persons to evince hostility to any relaxation in the matter of Sabbath observance. He did not sympathize with either view. He should regret any legislative interference with the poor man's

Sunday, which should convert a day of rest and cheerfulness into one of irksomeness and gloom; and on the other, he thought it was not desirable that the Legislature should set the example of countenancing the opening of places of public resort on Sunday, if for no other reason, because the precedent would be likely to be extended in every direction, and Sunday would become a day of licence and riot. What he desired by his Bill was to give persons, who really had a sense of duty and religious obligation, an opportunity of paying to the Sabbath that observance which all must desire, but which they were now prevented from doing in consequence of the system of Sunday trading which prevailed, and prevailed to an enormous extent, in all the populous suburbs of the metropolis. Their Lordships could not have the least idea of the extent of this Sunday trading. The neighbourhoods in which it was carried on were crowded as though so many fairs were being held; not only articles of a perishable and necessary character, but other articles, which might be purchased any day in the week, were exposed for sale, and a most brisk and stirring trade went on. Many shopkeepers who objected to Sunday trading were obliged to open their shops in self-defence, as the petitions laid on the table satisfactorily proved, and the consequence was that the observance of the Sunday was entirely neglected. A gentleman who had written a letter to The Times on the subject, described in very forcible language the hindrance which this Sunday trading was to the efforts of those who were endeavouring to bring about a better observance of the Sabbath among the poorer classes. The shopkeepers, he said, cried out against it, and the very publicans strongly condemned a system which deprived them of a day of rest; but they were obliged to keep their shops open, unless they were prepared to give up the principal profits of their business, as their sales were larger on that day. He need not picture to their Lordships what must be the inevitable effect of this system in depriving the people of the enjoyment of the blessings of the Sabbath. As for the children of these people, they must of course be brought up in habits of neglect of the religious observance of the Lord's Day. As it at present stood the law was entirely powerless to redress the evil. The Act which was in force on the subject was the 29th Charles II., which was partly positive and partly negative. The positive part was directed to compelling a due observance of the Sabbath. It directed that all persons on every Sunday "should apply themselves to the observance of the same, and the exercise of the duties of piety and true religion." And it provided that any person exposing for sale any article on that day should be liable to a fine of 5s. From the construction put upon this Act it had become a perfect dead letter. It had been held that the mere opening of a shop, was not an exposure for sale sufficient for the purposes of the Act, there must be an actual sale; and the magistrates thought that they could only issue their warrant of distress against the particular article sold. Of course the attempt to follow it would be fruitless. Then the penalty of 5s. could only be imposed once for one day, no matter how many the articles sold. Looking at the profit derived from this Sunday trading, it was easy to conceive that a penalty of 5s. for an entire day would be utterly ineffectual for its suppression. Indeed, he understood that some of those Sunday traders had jeered the authorities and offered to pay six months' fines in advance. To a very great extent the evil had been promoted by the practice, which was almost general, of paying workmen's wages on Saturday night, the consequence of which was that the working people were unable to procure on Saturday the necessaries which they required, and were driven to make their little purchases on Sunday morning. He was happy to say that there had, within a recent period, been a great improvement in that respect. An example was being set which might ultimately lead to what was most earnestly to be desired, which was that Saturday should become the labouring man's market day. An excellent example was set in the Royal establishments, in the whole of which, with one exception, the wages were paid on Friday. In that one they were paid early on Saturday. The efforts of the Early Closing Association were likely to effect much good in this direction; but much still remained to be done in order to put an end to the Sunday traffic. The Bill he now presented to their Lordships was intended to forbid the sale, within the City of London and the Metropolitan Police District, of any wares or merchandise whatever on Sunday; but as to meat, fish, or poultry, the dealer might deliver it before nine o'clock on Sunday morning. The penalty for each breach of the law was to be not exceeding 20s., nor less than 5s. It was not a Bill of coercion, but of protection. It was not a Bill of restraint, but of liberty. It was for the protection and advantage of those who were compelled by the hard necessity of the existing system to carry on trade on Sunday, and all he feared was that it would be objected that he had conceded too much in that direction. He believed that the Bill, if passed, would confer the greatest benefit upon society, and put a stop to that wholesale traffic on the Lord's-day which had caused so much scandal and dissatisfaction.

Bill to amend the Laws relating to the Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday within the Metropolitan Police District and City of London and Liberties thereof, presented, and read 1^a.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, March 13, 1860.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Worcester City, Richard Padmore, esquire.

THE TREATY WITH FRANCE.

QUESTION.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, perhaps he might be allowed to call the attention of the House, by way of explanation, to the fact that during the discussion of the Committee on Customs, a question was raised as to the interpretation of Article 5 in the Treaty with France, which expressed the obligation which Her Majesty incurred towards the Emperor of the French, with the consent of Parliament. The question was almost explanatory by itself; and he did not think that he could deal more fairly with the hon. and learned Attorney General than by asking it precisely in the terms in which it stood on the Paper. The Attorney General would remember that a somewhat protracted discussion [cries of "Order, order!"].

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman has not asked his Question.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, he would then beg to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether Article 5 of the Treaty with France applies to goods imported from France only, or from all countries; and whether to French produce only, or to the produce of all countries?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was no doubt the intention of Her Majesty's Government, as one of the contracting parties to the Treaty, that productions of all descriptions mentioned in the 5th Article should be admitted into our ports, as otherwise there would be a differential duty in favour of French produce. So far as the rights of France as the other contracting party were concerned, he was of opinion that she could require the admission of those productions only when brought from France proper or Algeria—that was to say, that so far as the contract involved in the Treaty was capable of being enforced by France, she could only demand that it should be carried out to the extent of goods imported from France itself or from Algeria. The effect of the Resolution of the House, he thought, would be to admit the productions of all countries coming within the description contained in the Article.

INDIA.—STATE OF DHAR.

QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY said, the House would perhaps recollect that one of the last acts of the Court of Directors was to send out to India a Despatch disallowing the annexation of the State of Dhar, and desiring that it might be restored to the Native Owners. No reply having been received to that communication, like directions were again sent out in April, and that communication remained unanswered up to the time of his leaving office. He understood that some steps had since been taken in the matter; and he wished to know what they were. In the words of his notice, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India what steps have been taken by Lord Canning for the restoration of the State of Dhar to its Native Rulers?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the noble Lord was quite right in stating that during the period of his continuance in office no answer had been received to the communication to which he referred. Late in the autumn, however, a Despatch had reached the India Office from Lord Canning, in which he justified the course he had pursued in reference to the annexation, and pointed out the future steps which he recommended to be taken. Having considered the subject fully, Her Majesty's Government had determined to adhere in the main to the advice which was contained in the Despatch which the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) had addressed to the Government of India, and Lord Canning had accordingly been directed to retain possession of the State of Dhar only until the heir to it should come of age, when he was to be restored to the territory which belonged to him. The only exception which had been made in the case was that of an outlying district which we had administered for many years, and which had paid to the Native Ruler a much larger sum than that which we had received from it. It had been deemed to be only right that when we were taxing our own loyal subjects in India for the expenses of the war some contribution should be made by those whose misconduct had entailed that expense. Her Majesty's Government had therefore directed that the payment on account of the outlying district to which he referred should no longer be made to the Chief of Dhar, by which the revenues of India would be saved from a charge of between £2,000 and £3,000 per annum.

THE "ACCRINGTON" TRANSPORT.

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has received from our Consul at Pernambuco any account that can be laid before the House of the lamentable occurrences which have taken place on board the Accrington transport ship; and if he can state the total number of deaths, according to the latest advices, among the women and children who were embarked in that unfortunate vessel?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that a long report had been received from our Consul at Pernambuco giving an account of the lamentable occurrences which had taken place on board the Accrington. The papers on the subject had been sent to the Home Office for the purposes of the prosecution which was about to be instituted in the matter, but he did not know that there was any objection to their being laid on the Table of the House if such a course should be deemed expedient. With respect to the number of deaths which had taken place on board the Accrington, he might state that he had ascertained that sixty-seven persons had died on the passage out, sixty of whom were children of three years of age and under, and one an adult. It appeared, also, that after the passengers had landed, twenty persons more had died, of whom six were adults and nine children of three years of age and under. The causes of the deaths which had taken place on the voyage were, he believed, mainly measles and scarlatina.

WAKEFIELD COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MAJOR EDWARDS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether there is any objection to lay before the House a Return of the expenses of the late Commission appointed to inquire into Corrupt Practices in the Borough of Wakefield, including the amount paid to Mr. Dew, one of the Committee Clerks of this House, for acting as Secretary; the amount paid for information; and the names of the agents employed and paid by order of the Commissioners?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, a Return had been already moved for in reference to the expenses of the Commissioners for both Wakefield and Gloucester, which, if not already laid on the Table of the House, would be presented in the course of that evening. That Return would, he believed, be found to contain all the information which the hon. and gallant Gentleman required. With respect to the amount which had been paid to Mr. Dew, he might state that that gentleman had received at the rate of three guineas per diem, which was the rate fixed by a Treasury Minute in reference to the Secretaries of such Commissions. No sum whatever had, he might add, been paid to agents, nor had any agents been employed by order of the Commissioners.

CAVALRY CHARGERS.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, under the operation of the his Royal Highness the ding-in-Chief, with the cretary of State for War, rd day of February last, Officers below the rank are enabled to obtain a the remount or other ffective strength of the be the duty of the In- of Cavalry to pass such horses, as fulfilling the obligation of Officers to provide themselves with Chargers adequate to the Service; or whether the Inspecting Generals are to continue to estimate the efficiency of Officers' chargers by the same standard of excellence as has been the usage under the former system, by which Officers had to provide themselves with horses of a much more expensive description, on their own responsibility?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that of course care would be taken that in the selection of the horses the best would be provided for the Officers and Troops. His Royal Highness the General Commanding-in-Chief would make such regulations so that the object of the general order should not be defeated.

BRITISH SHIPPING.—QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL said, he rose to ask the First Lord of the Treasury on what day Her Majesty's Government, in accordance with a pledge recently given to that effect, propose to afford to this House an opportunity of fully considering the present condition of British Shipping, in so far as the same is affected by the operation of certain provisions of the French Navigation Laws; and what course Her Majesty's Government are prepared to recommend this House to adopt in order to induce the Government of France to make such alterations or modifications in those Laws as may be thought just and necessary?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the hon. Gentleman and the House will no doubt recollect that I appealed to my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), to separate from the Address on the Treaty that addition which he was originally desirous to make to it with respect to the navigation arrangements subsisting between this country and France. I, upon the occasion on which that appeal was made, informed the hon. Gentleman that if he were to make his proposal on the point, the subject of a substantive Motion—the terms of it being agreed upon between him and Her Majesty's Government—I should be disposed to support such a Resolution, and that in point of fact such a course would be likely to strengthen Her Majesty's Government in any negotiations on the matter into which they might enter with France. Of course, the hon. Member for Sunderland will take his own course, but Her Ma-

Her Majesty's Government are disposed to give him every facility for bringing forward the subject consistent with the progress of the public business.

THE AFFAIRS OF ITALY.

CORRESPONDENCE PRESENTED.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL, having brought up further Correspondence relating to the affairs of Italy, said:—Mr. Speaker, in moving that these papers do lie on the table, I wish to answer the inquiry which was made yesterday by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire. The right hon. Gentleman, as I understood, complained that during the debate on the Commercial Treaty, I did not answer various questions which he had put—questions relating to the conduct of foreign affairs by Her Majesty's Ministers. I did not deem it at all advisable to enter upon the conduct of foreign affairs during the discussion of the Commercial Treaty, or to prevent the progress of that debate, which was properly directed to the merits of that Treaty; but, although I did not take part in that debate, and although I cannot refer regularly to what took place in a former debate, I have no objection to answer the charges which are made the subject of complaint against us. And, in the first place, I should say that I should be very sorry if I were thought to have misrepresented the conduct of the Earl of Malmesbury, as I understood was stated by the noble Lord opposite, the Member for Leicestershire (Lord J. Manners). I said, that so far as I could make out, that the Earl of Malmesbury had not obtained any very satisfactory assurance on the subject of Savoy from the French Government. Now, it is of some importance to see in what state the question was left when the present Government came into office. I find on the first page of the correspondence regarding Savoy and Nice in Captain Harris's despatch that he says:—

"I pointed out to the President the despatches Nos. 480 and 507 in the blue-book on the Affairs of Italy, showing the steps which Her Majesty's Government had taken, through Lord Cowley, to ascertain the truth of this report, which had, however, not led to a very distinct refutation of it on the part of the French Minister."

Now, I do not think that Captain Harris is a person likely to view unfavourably the conduct of the Earl of Malmesbury, and if he had thought that the Earl of Malmesbury had obtained a satisfactory assurance, and a distinct refutation of this report, no doubt he would have said so in the despatch. But, looking to the despatches which are referred to—480 and 507, I find that 480 is a despatch from the Earl of Malmesbury to Earl Cowley, dated the 30th of April, 1859, in which he says:—

"I have received this afternoon an account of a treaty which, it is said, was concluded between France and Sardinia on the 18th of January, and which is said to provide for the cession of Savoy, and to certain arrangements for the future government of Italy. Your Excellency will endeavour to ascertain whether any such treaty has been concluded."

Earl Cowley's answer to the Earl of Malmesbury is dated May 1, in which he says:—

"Count Walewski replied that all he could assure me was, that up to this moment there was no treaty whatever between France and Sardinia; but he said that under present circumstances an offensive and defensive one would become necessary. He made no allusion to the territorial question."

Now, if that was understood by the noble Lord as a satisfactory answer on the subject of Savoy, all I can say is, that it appears to me, on the other hand, that it certainly left room for further inquiry. It stated that up to that moment there was no treaty, but it gave no assurance whatever that there was not an understanding between the two Governments, and that Savoy was not to be ceded in the event of certain conquests or arrangements being made. Well, then, it was in that state of affairs that Her Majesty's present Government came into office and found this question. I think the first of the accusations brought against us is to this effect, that the Government have pursued a policy of promoting the annexation of Tuscany and Romagna to Sardinia, and that thereby they have been laying the ground for that annexation of Savoy to France which it ought to have been their business to prevent. I think this accusation founded on an entire misapprehension of the policy which the Government have pursued. The policy of the Government was not a policy which required the annexation of Tuscany and Romagna to Sardinia, or required them to be a separate government. Their policy was to endeavour, by negotiation and representing their views to the different Governments of Europe to secure to the Italian people a power of managing their own affairs. Now, that object, which is in fact the independence of Italy, was to be accompanied, if possible, by such an arrangement as would be recognized as the de facto Government by the various Powers of Europe, and especially by France. Well, Sir, I had a message from Count Walewski, through Earl Cowley, that he hoped I would endeavour to persuade the Tuscan official agent, when he came here after the war, to induce the Provisional Government of Tuscany to be content with the recall of the son of the Grand Duke Leopold, with the establishment of a liberal constitution, an Italian Ministry, and the Tuscan colours. I found the agent who came here on behalf of the Government of Tuscany—the Marquis of Lajatico—a person as highminded, of as much integrity, of as much disinterestedness as I ever knew. When he came to speak to me on the subject I represented to him that the son of the Grand Duke was said to be a prince of cultivated mind, of liberal disposition in politics, and that he was likely, if called to be the ruler of Tuscany, to govern that country according to constitutional principles. He told me it was not possible that the Tuscans could receive the son of the Grand Duke. I said, “Why, you yourself were the person who, when called upon by the Grand Duke Leopold to form a Ministry, recommended that the Archduke Ferdinand should succeed and be the Grand Duke of Tuscany.” He said, “That is perfectly true, but his conduct since then has been of a nature to alienate from him entirely the affections of the people. He went to Modena at the time of the battle of Magenta, when it was arranged that if the battle of Magenta should be decided in favour of the Austrians he was to march with a portion of the Austrian army and take possession of Florence and Tuscany in virtue of his command of that Austrian force. Again, at Solferino he accompanied the Emperor of Austria, and he has thus decided to take part with Austria and against Italy, while we are determined to fight the battle of Italy against Austria.” That seemed to me to be a reasonable objection to the restoration of the Archduke Ferdinand. At a later period there was a question of another combination, and I was informed by Earl Cowley that he thought that combination might be one with which the Emperor of the French would be content, and that he would propose it to Austria. On the other hand, it was stated to me by Lord Loftus that it was not possible, if such a proposition were made, that Austria would be content with it. That proposition was to form a kingdom of Central Italy. There is a despatch on the table relating to this subject. But, although I might entertain such a proposition, although I might say that Great Britain would be content with it, it was quite impossible for me to be bound to assent to any proposition with which the people of Italy themselves should not be content. I took means to ascertain what were the opinions of the leading people of Italy in relation to that proposition, and I was informed by those who knew them intimately, both Italians and English, that they would not agree to the formation of a kingdom of Central Italy; in fact, their position was this,—they said it was quite allowable to the Emperor of the French, if he did not wish to carry on the war any further, to make peace at Villafranca, and confirm that peace afterwards at Zurich; but we on our side are bound to consider in what state Italy would have been left if the conquests of the French had proceeded as far as the Adriatic. If the King of Sardinia had agreed with France not only for Lombardy but Venetia, we should have been content that the Grand Duke Ferdinand should be received in Tuscany and that the Pope should hold the Romagna; but in our present position it is obvious that the kingdom of Sardinia, divided from the Romagna and from Tuscany, would be so weak, with the forts on the Mincio constantly frowning on and menacing her, it would be impossible to continue independent. And, therefore, we were of opinion that nothing but the strengthening of Sardinia by the addition of the Romagna, Tuscany, Parma, and Modena, would be sufficient to maintain the independence of Italy. There, again, as Her Majesty's Government have not been hostile to the restoration of the Grand Duke, so likewise they have not been hostile to the formation of a kingdom of Central Italy. But the whole of our conduct was based, not, as has been represented, on such an annexation, but on a wish to allow the people of Central Italy to form their Governments for themselves, and after three centuries of oppression and servitude to assert their independence whether of Austria, of France, or any other Power whatsoever. Therefore, when we found that neither restoration nor a kingdom of Central Italy would be accepted as an arrangement,—when we knew likewise that the Emperor of the French had declared over and over again that no force should be employed to impose a form of Government on the people of Tuscany, we could not but come to the conclusion that if the people of Central Italy were to have their own way—if they were to constitute their Government as pleased themselves, annexation to Sardinia was the plan on which they would certainly act. Accordingly it was our wish, desirous that the independence of Italy should be secured, that they should be allowed, if they thought proper, by a vote or otherwise, to assert again their annexation to Sardinia, and, if the King of Sardinia should accept them, that that country thus enlarged should become one of the recognized Powers of Europe. Well, the next accusation brought against us is that for a long time I was acquainted, by private letters and otherwise, that the intention of the Emperor of the French, if a kingdom of Northern and Central Italy thus strengthened were constituted, to ask for the annexation of Savoy to France, and that I made no objection against that course till the end of January. That accusation rests merely on a confusion of dates, because, if any one consults the papers about the annexation of Savoy, he will find that the strongest objections which I made, pushing them, perhaps, to an extreme, were made on the 5th of July. I stated on the 5th of July what I conceived might be the consequences to the Emperor of the French from a persistence in any plan for the annexation of Savoy, and what distrust such perseverance would occasion. No doubt Count Walewski said to Earl Cowley, and repeated it three or four times, that in the first place the annexation of Tuscany to Sardinia was impossible—that was an arrangement which could never be permitted; and he hinted more than once, as appears from the despatches, that there was a probability, if that plan was persisted in, although the French army might not march into Tuscany, that there would be no opposition made by France to an Austrian army entering that province in order to restore the Archduke. Therefore, in his view of the case no such event was likely to occur. At another time he said, I believe, that a kingdom of Central Italy might possibly be formed; but at no period was he willing to agree to the annexation which the people of Central Italy desired. Thus, it will appear to every one that this question of the annexation of Savoy was in his eyes an improbable contingency, and it certainly seemed to me quite unnecessary to write to Earl Cowley saying, "Supposing the Grand Duke is not restored, supposing no kingdom of Central Italy is formed, supposing the annexation which Count Walewski states is impossible should be accomplished, then I desire you to repeat in November the objections and the protest which you made in July." It appears to me that such a course would not only have been quite unnecessary, but quite absurd. If Earl Cowley had wished for further instructions, he would no doubt by a despatch have asked for them. But we did not think that what might be regarded as mere threats to prevent the people of Italy from going by their own way to their own ends of independence called upon us to write or volunteer despatches. In January again the quest in assumed another shape. We were asked by Switzerland what we intended to do. There appeared in some of the French newspapers articles indicating that the project was again on foot for the annexation of Savoy; and again at the end of January we reiterated, in terms as strong but not stronger than those we used in July, the objections we felt to this annexation, and our fears of the distrust it would create. We have never on this question, in fact, concealed our opinions from the Emperor of the French—we have never left him to believe this was a project that would not meet with objection, but we have stated in a plain and straightforward manner what our objections were. Then we are also blamed because, in making our communications to Vienna, Berlin, and St. Petersburg, with respect to the four propositions, we did not say that if Sardinia annexed Tuscany and the Romagna, in that case the Emperor of the French proposed to annex Savoy. Why, Sir, we could not properly do that, because on the part of France that proposition was never made. The agreement of those different Courts was never asked in any way; and Prince Gortschakoff, on the part of Russia, said, "I am glad to find that I need not make any objections to this proposition because our assent to it was never proposed in any way." It would, therefore, not only have been improper, but absurd for us to say that if this annexation to Sardinia takes place there is a proposition on the part of France which may possibly be brought forward, but which we do not know will be brought forward, and we warn you against it even now. It was for the French Government, if they had a proposition of that kind, to make it to the various Powers, and not for us to suggest it as an objection. What we did was to make the proposal to the French Government that, if the Italian people by a new vote in these provinces should declare in favour of annexation, the King of Sardinia should not be asked to abstain any longer from sending his troops into them. We made that proposition to France; and France knew perfectly well what she intended to do. There was no mistake on her part as to what would be the consequences of her proceedings. These, Sir, are the explanations I have to give as to these various points. But there is another accusation which is an aggravation of all the rest, and my noble Friend who sits near me is liable to the same reproach. It is said that we have been so zealous for the independence of Italy and so intent on carrying out chimerical views of our own with respect to that country that we have neglected other and important objects to secure that end. I confess, Sir, I do not feel that to be a very heavy accusation. I recollect that in 1856 the Earl of Clarendon and Count Walewski at the Paris Conference brought forward the question of Italy. It should be remembered that that was a Conference assembled for a totally different purpose, namely, to settle the terms of peace between Russia on the one side, and France, Great Britain, Sardinia, and Turkey on the other. Italy had no immediate connection with that Conference. Yet the Earl of Clarendon thought the question of such pressing importance, so menacing to the tranquillity of Europe, that he stated his views upon it in that Conference. He pointed out that the continued occupation of Rome and of Bologna by foreign troops was a thing unprecedented, that it destroyed the independence of those countries, threatened revolution, and thereby imperilled the general peace of Europe. He pointed out also the condition of the Government of the Two Sicilies, its maladministration of justice, and asked the Conference—consisting of all the various Powers—to take measures to secure a remedy for that state of affairs. It would have been happy for the Austrian Government had they listened to that warning; but they determined to continue their occupation of Bologna, and to govern Lombardy in the same manner as before. We all know the consequences. We know that after three years the two great Powers which occupied different points in Italy not only broke out into dissensions, but appeared in arms in the field to contend which should be supreme. We know, likewise, that after the conclusion of the peace of Zurich the state of Italy was still threatening. We were informed, as the world generally was informed, that from time to time the Austrians threatened to march against the troops of the King of Sardinia, in which case the French said that they would assist the Sardinians. We could not think that any settlement of Italy which restored by force of arms the power of the Grand Duke of Tuscany or the authority of the Pope could be a lasting one; and we therefore felt that it was an European interest, and as an European it was a British interest to lay, as the preamble of the Treaty of Zurich calls it, "a large and solid basis for the external and internal independence of Italy." It was, therefore, for an European object that we employed the influence of Great Britain. We employed it peacefully; we employed it with a view to reconcile differences, to prevent war, and to lay the foundations of peace between the great Powers of Europe. But, Sir, if, consulting at once the interests of Great Britain and those of Europe, it should have been our fate at the same time to contribute in any way, even in the smallest degree, to the permanent independence of Italy, to the raising up a people who have been long sunk, and enabling men of the most cultivated intellect, and possessed of every gift of knowledge, to exercise their minds free from the prohibitions of a censor,—if we should be enabled again to see that country, which has been for three centuries sunk and degraded, once more taking rank amongst the great Powers of Europe, and the people of Italy, with their great abilities and honest hearts, one of the most distinguished among the families of the world, so far from being ashamed of having contributed to that result, so far from shrinking from any responsibility, I shall, on the contrary, take pride to myself that I have been able, in any degree, to contribute to that result.

MR. WHITESIDE: Sir, I quite agreed with an observation of the noble Viscount at the head of the Government on a previous night, when he said that in discussing this question, we ought to avoid personalities, and endeavour to speak upon it with the gravity and caution which its importance deserves; but I cannot help thinking that he had inadvertently fallen into error, when he said that the House of Commons ought not to raise a discussion on such a subject, except upon a Motion for a Vote of Censure. I have always understood that the noble Viscount was a pupil of that popular and brilliant Minister, Mr. Canning, who, when Prince Metternich pressed him, through the Austrian Ambassador, to prevent the House of Commons from expressing its opinion upon the affairs of Spain, replied that the House of Commons was not a clog upon the Executive Government, but a part of the great council of the nation, sharing the authority of the State; that it was the right of Members of Parliament to participate in the deliberations of that Council, and that no Minister could conduct the Foreign Affairs of this country by throwing dust in the eyes of the House of Commons. The noble Lord, who has just spoken himself, by moving for papers, gave rise to a very instructive debate in Parliament, in the year 1823, on the subject of the intervention of France in the affairs of Spain; but he did not, nor did any person at that time contend, that before you can venture to examine or attempt to understand the conduct of a Ministry, you must propose a vote of censure. There is no such doctrine known to the Constitution, and against it I beg to enter my protest. In discussing the matter before the House, I have not the slightest intention of making any personal attack upon the French Emperor, or of uttering a single word which should be provocative of war; because I quite agree with the noble Lord, who has just sat down, that it should be the object of the Ministry to promote peace. I subscribe as readily as any Gentleman in this House does to the doctrine, that it is not our business to encourage a busy, officious practice of intermeddling in the internal affairs of other States; and for that reason I never was able to understand why our Ambassador was withdrawn from Naples, because the internal Government of that country was not to our mind. I asked an eminent statesman why it was done, and he said that he was as ignorant of the reason as I was myself. But when we come to consider a question touching the public law of Europe, it is a totally different matter; and from what is that public law to be collected? As I understand it, from the public treaties which govern the affairs of Europe, and from those important State Papers, which, formally and deliberately communicated by one State to another, are accepted as the expositions of that law. If public law is not respected where a small State is concerned, it will be violated with impunity by a great and powerful one, and therefore I appeal to those Gentlemen who prefer peace to war, to encourage a fair reference to the principles of that law, which will tend to the repression of aggression upon the territories of foreign States, without in the slightest degree touching the question of their internal administration. There is no subject more interesting than that which we are now discussing; and I have founded that opinion upon the statements of the noble Lord contained in his despatches, that the question concerns the independence of Switzerland, the safety of Italy, the tranquillity of Europe, and the character of the French Emperor. When I found those statements in the despatches of the noble Lord, I was convinced of the importance of the question. I pray the House to observe the conduct of the statesmen of Switzerland. From the first moment the statesmen of Switzerland have never wavered in their opinions, or ceased to give the most decided and unequivocal warnings to the noble Lord representing the Government presided over by the noble Viscount—and here let me say a word about three members of that Government. The mind of the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is locked up in his Budget, the noble Lord the Member for London has spoken occasionally on this subject, but the Prime Minister has held his tongue. He has never, that I can recollect, uttered a single intelligible sentence upon the important question before us. What may be his policy, whether he gathered it from Imperial lips at Compiègne, I cannot say. I have learnt something from the noble Lord, the Member for London, but nothing from the noble Viscount. In the month of July the Swiss Government communicated to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, “We are of opinion that a bargain has been struck between France and Sardinia”—(we shall see presently who was right about that fact; for myself, I believe that the Emperor of the French was)—“that in certain events Savoy and Nice shall be handed over to the French Government, and the opinion of our country is that it is of vital importance to the independence of Switzerland that such a transfor should not take place." Therefore, in the opinion of the rulers of Switzerland, the question was not one merely of boundary, but one which concerned the safety and independence of their own country. That statement was communicated to the noble Lord early in July, and was touched upon by Earl Cowley, whose words, in his despatch of the 5th of that month, were very emphatic. He wrote:—

"The French Minister said, that he could give me the positive assurance that there was no understanding between France and Sardinia, but he did not deny that the question had been more than once discussed, and that the Emperor entertained the idea, if Sardinia was to become a large Italian kingdom, that it was not unreasonable to expect she should make territorial concessions to him elsewhere."

Nothing could be more distinct, therefore, than the statement made to the noble Lord that in the event of Sardinia not being satisfied with Lombardy, which the Emperor had conquered and given to her, and in the event of her appeal to popular feeling against the plan propounded by the French Emperor, in short, if the duchies were united to Sardinia he must have compensation for that elsewhere. In the month of July the noble Lord stated to the House that the French Emperor did not contemplate encroachment upon Savoy, and on the 8th of July Count Walewski informs Earl Cowley that he might give to his Lordship the assurance that the Emperor had abandoned all idea of annexing Savoy to France. What follows? There is nothing done in July or August. But I find that, on the 26th of September the Swiss Government, being always, as it appears, better informed than our own, make another communication to our Ministry, praying them to remonstrate against or to interfere to prevent the annexation of Savoy, which they alleged would be fatal to the independence of Switzerland. The noble Lord did not pay the smallest respect to that remonstrance. We now come to December 9. On that

exactly what he had represented. He calls upon Earl Cowley, in that it was the opinion of the Government that something upon which would be fatal to the independence of Switzerland its frontiers to be invaded by a French army. It is done consequent upon

On the 22nd of December

Captain Harris writes to the noble Lord that he had been informed by the President of the Confederation that the Federal Council had received from the Austrian Government an answer to their despatch and memorial respecting the neutral territory of Savoy, and that the Austrian Government had promised that in the event of the question of annexation being mooted in the Congress they would use their utmost endeavours to maintain the arrangements which protected the independence and neutrality of Switzerland. Such was the declaration of the Austrian Government, but I find no response to that despatch on the part of the British Government. Nothing whatever was done by the noble Lord, notwithstanding the pressing appeal of the Swiss Minister, and notwithstanding the fact that the Austrian Government had promised to maintain the cause of Switzerland in the Congress. On the 9th of January the noble Lord for the first time tells Captain Harris that Her Majesty's Government were anxious, as they had ever been, to do all in their power to maintain the security and independence of Switzerland. What did the noble Lord do? Nothing. Did he submit to the different Powers of Europe a statement of the communications which had been addressed to him by the Government of Switzerland, and did he ask those Powers to come to a common conclusion upon that important statement? He did nothing of the kind. We are now in January, and I admit that in that month the noble Lord did something. He wrote a despatch; but in my simple innocence the other night I fell into a slight mistake. I was not aware that there was one set of despatches printed and laid on our table, and another set in the shape of private letters which passed between the noble Lord and our Ambassador at Paris; and that most important facts might be contained in those private letters, which facts, if stated in public documents, might change altogether the character of the despatches which have been published to the world. On the 9th of January I find Mr. Grey writing to the noble Lord from Paris. He says that Dr. Kern, the Swiss Minister, appeared to have been alarmed by one of his colleagues, who had reported to him that he was sure the cession of Savoy to France was already determined upon by Sardinia, in return for which France was to sanction the annexation of the Duchies and Romagna to Sardinia.

That is a very important statement. It means that kingdoms are to be handed about according to the interests of the makers of a bargain, which, I say, is in flat contradiction to the treaties of 1815, which Mr. Canning, though he did not like them, insisted were to be acted upon by every statesman in Europe, and to be upheld by England. When such a transaction was communicated to the noble Lord he ought to have submitted it to every great Power in Europe, and to have protested against it at the earliest moment. He did neither the one thing nor the other. Mr. Grey in the same letter says:—"The question, Dr. Kern repeated again and again, was so serious and so materially affected, not only the independence, but the very existence of Switzerland, that he hoped Her Majesty's Government would give it their earnest consideration." I find no reply whatever to that letter, notwithstanding the moving appeal of the Swiss Minister. On the 25th of January, Earl Cowley writes two letters to the noble Lord. In the first he says that the indefatigable Swiss Minister had been with him again, and had expressed an earnest hope that Her Majesty's Government would see fit to remonstrate against the supposed intentions of the Emperor of the French. In his second letter he states that a rumour prevailed in Paris that there existed a secret treaty between France and Sardinia, by which the latter bound herself, in case her territory should be considerably increased in Italy, to hand over Savoy and Nice to France. The noble Lord does not reply to either of these important letters. I suppose the noble Viscount at the head of the Government was of opinion that the less that was said on the subject the better. In a despatch written at the same time I find Earl Cowley making the following statement:—

"Dr. Kern observed that Switzerland would not be satisfied, should Savoy be transferred to France, by the mere renewal on the part of France of the engagements respecting the neutral territory; and he showed me, by a reference to a map of Switzerland and the adjacent territory of France, that, were France to obtain possession of Savoy, she might pour her legions into Switzerland without difficulty or natural hindrance."

Here we have the whole case stated. But now it is said by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, that Earl Cowley did not ask him for instructions. In justice to Earl Cowley it ought to be stated that the noble Lord appears to labour under some misapprehension on that point, for, on the 27th of January, Earl Cowley distinctly says:—

"I should be glad to receive your Lordship's instructions as to the language which I am to use with regard to the annexation of Savoy and of the county of Nice to France."

It appears, then, that up to that date the noble Lord had given no instructions whatever to our Ambassador in Paris as to what he was to say or to do with respect to a matter which, according to previous Despatches, touched not merely the safety and independence of Switzerland, but menaced Italy, and which, according to the noble Lord himself, imperilled the tranquillity of Europe. In fact, there is nothing done on their part from July up to the 28th of January to show what the Government thought on the subject. On that day the noble Lord wrote a formidable Despatch, in which he says:—

"The question of the annexation of Savoy would be regarded not so much as composing past troubles, as raising the elements for new storms. Natural frontiers—the Alps and the Rhine—the repetition of the history of long and bloody wars—the commencement of a new struggle between France and Europe; such are the ideas which would pass through men's minds at the announcement of such an acquisition."

It is a solemn and awful thought which the noble Lord suggests, and I am not disposed to say that he overrated the importance of the subject. But what did he do? Nothing. He wrote that despatch, which is good as far as it goes, expressed a hope that the French Emperor would not think of territorial aggrandizement, and there left the matter. I confess I am surprised that after the language made use of by the noble Lord, no action was taken by him in the way of obtaining such a general remonstrance founded upon the international law of Europe as should check the aggrandizement which he so strongly deprecated. On the 6th of February, however, he desires our Minister at Turin to tell Count Cavour that it would be a blot on the escutcheon of the House of Savoy if the King of Sardinia were to yield to France the cradle of his illustrious family. My own private opinion is that the King of Sardinia is about to submit to that blot. That was all the noble Lord did so far as Sardinia was concerned. But I find a strange despatch which I cannot reconcile with the account given by the French Emperor of the same transaction. It is dated the 3rd of February, and is written by Sir James Hudson to the noble Lord. Our Minister at Turin states that he had been informed by Count Cavour that the Sardinian Government had not the slightest intention of "ceding, exchanging, or selling Savoy." I ask myself is that true? because the French Emperor tells a very different tale, and I am rather inclined to accept his statement. The Swiss Minister insists, from the beginning there was a contract, or call it what you will—an understanding, an arrangement, a bargain—that Sardinia should give up Savoy and Nice for a consideration. He never deserts that point. Count Cavour denies the existence of any such contract, and this brings me to the 5th of February, and to the Despatch which raises the whole question against Her Majesty's Government. On that day Earl Cowley writes to the noble Lord:—

"I have had an opportunity of ascertaining from Count Walewski that he recognizes the accuracy of the report which I had sent to your Lordship of his declaration to me in July last; but he reminded me that he had made that declaration in view of the strict accomplishment of the Treaty of Zurich, and that he had more than once afterwards maintained that if Sardinia was to be aggrandized by the annexation of the Duchies, it must be at the cost of Savoy and the county of Nice, which must pass to France."

That is very decided language; there can be no mistake about it. After such a statement it is useless to indulge in idle fancies. The matter is one of business. Let us see what it is that Count Walewski says and that Earl Cowley admits. Count Walewski says in effect:—"What is the meaning of these reports in England that France is pursuing a new and unexpected policy? I have told you repeatedly, beginning in July last, that if Piedmont was not satisfied with Lombardy, conquered by the blood and treasure of France, but aimed at the Duchies and Tuscany, then we must have Savoy and Nice." Was that communicated to the British Government? I understand that these important matters were communicated by private letters; but what has Count Walewski or the French Government to do with that? Count Walewski stands before the world fairly and honourably, as distinctly stating to the British Ambassador:—"If the Sardinian Government claim the Duchies, we must have Savoy." I want to know at what time Count Walewski made this communication to Earl Cowley. I understand that Count Walewski retired from office on the 2nd of January; therefore, his communication must have been made as early as the month of December; consequently these private letters, containing matters of fact relating to the safety and independence of Switzerland, to the peace of Italy and the tranquillity of Europe, are thus sent to the noble Lord; and what does he do? Nothing. What does the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, who is very bellicose when a small country is in hand like Greece, and who is very ready to go to war with a country like China against every principle of humanity and reason, do? Nothing. Therefore, we have established the all-important facts that these two provinces would in certain eventualities be annexed to France, and that the knowledge of that circumstance was in the possession of the Government. Yet, when my right hon. Friend asked the rational question, "What did the noble Lord do?" The answer is, "I did nothing till the 28th of January, and then I wrote a despatch." I at first believed that there had been no despatches but those laid on the table; but, ascertaining afterwards that important facts were known a long time before anything was done by our Minister, I concluded that the whole Government, being aware of those facts, must bear the blame. Earl Cowley, in his despatch of the 5th of February, states the case of the Emperor of the French as already quoted; and in reference to Count Walewski's assertion, adds—

"This is perfectly true, and on more than one occasion I alluded to these observations in my private correspondence with your Lordship."

M. Thouvenel, it appears, then promises to go to the Emperor and to make a statement of his views, to prevent the possibility of mistakes. Accordingly, M. Thouvenel afterwards read an official answer, in which the following passage occurs:—

"It was true that among the possible arrangements discussed between the French and Sardinian Governments, when they found themselves likely to be engaged side by side in war with Austria, was the cession to France, under certain contingencies, of Savoy and the county of Nice."

Therefore, Count Cavour and the Emperor were opposed to each other as to this statement of fact; but, looking at the whole of the evidence, I am bound to say I believe the French Emperor. I should like to know what passed between Count Cavour and the French Emperor at Plombières before the latter marched his army into Italy. Did that sagacious Emperor say nothing? It appears, indeed, that the Swiss Minister understood the question, and appreciated the truth from the beginning. The real fact is that the policy of the Emperor is stated in that despatch I have referred to, and whoever pursued a course which led to those contingencies alluded to are responsible for the confusion of Europe at the present moment. Earl Cowley reports, M. Thouvenel stated to him :—

“ The Emperor had thought that if the chances of war had given such a large accession of territory to Sardinia as would have altered the relative proportions of the military strength of the two countries, he might with justice have demanded such territorial concessions of Sardinia as would have preserved those relative proportions. But so long as the sole addition made to Sardinia was the province of Lombardy there was no sufficient reason, in the Emperor's opinion, for asking of Sardinia, the sacrifice of any part of her ancient territory, and therefore Count Walewski had made the declaration referred to by me.”

Nothing could be more clear than that statement. So long, then, as the arrangements stood which were come to at Zurich the Emperor would not claim any territory, but he had before the war and all throughout informed the Sardinia Minister, and the French Minister informed Earl Cowley, that in case Sardinia claimed any further aggrandizement, France would then insist on the enlargement of her territory. It is true that the British Government made four propositions, which have been stated to this House; but they were then intermeddling in affairs in which they had no concern, for such were the complications and difficulty in dealing with the Italian question, that it would have been wiser to let the Italians settle their affairs themselves, instead of contriving propositions. M. Thouvenel added :—

“ The Preliminaries of Villafranca, and subsequently the treaty of Zurich, left the territorial distribution of Italy, with the exception of Lombardy, as it had been before the war. The different States were to form a Confederation of a purely defensive character. The French Government desires no better than that this plan should be realized, and there will be no motive for raising the question of any territorial concessions in regard to France.”

Nothing could be more plain than that statement. “ But,” the French Minister proceeded,—

themselves made proposals, which must lead to one of two results. Either the people of the States of Central Italy will pronounce themselves in favour of a Central Kingdom, or they will persist in asking to be annexed to Sardinia. In the former case, the French Government, considering that the solution would partake of the nature of the arrangements made at Zurich, will not think it necessary to look to the more immediate safety of the French frontier. But the French Government could not consent to the formation of a kingdom of above 10,000,000 souls in the south of Europe without taking precautions for the future security of France.”

Therefore, the whole matter comes to this:—The French Emperor says, and says very truly—The aspect of affairs is totally changed; the British Government has made four propositions, the last of which may lead to the annexation of Tuscany to Sardinia, and that annexation fulfils the condition on which I stated I would take Savoy and Nice. Consequently the British Government have led to this state of things, and it is necessary that we should hear something more than we have yet heard from the noble Viscount opposite. The noble Viscount, relying on a blind majority, tells us, when we ask for information, that we ought to propose a vote of censure; but the noble Viscount should remember that a majority is but a doubtful element of strength. It is one that has failed him ere this, and may fail him again. And even were the minority less than it is, it is but fair that they should seek for information, and it is the duty of the Ministers to give it. I find that subsequently the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary receives a despatch from Earl Cowley, dated the 10th of February. In that despatch Earl Cowley states :—

“ I had an opportunity of seeing the Emperor yesterday, and I had the honour of having some conversation with His Majesty on the subject of the annexation of Savoy to France. His Majesty did not deny that, under certain eventualities, and on the grounds stated in my despatch of the 5th inst., he might think it right to claim a proper frontier for France; that he believed that the wish of the Savoyards was to be united to France; and that he could not understand why in the case of the Duchies the wishes of the populations were to be attended to, and that the same principle should not prevail with respect to Savoy.”

Very good. The noble Lord opposite, with the assent of the Cabinet, writes out and says :—“ The will of the populations of Italy must determine their form of Government;” and now this policy had been carried to a singular pitch, when Kings and Queens move off like sentries when the time was up, and people voted by universal suffrage what form of Government they would have, whether republican or monarchical, according to their caprices. The noble Lord could not have been aware how his own proposition would be so retorted upon him. The noble Lord is the advocate of a popular form of Government, but he inspires me with terror when he says that whether there are to be Dukes, Kings, Emperors, or Popes, must depend upon universal suffrage and the number of votes deposited in an urn. The Emperor of the French, however, accepts the principle, and hopes that it will be applied to his own case. He thus fairly retorts their argument of universal suffrage on Her Majesty's Ministers; and I shall be glad to learn from the noble Viscount at the head of the Government what case they have to make. Admitting that the noble Lord, in July, made a statement in this House, yet he was immediately after informed by the Swiss Minister of what was about to happen. He was also informed of it by Earl Cowley; but from that time up to the present hour there has been no appeal to the parties who, according to the noble Lord, ought to be consulted before the Treaty of Vienna is subverted. This, then, is one of the most important questions which the House has had before it for a considerable time. Gentlemen who are in favour of reduced Estimates and of peace should never object to a right understanding of the foreign policy of this country, because it is in vain that they seek for a reduction in expenditure, while, according to the noble Lord, the tranquillity of Europe is threatened by a policy which they themselves encouraged and, indeed, created. I do not censure the French Emperor. He is an able man, avows his policy and seems inclined to revive the traditions of the Empire. At present he is an Emperor without an empire, and would like to furnish himself with one in the easiest way possible. His are not peddling, but great designs. "The people of Savoy," he says, "would rather live under my Government." But then he objects in their case to universal suffrage. The mayors, if they choose, may let him know how they wish the thing to be done, and he has a corps ready to march in and settle the dispute. Meanwhile this able man has an interview with Mr. Cobden on the 24th of December, in which he says:—"Territorial aggrandizement is far from my thoughts. By the way, your coal is the only fuel suited to the consumption of my

navy; but there is a race of men in England called Tories, who will have it I have some ulterior designs, and want to prevent me from getting that coal." Then you have a treaty of peace and commerce agreed to. Earl Cowley writes that two kingdoms are about to be annexed, and you write back to Mr. Cobden about the introduction of cotton twist into France on easier terms. Now, I do not blame those who wish for a great market for their manufactures; but I would put it to their good sense whether they have any doubt as to the ultimate intentions of the French Emperor. His Majesty knows this country well. He is the ablest Sovereign on the Continent of Europe, and he probably said, "I will give free trade to gratify one party in England, and I will take Savoy and Nice for myself." That is a very intelligible policy, but, if anything spoken by so humble a person as myself can ever reach the ears of so great a potentate, I would venture to remind him of an interesting anecdote told in a recent work (Canning and his Times) as having occurred during the voyage of the great Emperor to St. Helena. Some conversation about a camp library took place when the ship was in sight of the rocky island which was to be his grave. He called for this library, took out a book, and in a clear voice read the story of the benevolent fairy:—A farmer asked a fairy to give him what would be most suitable to his condition. She consented. First he asked for health for himself and his family; next fruitful crops; then an additional farm. The fairy granted all these petitions. He wished then for another farm, for a park, and a castle, and was denied none of these. But in a corner of the park was a strip of land which belonged to a neighbour who would neither sell nor exchange it. The fairy had warned him never to ask for what was unreasonable, but his evil genius prompted him to seek for his neighbour's land; and, as a punishment for his inordinate ambition he found himself remitted to his original state of destitution and poverty. There the Emperor closed the book. "This, likewise, has befallen me," he said, "and behold I am at St. Helena." A picture of a great man moralizing on his fallen condition! I believe, with the noble Lord, that the policy which has been pursued in this particular matter is one of the last importance to the peace of Europe. I do not think he has been judicious in following that policy, and therefore I say that the inquiry for information has been a reasonable and a just one.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he should rejoice if the Motion should have the effect which it was intended it should, of inducing Her Majesty's Government to bring this question forward in a proper manner. The relations between France and Savoy and Nice depended upon several historical circumstances, and were connected with important historical events. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had given a picture of negotiations, to which he had stated he could see no valid conclusion. But he had omitted one point. When he stated that Count Cavour made one statement and the Emperor another, and that the Emperor was right, his right hon. Friend had attacked the veracity of one of the greatest of European statesmen. He (Mr. Milnes) did not believe that Count Cavour had been guilty of any misrepresentation of the agreement between himself and the Emperor. No doubt what was said in the conversation at Plombières or elsewhere was, that if by any process of annexation Sardinia should assume an important position in Europe in a military sense, if she obtained the Quadrilateral and Venetia, then it would become necessary that France should be at liberty to demand a rectification of her frontier, and that in such circumstances Sardinia should not refuse to entertain the question. That was, no doubt, the agreement, if any, between the French Emperor and Count Cavour. But the condition had not been carried out. Venetia was not annexed to Sardinia but remained to Austria, and the Quadrilateral was still a menace for Sardinia and for Italy. Count Cavour, therefore, was perfectly right in the position he had taken up. To that moment he had asserted that if Savoy and Nice were given up, it could only be by an act of force majeure on the part of France, and not in consequence of any agreement between the Emperor and himself. This supposition rendered entirely explicable the difficulties and inconsistencies which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had perceived, and had been unable to solve in recent diplomacy. The Emperor of the French contended that the annexation of Tuscany and the Duchies was equal for all the purposes of the agreement to the annexation at first contemplated, and therefore he claimed the cession of Savoy and Nice. In making that assertion the Emperor placed himself in a totally fresh position towards Sardinia, which Count Cavour never recognized. He admitted that if the kingdom of Sardinia extended from sea to sea, the rectification of the French frontier on the side of Savoy would then come legitimately before Europe; but Count Cavour had never recognized the claims of France, so far as they were founded on the present position of Sardinia. If, therefore, Savoy and Nice were given to France, it would only be because Sardinia was not in a position to resist, and because having received from France the magnificent possession of Lombardy, it was impossible she could hold any other language except that almost of a dependent. The annexation of Savoy and Nice to France was one of those historical traditions that sunk deep into the heart of one nation, though it was almost impossible to make another nation understand it. The moment the question of the annexation of Savoy to France was started it ceased to be a question between "this man" or "that man;" it became purely a question of French national feeling, on which a prisoner in Cayenne might take as deep an interest as any one in the Imperial Court. Nor was the question new to French history. An Italian Confederation, the honorary presidency of the Pope, the exclusion of the Spaniards, who then occupied the position of the Austrians in Italy, were all proposed by Henry IV. to Queen Elizabeth, and that great Sovereign acceded to all these propositions. In the partition of Italy in the reign of William III. the cession of Savoy to France was acceded to by that monarch, who fully understood the foreign interests of England, and was by no means disposed to view with complacency an accession to the power of France. With their traditions it was natural that the French would not readily let slip the opportunity of strengthening their frontier, and obtaining the possession of the watersheds of their own rivers, when a railway carried under Mont Cenis might enable a foreign nation in twenty-four hours to cut off the communication between Paris and Toulon. Sardinia had ceased to be a petty state, and become a great Italian power, competent to form alliances and to enter into confederations with other powers, and she might possibly, in the event of an European war, join in a coalition against France herself. If Sardinia had opposed the propositions, then the question of the annexation of Savoy was a question that might well be proposed to an European Congress. He did not think, even if Lombardy and the Romagna were annexed to Sardinia, that the new Italian State would, as a military Power, be dangerous to France. At the same time she might be entitled to a rectification of her frontiers, and he repeated he should be glad to see the question of the annexation of Savoy referred to an European Congress. The other question was a different one. He had no desire to wrest from Austria any part of her dominions, but he had for many years resided in Italy, and he felt it was impossible Lombardy could continue to form part of the Austrian Empire. He could not regret to see it form part of an Italian State. And it was desirable that by some arrangement Venetia should be restored to Italy; an enormous expense and difficulty would be saved to Austria in the present embarrassed condition of her empire. Her Majesty's Government had been blamed for the course it had taken on this question. The present system of transacting the business of the Foreign Office by private letters rendered it almost impossible to pass any fair criticism on its proceedings. He did not suppose the communications laid on the table were all that had passed; but he was willing to believe that any other documents were in conformity with those that had been published. Her Majesty's Government had been blamed for not taking a more open and distinct course on this question. It was said that England should have hounded on the other Powers of Europe to terrify France from this annexation of Savoy. For the peace of Europe and the world he believed this course would have been most disastrous, and it would have entirely failed of its purpose, while it would have placed England almost in a position of ignominy. The other Powers would have found no difficulty in giving a satisfactory, but perhaps insulting reply to the demand. Austria might reply, "You allowed me to be deprived of one of my richest provinces, to be despoiled of the Iron Crown of Lombardy without a word of remonstrance; but now, on this petty question, because it may tend to aggrandize France, you ask me to raise a clamour against her, and place myself in a position of extreme peril by interposing." That was the language Austria might have held, and been justified in holding. He was glad the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs did not attempt to take this course. It would be better now to be content with taking the English position, and protest against the measure of French aggrandizement, leaving any further interference till the time when the difference between France and Sardinia may be brought before an European Congress. But as long as Austria retains possession of Venetia and the fortified Quadrilateral, Sardinia must be insecure, and ought not to be called on to give up an inch of territory, and Savoy would be justified in maintaining the position it has hitherto preserved. They had lived to see districts of the world hitherto believed to be barren and worthless filled with population and rich in productions of the utmost benefit to mankind. He hoped they might see a still greater improvement; to see a population hitherto supposed to be servile and weak rise up and become an independent nation. This, he believed, was the future prospect of Italy. He trusted every point connected with Italy would be considered with reference to her great future prospects. And, if France should acquire some increase of territory by the cession of Savoy, if the people of both countries were not unwilling to consent to exchange rulers, the world might be a great gainer, even though France herself might have gained something also.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he rose to enter his protest against some of the opinions he found in the correspondence, and which had been announced by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary. It was stated in these despatches that countries had the right to choose their own rulers. Now, would the noble Lord admit that principle if the people of the Ionian Islands petitioned, as he understood was the intention of the inhabitants of Zante, to be annexed to the kingdom of Greece? He should wish to ask the noble Lord whether he was prepared to extend the doctrine which he had thus laid down to the Ionian Islands; for if the principle that a people might assemble together and choose their own Sovereign were good in one case he saw no reason why it might not be resorted to in another. For his own part, he deemed such a doctrine to be calculated to subvert alike order and good government. But the noble Lord asked, Why discuss the question of the annexation of Savoy to France unless the House of Commons was prepared to enforce its opinions by having recourse to arms? The simple answer was that it was desirable to enter into such a discussion in order to show the unsoundness of arguments such as those which were advanced by the Emperor of the French. The question was not simply a question of annexation, it was one rather of a future annexation policy, and the arguments on which it was supported, and if they were allowed to pass as unanswerable, the annexation of Savoy might be brought forward with greater force as a precedent hereafter. Now, the Emperor of the French, in his address to the Chambers, had made use of three arguments in support on the view of the subject which he entertained. The first of those arguments was that he deemed it to be his duty to annex Savoy to France, but that could only mean that he felt himself called upon to add to the territories of the French Empire on whatsoever side it should seem to him desirable. The second argument was that Savoy was so small a country that no objection could reasonably be offered to the course with respect to it which he proposed to take; but Switzerland was small also, and in close proximity to Savoy. Let Savoy be annexed because it was so small, and in process of time Switzerland would be annexed also, and so on with other territories to whose frontiers the establishment of this principle would shortly bring the aggrandizing power of France. But then the Emperor went on to contend that the limit which he was about to fix to France on the side of Piedmont formed the natural geographical boundary of his dominions in that direction. If that were so, what, he (Mr. B. Cochrane) should like to know, was to be the boundary of the province of Nice? Was it to be Nice or that spur of the Alps which extended down to the Mediterranean at St. Remo? Or might it not come to pass that the geographical boundary of France in that quarter might be regarded as capable of being extended with still greater advantage to Genoa? In fact, he saw no limits which could be set, if such arguments were to have weight, to the march of Imperial policy. He had given on a former occasion full credit to the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs for the language which he had employed in those despatches, copies of which then lay on the table; but additional despatches had since been produced in which he thought he could trace precisely the same spirit by which the policy of the noble Lord had been animated as represented by the noble Viscount at the head of the Government in 1848—a policy by which, in his opinion, much of the suffering of Italy had been occasioned. And what, let him ask, had Sardinia gained by her intercourse with France? What advantage had she reaped from it? What would be the result to her if the proposed annexation took place? Would the monument of Charles Emmanuel—would the magnificent statues at Turin illustrative of the ancient House of Savoy all be borne away to France when the King of Sardinia had given up the oldest inheritance of his family—that country which had afforded them a safe and secure shelter in the days of their difficulties and dangers? They might talk of the bleak and barren mountains of Savoy as unworthy of consideration, but the history of Savoy was the greatest and most illustrious in existence. But it was said that the people of Savoy themselves were anxious for the proposed annexation. If that were the case, if they preferred to live under the despotism of France to being subjects of the constitutional King of Sardinia, it would not say much for the Government of Piedmont. But it was not so. Every act proved the affection entertained by the people for the House of Savoy. For his own part, he earnestly hoped the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, as he had already interfered so much in the affairs of Italy, would, without any menace of war, so far interfere again, as to use all the weight attaching to Her Majesty's Government to prevent the accomplishment of an annexation which, if carried out, would be an act that could only bring disgrace upon its perpetrators.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, I am very glad the Government have afforded the House an opportunity of discussing this question, for we have thereby presented to us the means of removing misconceptions as to the policy of the Government, and also as to the views of private Members. I am, of course, aware of the great difficulties by which the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs is beset in dealing with a subject so important, and I, for one, have no wish to say a word by which those difficulties might be increased. I trust, however, it is not too late to dissuade Her Majesty's Ministers from setting before us the alternative of open war or silent acquiescence in the annexation of Savoy as the only one within our reach. I for one am not prepared to accept that alternative, and I trust the House will be of the same opinion. The notice which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake) gave on this question had its origin, I believe, in the language which was used by the noble Lord himself, when he stated in this House that if Russia, Prussia, and Austria were all to protest against the proposed annexation, that measure would not, in his opinion, be carried into effect. Upon that statement the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater acted, with the view, I have no doubt, of strengthening the hands of the Government. Last night, however, the noble Lord seemed to interpret this proceeding of my hon. and learned Friend into a desire to promote a war with France; but, for my part, I think that, although there are very few subjects on which the 600 and odd Members of which this House is composed could completely concur, yet that, in condemning the Minister who should make the annexation of Savoy a cause of war with France we should all be unanimous. But I may be asked what alternative I propose. I find in a despatch written by the noble Lord, which has been deservedly applauded, and of which I have on a previous occasion expressed my warm approval, there is this paragraph:—

“ But the question of the annexation of Savoy would be regarded not so much as composing past troubles as raising the elements for new storms. Natural frontiers—the Alps and the Rhine—the repetition of the history of long and bloody wars—the commencement of a new struggle between France and Europe,—such are the ideas which would pass through men’s minds at the announcement of such an acquisition.”

It appeared to me last night that there was a contrast between the spirited despatch which treated the annexation of Savoy as a European question, and the language of the noble Lord, who seems now inclined to reduce the matter to a simple question between Savoy and France, and the cession of a few mountain-tops and half-a million of subjects. But that is not the question. It is whether France, a great military Power, shall acquire a new military frontier. France at present has no pass into Italy fit for artillery. She is about to get one, and she attaches great importance to it. The gain to France we must look at from a French point of view, while the danger to Europe must be considered in the spirit of the noble Lord’s despatch. For the last forty-five years France has been complaining of the treaties of 1815, which she regards as humiliating and unjust to her. The Emperor of France, upon whose policy it is our duty to comment, although I admit we should abstain from remarks of a merely personal character—has encouraged the belief of France that he is destined to relieve her from that wrong and humiliation. But what were those treaties? The nations which had been for a series of years trampled under the heel of France at last succeeded in overthrowing her dominion, and then determined that, while France should continue in future to be a great Power, she should have a defined frontier. A proposal was made for the dismemberment of France, but was prevented from being carried out by the Duke of Wellington, who said that two things were necessary for the good of Europe—that France should remain a great Power, and that she should have a defined frontier. He wished France to be great, but not too great, and those treaties were securities taken by the other Powers of Europe against what had been for 200 years the traditional policy of France—a policy of war, aggression, and aggrandizement. I ask, under those circumstances, what right has Sardinia or any other Power to liberate France from the restrictions that were placed upon her for the general protection of Europe? I ask, too, what right has any party in this country—still more what right has any Government to allow this question, which is a great European question, to become a mere question of a few mountain-tops, and the transfer of a small population? It will be said, What are we to do? Have our statesmen no alternative but war or acquiescence? There cannot be such blindness, such political cowardice, as to abstain from interference, because Savoy is so distant. When the Italian war broke out last year the oldest diplomats predicted that France was about to enter upon a new career. France now considers herself as liberated from the treaties, and enters upon that new career. The noble Lord in the despatch I have referred to says that any alteration of existing arrangements would create great distrust. Now, what does distrust mean? It means increased Estimates in England, preparations for war in Europe, and the confusion, embarrassments, and interruption to commerce which we all deprecate. Peace to the mind of a statesman does not mean the simple absence of actual war, but an absence of the aggression that leads to war, and it is for a statesmen to say “ I must secure peace by taking those securities which will alone preserve it." Then, I shall be asked, What are we to do? In that spirited despatch of the noble Lord he refers to the Rhine, and in a speech which he made last year to his constituents, he referred to Belgium, and said that if Belgium was attacked, we should be obliged to go to war. I say the natural policy of this country, if we would provide for dangers which we see approaching, is to take precautions and to make alliances with those Powers which, like ourselves, might be threatened by the danger. That is the traditional policy of England and the policy we ought to adopt. The taste for aggrandizement will only be increased by indulgence, and sooner or later we shall be compelled to confront the danger. During the reigns of our greatest monarchs, in the times of Elizabeth, of William, of Anne, and in the time of the two Pitts, the policy of England has ever been to form alliances in order to check the aggressive tendencies of any single European power. And I say I think the Government would have done well now if they had entered into an alliance with Prussia as a protest that could not be mistaken against this aggression—this challenge to Europe making that alliance prospective in its operation; but, instead of doing that which would have been a wise policy, they are hugging a Commercial Treaty, thinking that from that we shall get the security against the aggressive attitude of France which we can alone obtain from continental alliances. I rose to vindicate my hon. and learned Friend and myself from the insinuation that because we disapproved the annexation of Savoy we therefore were in favour of war. I do not believe there is a man in the House who would advocate such a policy; but I do say that a tame acquiescence would be a dangerous policy, an unworthy policy, and I think the noble Lord would have done well to have followed up his despatch, and to have frankly told the Emperor that as in former times the aggressive disposition of France had provoked combinations against her, so, similar conduct in the present time, might lead to similar combinations in Europe. That would have been a dignified course; it would have placed the Government in a proper position before the country and in the eyes of the world, and if my hon. and learned Friend should renew his Motion at some future day, I hope we may then be able to extract from the Government a declaration that that is a course which they have felt it due to the character and honour of the nation to pursue.

LORD HARRY VANE said, that as the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater intended to bring the subject before the House at some future day, it was not desirable on the present occasion to continue a discussion which might possibly prove of an irritating character upon the mere question of a production of papers. At the same time it was desirable that the House should express an opinion, for, although he would not indulge in vituperation of the French Emperor, he felt there were great principles involved which at the present time made it expedient that the House of Commons should pronounce a deliberate opinion. He quite agreed that those who desired discussion did not desire war, but rather to make a protest for the future, more than for the present. No opportunity should be thrown away of making alliances with other powers, as it was impossible to say where such proceedings as those contemplated by the Emperor of the French would end, if no check were put upon them. He had risen, however, principally to express his regret that so much of the correspondence relative to the annexation of Savoy and Nice had been carried on in private letters. There could be no doubt that the attention of the Government had been directed at a very early period to this project of the Emperor of the French, which had never been finally abandoned. He hoped the Government would in future take care that there should be a record preserved of every important conversation that took place between the Foreign Minister of France and our Ambassador in Paris. There was no other way in which the House of Commons could be kept duly informed of the events which took place. He had often heard accusations made by foreigners against our diplomacy, not of falsehood, but of something very like it, grounded principally on the fact that a very large proportion of the correspondence produced before the House of Commons did not give the real narration of the affairs to which they related. Many questions were thus wrapt in mystery, and no fair view of transactions could be obtained. As notice of a distinct Motion on this subject had been given by the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater, he would not take up the time of the House further at present. He would only repeat that he hoped means would be taken to prevent Parliament being kept for the future so much in the dark with reference to important conversations and negotiations that were taking place between our representatives abroad and the Ministers of foreign countries.

Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he rose to correct a fallacy which appeared to have run through the whole discussion. It had been assumed that the King of Sardinia had been exciting the national feelings of the people of Central Italy, and urging them to clamour for annexation to his Government. He would venture to assert that the very reverse was the fact, and to express his opinion that the Government of Sardinia had been by no means the primus mobile of the sentiment of liberty in Italy. He believed that for a long time the King of Sardinia, in the exercise of a judicious prudence and reserve in the treatment of such important events, connected with so many elements of danger and disturbance; had shown himself extremely unwilling to be mixed up more than was necessary with the affairs of Central Italy. Indeed, the people rather considered him as hanging back, and not so ready to undertake direct responsibility in their favour as they wished him to be. The feeling throughout Central Italy in favour of annexation to Sardinia was entirely spontaneous, and printed placards might be seen in September last, affixed to every house of Bologna calling for annexation. He made full allowance for the difficulties of the Emperor of the French, and he had no doubt the two Emperors, when they concluded the Treaty of Villafranca, bond fide believed that there would be no difficulty in restoring the Dukes to their position. But the feeling of the people of Central Italy had never varied; it was for nationality, as far as they could realize it. They saw that before them in the Constitutional Government of Sardinia; they very sensibly determined to look no further, and their annexation was now being submitted to the test of universal suffrage. Cavour if, for the sake of what had been held out as the liberation of Italy from the Adriatic to the Alps, he had been ready to make some small sacrifice of Sardinian territory. But, that magnificent programme not having been fulfilled, France was not entitled to regard the proposed annexation of Central Italy to Sardinia as an equivalent for Venetia, and to demand Savoy for herself. Central Italy had never been at the disposal of the French Emperor, and therefore he could not fairly ask for any compensation for it. It was a fundamental error to ascribe the aspirations of the Central Italians for national independence to the instigation of Sardinia. They had been determined, at whatever sacrifice, to shake off foreign thralldom, and he could testify from personal observation, that they were one and all ready to undergo the greatest extremities of human endurance rather than fail in that patriotic object. The lust of dominion was a passion of human nature which the Emperor of the French had kept in abeyance during the war in Northern Italy; but it seemed to have returned when the illusion as to a Kingdom of Etruria for an Imperial Prince had been wholly dispelled. By refusing to participate in the recent struggle, but by enouncing and maintaining by peaceful means the principle of non-intervention, England had secured for herself one of the greatest moral triumphs the world had ever seen.

Mr. KINNAIRD said, that in his very able speech the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin had attributed the proposed annexation of Savoy to our Government having made its four propositions on behalf of Central Italy. That opinion, he thought, would not be borne out by the official papers. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had made an attack upon Count Cavour. Having himself the honour of that distinguished man's acquaintance, he must say that he could not believe that Count Cavour was open to the charge of dishonesty attempted to be cast upon him. If Italy obtained her independence, it would, humanly speaking, be owing to the eminent ability, indefatigable energy, and untiring zeal which had rendered this statesman the most prominent, as well as the most popular man in Italy. The substance of the attack made upon Count Cavour was, that in the despatch dated Turin, the 3rd of February, it was said that the Sardinian Government had not the slightest intention to cede, exchange, or sell Savoy. Now, he believed that that was the determination of Count Cavour at this very moment; but it should be remembered that Count Cavour had a very difficult part to play. His first object, it was true, was the interest of his own country, Italy; but, at the same time, he had rejected the proposal which had been mentioned of taking the sense of the country by mayors, and within the last few days it had been announced that the sense of Savoy would be taken by universal voting. It could be proved that in the interest of his Sovereign Count Cavour had done all in his power to secure the independence of the Savoyards. In the debates in that House on this subject, hon. Gentlemen had all along spoken as if the annexation of Savoy was to be received as an accomplished fact. He, however, thought that if we had wished honestly to support the King of Sardinia in resisting this measure, it should not have been by holding the tame and lukewarm language that had been held in that House, treating the annexation as a thing that would be done. It would have been well if Her Majesty's Government had taken a stronger and bolder line from the beginning, which would have encouraged the other Powers of Europe to make a stand on that question. The opportunity had, however, been lost. Still, he should not willingly believe that the annexation would be executed; but if, unfortunately, it should be persevered in, he agreed with the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University that the Emperor of the French would never have committed a greater political error, or one that would produce throughout Europe greater distrust as to further projects of aggression. He wished, before sitting down, to ask, whether, in the event of this annexation taking place, any security had been obtained for the independence and neutrality of Switzerland, which would be vitally affected by the step which it was currently stated was about to be adopted.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am anxious to say a few words in reply to what has passed in the course of this debate. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke after my noble Friend, misunderstood, I think, what was stated by me on a former occasion. He said that I, without reason, had laid down the principle that if these questions were debated in the House at all, it must be with a view of censuring either the Emperor of the French or Her Majesty's Government; and that, as far as an expression of opinion could go, I wished to preclude the House from discussing the matter, except on the ground of a formal censure. My observations related solely to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) who I understood to have said that he thought the conduct of the Government open to considerable animadversion, and that it was one of the points which ought to be brought under the consideration of the House. But it never could enter into my mind to lay down a doctrine so much at variance with the proper functions of Parliament, as that a matter of European interest, connected with the foreign relations of this country, was not to be discussed unless it was brought forward by a direct Motion of censure on the Government. Now, Sir, I think the course which Her Majesty's Government have pursued in this matter is much more clear and consistent than would appear from the observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. When first the possible cession of Savoy and Nice to France was made known, as a matter which was still in doubt, my noble Friend immediately instructed our Ambassador at Paris to ask the French Minister whether there was any foundation for the report, and he was told by Count Walewski that the notion, if it ever were entertained, had been abandoned. Rumours doubtless existed that the plan was still in contemplation; but it was settled at that time, as is well known, that whenever the Peace of Zurich should be signed and concluded, a Congress was to assemble for the purpose, not only of taking cognizance of the Treaty, but also of considering the settlement of the affairs of Italy. And in that Congress the objections which England or any other Power might feel to any arrangement that might be dependent or consequent on the treaty of Zurich, or on the settlement of the affairs of Italy would naturally have been stated. There was, therefore, no great use in entering into an animated correspondence with the French Government in reference to a contingent event which was to depend on the discussions that would take place only when this Congress assembled; but as the House is aware, the treaty of Zurich was delayed for a considerable time, and it was not till very late in the year—indeed, I think it was not till the beginning of the present year—that it became known that the Congress would not be assembled. When we became aware of that fact my noble Friend, as will appear by the papers which have been laid before Parliament, did express a very strong opinion with regard to the contemplated Cession of Savoy and Nice to France. I cannot quite understand the opinion which the right hon. and learned Gentleman entertains on this subject: at one moment he seemed to censure my noble Friend for not having expressed the opinions of the English Government with sufficient firmness and vigour, and at another time he criticised a despatch as being too strong and energetic. In my opinion considerable judgment and discretion were required in determining the course which Her Majesty's Government ought to pursue. In the first place, as was stated by my right hon. Friend, the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), it was quite clear this was not a question on which the issue of peace or war would depend. Whatever objections we might entertain to the proposed cession of Savoy and Nice to France, nobody could maintain that it involved the interests of this country to so great and direct an extent as to justify the Government in calling on the country to go to war with France in order to prevent that cession. As far as England is concerned, France—possessing Savoy and Nice—would not be a more formidable enemy in war than she would be without them. Any interference on our part, therefore, ought not to be viewed by the French Government, or by the French nation, as arising from jealousy of the power of France; it is not from apprehension of the power of France that we object to the annexation, nor is the case one in which, if our representations were unsuccessful we should think it right to take up arms to prevent the cession of territory from being completed. If that be admitted, then I think it is clear that some of the propositions which have been started in the course of this discussion would not have been expedient. We are told that we ought to have applied to the great Powers of Europe, and that we should have entered into an alliance with Prussia, Austria, and Russia, for the purpose of preventing this annexation. The only mode of preventing it, I think, was to represent to the Government of France the objections which presented themselves to our minds in relation to the transaction; and, unless we were of opinion that the matter was of sufficient importance to justify a resort to warlike measures, my own opinion is, that to array a hostile confederacy against France on this point would be a most injudicious method of endeavouring to accomplish our purpose. It would have roused the national feeling of the French people, it would have stimulated the sense of dignity in the French Government, and it would have borne an appearance of compulsion when we were not prepared to exercise the reality, which would have been more calculated to prevent the accomplishment of our wishes than to forward their attainment. There was one course which it was expedient to adopt when it was ascertained that the Congress would not take place, and when it was, therefore, evident that there would not be any opportunity of bringing this matter under discussion in the assembled Councils of Europe; what remained to be done was to state fairly and distinctly to the French Government the objections which we entertained to the fulfilment of this project, and to communicate those objections to the other Powers of Europe, in order that they, knowing what we had done, might, if they thought fit, take corresponding steps to urge further objections on the Government of France. Now, this is what was done by my noble Friend; and it is the course which appears to me to have been best adapted for the accomplishment of our purpose, without wounding the dignity of France or without placing the French Government in a position in which they could not have yielded without a sacrifice of dignity or of honour. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. White-side) says he does not yet know what my opinions on this subject are—that I have not yet stated them to the House. My opinions agree entirely with those of my noble Friend. I perfectly subscribe to every word in those despatches which he has laid on the table of the House, and which I think—with the exception of the right hon. and learned Gentleman—have obtained the assent and approbation of almost everybody who has expressed any opinion in reference to them. Indeed, I rather think, if my memory does not deceive me, that the right hon. Gentleman himself, on a former occasion, did justice to the spirit in which my noble Friend represented the Government of England in that correspondence. I consider that it would be a great mistake on the part of the French Government if they were to persist in this plan. When first the present Emperor mounted the throne—or rather when he first acceded to power in France—apprehension was no doubt excited in many of the Continental Governments that he might adopt the policy of his uncle, which was one that we know involved the whole of Europe in the calamities of war. The Emperor took an early opportunity of declaring that the Empire meant peace—a declaration which was received with the greatest pleasure and satisfaction by the whole of Europe, and which inspired confidence in the new policy which it was supposed he intended to pursue. I do not hold that in what took place last year in Italy there was any departure from that principle. France undertook a noble enterprise—that of freeing Italy from foreign domination—aye, and from French domination included, for it was part of the scheme of Italian liberty that France as well as Austria should retire from any future interference in the internal affairs of that country. It would have been—and should it so turn out, it will be—a most honourable, a most glorious result to the Government of France, if, after restoring to Italy the freedom and independence of which she has been so long deprived, France was content with the glory of that achievement, and abstained from mixing up with a generous enterprise any small or petty objects of selfish and local aggrandizement. Many reasons have been assigned for the cession of Savoy and Nice, but I cannot admit that any of them have any force or value. It is said that so long as Piedmont remains a small Power she continues to be the harmless neighbour of France, but that if she becomes so large as to contain a population of eight, ten, or eleven millions, she will become a Power formidable as a neighbour, and therefore one which in the nature of things requires that the French frontier should be made additionally secure. I must say that when a country containing about thirty-six millions of people, the most warlike on the earth in its character, full of resources, and compact in territory, holds such language as that, and asserts that it is in danger from a State having a population of only eight or ten millions, it is an argument which cannot, I think, be gravely and seriously maintained, and which is not founded on truth or in reason.

It is also said that France ought to have her natural boundaries, and that the population of Savoy speaks the French language. Why, Sir, in the first place, history tells us that natural boundaries are no defence whatever. What instance is there on record in which an army of sufficient amount determined to invade a country has been stopped either by rivers or by mountains? Therefore, whether the watershed of the Alps is in the possession of France or of Sardinia, France, as long as she continues to be the stronger Power, will be able to enter Italy; and should the Sardinians be insane enough to attempt to invade France, the French armies would give such an account of the invading force as would not encourage a repetition of the attempt. But it is said that Sardinia might be a member of a confederation, and might open the passage to the troops of other countries. The answer to that is plain. Such a confederation must, if it exist at all, consist of Powers north of the Alps, and those Powers, if they meant to invade France, would not descend to the Tyrol, pass along northern Italy, and go back again over the Alps, but would take the more direct and natural course of attacking France on her eastern frontier. Another answer is, that I do not think it enters into the imagination of any Government in the world to attack France without some great and adequate provocation, and therefore, if the Empire is peace and means peace, which I believe was a sincere declaration on the part of the Emperor, it is not in the nature of things conceivable that there should be any confederation to join Sardinia in an invasion of France. But, Sir, the objection which we feel to the cession is not, as I have said, an objection founded upon any direct British interest, because danger to England from the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France there would be none. It is founded upon the danger to Europe which would rise from the precedent—from the principle which such an annexation would establish. For, Sir, if you come to natural boundaries, and if the country which claims them is to be the judge of where they are, it is very easy to see that Europe would find it very difficult to decide where danger would begin and where resistance upon a grand scale ought to be undertaken. If language were to be the measure of aggrandizement, it is plain that it would be difficult for many countries to show that they had a good title to possessions which they now hold. Therefore, these two principles of natural boundaries and of community of language are principles the establishment of which would be very dangerous to Europe, however small, comparatively speaking, might be the instance in which they were carried into effect. There is one case in which the cession of Savoy to France would be attended with direct danger to a country whose independence it is the interest of all Europe—aye, I will say of France herself to maintain—I mean Switzerland. We are asked whether any steps have been taken to provide for the security of Switzerland in the event of this cession taking place. We have not taken any such steps, and I will tell the House why. Because, if you begin to talk about the modification of a measure which you want to prevent in its entirety, you weaken the ground upon which you stand. It will be time enough to talk of that when, if it ever happens, the cession shall become inevitable; and therefore I think it would not have been prudent to talk to France about the conditions on which the cession of Savoy should take place, so long as it was the opinion of the Government that events might occur which would prevent that annexation being carried into effect at all. On what grounds, then, I may be asked, can the Government, can this House entertain the opinion that that cession may not take place? In the first place, the French Emperor has stated that Savoy shall not be taken by force of arms; in the next, that it shall not be taken without the consent of its own Sovereign and people; and again, that it shall not be taken without consulting the great Powers of Europe. And when you say “consulting the great Powers of Europe,” it seems to me to follow as a natural consequence that it will not be taken without their assent. Well, then, if these conditions are laid down and adhered to—abstinence from force, the consent of the Sovereign and people of Savoy, and the assent of the great Powers of Europe—I think we are not yet come to that point at which we are justified in holding that reason and reflection, and a due regard to the honour of France, may not induce the French Government to abandon the project which they have hitherto entertained. Now, we are told by an hon. Member opposite (Mr. B. Cochrane) that with regard to Tuscany we have been laying down a principle which might be applied to the Ionian

Islands; and we have been asked why, as we have said that the Tuscans should decide by universal suffrage what should be their condition, we do not apply the same rule to the Ionian Islands. The answer is obvious. In the first place, we did not propose universal suffrage to the people of Tuscany. We said that it was not part of our habits or constitution, but that they were the best judges of what suffrage it became them to adopt. More than that, it happens that in the case of Tuscany—and this distinction applies to Savoy as well as to the Ionian Islands—that in the case of Modena, and in the case of Parma, the Sovereigns had fled; they had done that which James II. did in England, they had left their countries without Governments, and the countries so left had established provisional Governments, and had determined that they would not permit these runaway Sovereigns to return. But we are not the Sovereigns of the Ionian Islands, but only the protecting Power, and we have not yet run away from them, therefore, until that happens, the parallel cannot be drawn. Again, with regard to Savoy. The King of Sardinia still reigns in Savoy, and therefore it is not to be maintained that, because the people of Tuscany are to be left to determine their own condition, therefore for the same reason the people of Savoy should, upon their own authority, without the consent of their Sovereign, without the consideration of the other Powers of Europe, be invited to go to the poll and say to whom they will belong. It appears to me that we did on the whole pursue the course which was best adapted to the purpose which we had in view. We inquired of the French Government whether a certain intention was entertained, and we were told that it was abandoned. We knew that if it were resumed, and if the event upon which it hinged were to occur, the proper place for making our representations would be at the Congress at which it was to be settled. When it was apparent that no Congress was to meet, we communicated our strong objections to the French Government; and when we had done so, not endeavouring to array the other Powers of Europe in hostile confederacy against France, we informed them of our objections, and of the grounds on which they are founded. It is for them to determine whether they will state their objections to the Government of France; but that Government has announced its intention to consult them, and therefore they will be obliged in reply to state the views which they take of this subject. In our opinion it is a question of European interest. I cannot help thinking that the great Powers of Europe will take the same view of it as we do—a view devoid of passion, not tinged by jealousy, not founded upon any feeling that can be offensive to France, or at which she can justly take umbrage, but a view founded upon considerations of general European interest, which, I hold, are of as much importance to France as to any of the other Powers concerned. If these European Governments, when consulted by France, state in a calm, temperate, and friendly manner the reasons which induce them to think that this measure would be unadvisable, I cannot divest myself of the impression that the Government of France will see that it would gain more advantage by preserving the good opinion and confidence of Europe, by disabusing the Powers of Europe of any feelings of jealousy or suspicion as to ulterior designs on the part of France, than it could derive from the acquisition, not as my right hon. Friend supposed my noble Friend to have said, of a few mountain tops and half a million of people, but of a district which, whatever its value may be, is really comparatively unimportant to France as a territory that would give her any addition of military or physical strength. With regard to the other point adverted to, I cannot but congratulate the Government, the House, and the country upon the prospect which the accounts received this evening seem to hold out that by a quiet manifestation of public determination Tuscany is likely to aggregate herself to Sardinia, and that there will be created in northern and central Italy a State which, by the freedom of its institutions, by the independence which it will have acquired, may hold out a fair prospect that Italy may a third time rise to the eminence in the civilized world which she occupied in the days of the Roman Emperors, and again during those periods when the revival of arts and literature placed her States—though she was not then, as in the former period, a great military Power—in a position of honour and glory which as long as history endures will be looked back to by Italians with just satisfaction and pride. If such an arrangement be accomplished, we shall see a development of talents, public spirit, and civilization which England may be proud of having contributed by its moral weight and influence to bring about. I must say that if we contrast the judgment, moderation, temper, and statesmanlike qualities which the Italians have shown during the last twelve months with that less laudable spirit which was displayed in 1848, we may entertain the strongest hopes for the future. With regard to one Italian statesman, who has been somewhat unfavourably mentioned during this debate—Count Cavour—whatever may be thought of him by those whose policy he has thwarted, and whose views he has defeated, I can only say that Italy, both present and future, will regard him as one of the most distinguished patriots who have adorned the history of any country. She will owe to him as great obligations as any nation ever owed to any of its members; and with the conviction of what he has done for Italy he need not be dispirited by any aspersions by which he may be assailed in any country.

MR. DISRAELI: As some observations of mine have given rise to this discussion, I would make a few remarks before it closes. In the first place, I am glad to find that the noble Viscount the first Minister has recalled that unconstitutional dogma which he apparently laid down last night—that, in case the Opposition in the House of Commons were not satisfied altogether with the conduct of foreign affairs by the Government, it was their duty to originate immediately a vote of censure. The noble Viscount now says that he understood that I had indulged in language of animadversion on the conduct of the Government, and that I was bound in consequence to make such a Motion; but what I said was simply that their conduct was involved in so much mystery that it required explanation. I particularly guarded myself against any other object than a desire to obtain upon some points that information which it appeared to me the general wish of the House to possess. Indeed, it was clear, from the subsequent discussion, that the Government, and especially the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs, felt that this was a rational desire, and that it was the duty of the Government to take measures to furnish that information, and it was with that impression that the noble Lord gave notice of a Motion to present papers in order to afford an opportunity for offering a defence of the Government on those points which appeared to require explanation. The noble Lord the First Minister has spoken of some hon. Gentlemen in this House who would make the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France a cause for declaring war against France. He has never heard from me any expression of that kind. He has spoken, also, of some who would make the annexation of these Sardinian provinces to France a reason for England forming a league with the great Powers of Europe in opposition to such annexations. Again, I say, he has heard no expression of that kind from me. Nay more, he will allow that even the modest proposal of some hon. Gentlemen, that a protest should be presented, has received no sanction from me. At the same time, as this last point has given rise to so much misconception, and especially in the case of an hon. Gentleman who has sometimes taken a part in these discussions, but not always with the ability and information which he displays on other subjects—I mean the hon. Member for Birmingham—I may be permitted to inform the hon. Gentlemen that when he accuses Gentleman on this side of the House of a desire to involve this country in war with France because they recommend a protest in case the annexation of Savoy takes place, he would seem not aware that the very fact of having recourse to a protest is prima facie evidence that a country is not going to war. He would seem not aware that a protest is a diplomatic instrument as formal as a treaty or a convention—not a mere burst of rhetoric; it is an instrument which expresses and records the feelings of a nation when they do not think it advisable or politic to have recourse to extreme measures. The present Government is not the Government, and especially the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs is not the Minister who should take any objection to a course of this kind, or who should hold it as one of a hostile character, because, in the case of Cracow—where, by the bye, great doubts were entertained even by eminent jurists whether the Treaty of Vienna had really been violated, but where the English Government thought otherwise—we did not go to war, but we did protest; we recorded a formal protest, and sent it round to the different Courts of Europe. Who was our Prime Minister then? The noble Lord who now sits opposite to me as Minister for Foreign Affairs. I now come to the information which the noble Lord has afforded us to-night in presenting the papers, after giving formal notice, in order to explain the policy of the Government with respect to this impending annexation of Savoy to France. But the noble Secretary, in fact, forgot to make any remarks at all upon the annexation of Savoy. His whole speech was entirely upon the settlement of Italy. So far as the case is concerned which I put before the House very imperfectly at the end of a late debate, but which was reproduced to-night with brilliant and logical precision by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Whiteside), we have obtained from the noble Lord no information. He never denied the statement which I made the other night, not so confidently as I might make it now, with the evidence before us, because I thought that something lurked behind which the papers did not explain; he never denied that he had ample, complete, and repeated warnings of the policy of the French Government. Indeed, his whole observations—meagre and limited as they were with regard to the annexation of Savoy—started unfortunately from the very beginning. What was his first observation? As if he thought he would silence this side of the House at the outset, he made an observation which completely weakened his own case. He said, that whatever could be known with respect to the possible annexation of Savoy was known to the late Government, who were, in fact, more responsible for the affair; that it was known to the Earl of Malmesbury; and that the records in the Foreign Office did not prove that the Earl of Malmesbury had received any very satisfactory reply upon the subject. At another time I might argue and might prove that the Earl of Malmesbury did receive a very satisfactory reply; but I will take the noble Lord's own statement, and on his own showing I say that if, when he acceded to office he found that his predecessor had not received a satisfactory reply, his first duty obviously was to have pressed for one. I remember being told, when I sat on those benches, that we had taken office with all the responsibilities and the engagements of our predecessors; and if that were true in our case, it is as true and just in that of the noble Lord. The very fact, that according to the interpretation of the noble Lord, the answer of the French Government was not satisfactory, was a reason why he should have pricked up his ears and said, "The first thing I must have is satisfactory information on this matter of Savoy." However, there is no doubt from the evidence before us that totally independent of the late Government the noble Lord was obliged to make some inquiries. He received then that information which appears in the papers, dated in the early part of July, announcing that the Imperial Government had given up all intention of annexing Savoy. But the noble Lord has not contradicted my statement that during the interval between July and his Despatch of January he received frequent intimations from our own Ambassador at Paris, of the intention of the French Government to revert to their original policy in contemplation of events in Italy; and there is no doubt now, that, besides this information from our own Ambassador, the Swiss Government, deeply interested in this question, on which their existence and independence as a free people entirely depend, had impressed in every way, directly and indirectly, upon the representatives of the Queen, both here and abroad, the great anxiety which they felt upon it. The noble Lord does not contradict this statement, but rather confirms it. And what is his defence? The very weakest ever made by a Minister, but especially by a Minister invested with such great responsibilities as the noble Lord. "It is true," he says in his defence, "that I received these representations, but I thought nothing of them. I thought they were mere threats, and I treated them with indifference." But have they turned out to be mere threats? On the contrary, they have turned out to be grave and serious warnings of events which, notwithstanding the sanguine anticipations in which the noble Viscount has just indulged, I must express my conviction are on the eve of accomplishment. What are we to think then of a Minister who treats intimations which turn out to be grave and serious warnings on a subject of high policy as mere casual unimportant observations? To my mind, it argues a great want of perception in the noble Lord; and, surely, perception is a faculty eminently necessary in a Minister for Foreign Affairs. It appears, then, that from the month of July until the end of January only one solitary despatch—so far as a despatch expressing the policy of the Government is concerned—was written by the Foreign Secretary, although the noble

Lord was aware, or ought to have been aware, that if Sardinia were aggrandized by the annexation of the Duchies and Tuscany, as a matter of course France would demand Savoy and Nice. I say, therefore, that if with that information in his possession, the noble Lord pursued a policy in Italy which greatly favoured and assisted the aggrandizement of Sardinia, to that degree and in that manner, he inevitably favoured and assisted the policy of France by affording her a pretext for carrying out her views with respect to the expansion of her present frontiers. That appears to me quite unanswerable; at any rate, it has not received an answer to-night, either from the noble Lord the Secretary of State or from the First Minister. The other charge, as the Foreign Minister calls it, or the other question upon which I wish to have an explanation, is why, when the noble Lord devised the plan for the settlement of Italy at the commencement of January, which was embodied in the four propositions, and when these propositions were communicated to the great Powers, did the noble Lord not communicate at the same time the cognizance he had of the inevitable policy of the French Government in the event of his scheme being successfully carried out? Upon that point we have had no satisfactory answer. The great Powers, our Allies, appear, as far as England is concerned, to have been left completely in the dark; and, indeed, on this head there is one despatch, which had not been mentioned in our discussion to-night, but which should be noticed. I allude to one dated the 16th of February, from Lord Bloomfield, to the noble Lord, in which he says that the Prussian Minister, who seemed to be in a state of some anxiety, doubtless in consequence of information he had received from the Swiss Minister, had asked him whether our Government had heard anything of the proposed annexation of Savoy and Nice to France, and what they intended to do with respect to it. Lord Bloomfield was obliged to reply that he had no instructions from the noble Lord opposite, except that the English Government had received no official communication on the subject, and I think he added that, as they had received no official communication, they thought the best plan would be to leave the matter alone. We now know what the noble Lord meant by saying that the Government had received no official communication. The communication was conveyed in those private letters of which we have heard, and with respect to which I urged upon the House the other night the importance of expressing some opinion. Private letters are perfectly legitimate as long as they are private, but it is quite against all rule, and will bring the utmost confusion upon public affairs, to allow any public functionary when his public despatches are produced and subjected to criticism to fall back upon his private letters. I say, then, that upon the second point which I wish to be inquired into—namely, why the noble Lord, when he communicated with the great Powers on the subject of Italy, did not frankly inform them what would be the inevitable consequence as regards the extension of the frontiers of France if his policy were successful—we have received no explanation whatever from the Secretary of State. What explanation, however, have we had from the noble Viscount the First Minister? The noble Secretary gave us a dissertation upon the settlement of Italy instead of the annexation of Savoy; but, so far as he touched upon the latter subject, he took a totally different view of the case from the First Minister. The First Minister did not think that the rumours concerning the annexation were utterly idle and indifferent, and were not to be regarded for a moment; on the contrary, the reason, according to him, of their course was, that they expected everything would be settled at the Congress. As the Congress was expected to meet in a short time, and as the supposed project of annexation could not be carried into effect until the Congress met, the Government thought it unnecessary for them to express their opinion to the French Government, to communicate with their Allies, or, in fact, to take any step to counteract or prevent a policy which, whatever may be the opinion of the House, is at least in the opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers pernicious and perilous. That is the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury. Let us see whether there is any weight in this difference between the noble Lords, and if there is any excuse in that view of the case for the unparalleled negligence of the noble Viscount and his colleagues. When did the difficulties arise which made the French Government recur to their original policy of annexation, and when did the notion first become prevalent that the Congress would not take place? There is no doubt that it was towards the end of November when the difficulties connected with the carrying into effect of the Treaty of Zurich came to be generally felt among practical statesmen, and when Count Walewski intimated to the English Government that, in consequence of those difficulties, in consequence of the preliminaries of Villafranca not being carried out in their spirit, it would be necessary for the French Government to reconsider their position, and that if the result of not carrying the Treaty of Zurich into effect should be the aggrandizement of Sardinia by the annexation of several Italian provinces, France then must—"must," not "might"—look to the annexation of Savoy and Nice as necessary to the completion of her military frontiers. The project of a Congress was not, I believe, formally abandoned till the beginning of January, but among statesmen I do not think there was one who was not of opinion towards the end of the year that the idea of a Congress was relinquished as impracticable. What steps were taken then by our Government? The First Minister dwells upon the Congress as the cause to absolve his Government from the charge of negligence, or, at least of indifference; but I ask what course was adopted after the plan of a Congress was given up? We know by the records before us that at the end of December, or early in January, the greatest anxiety existed in Europe on this subject. We know that the Swiss Government did everything they could to bring the anxiety they felt on the subject of Savoy under the consideration of Her Majesty's Ministers. I do not find, however, that our Government took any steps to reassure Switzerland, to influence France, or to lay before her those considerations of high and pure morality in which the noble Viscount has been so exuberant to-night. I want to know whether the Ambassador of the Queen, the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, or any other public functionary of authority and influence was authorized to lay before the French Emperor those considerations militating against his intended policy which the noble Viscount has expressed to-night, and which received the sympathy and approbation of the House. We have no evidence of it. Not a single thing was done during the six weeks preceding the 28th of January. Yet we know from private letters that Count Walewski was frank and straightforward in his explanations of French policy to our Government, although the noble Secretary of State treated the whole affair as rumour, pretence, or menace. We know that the Swiss Government took every possible means, with great energy, and with that perseverance which is a characteristic of the race, to bring the possible fate of their country before our Government. We know that our Ambassador at Paris was not wanting to his duty. Even when Earl Cowley was absent we have a despatch from the Chargé d'Affaires—not a common despatch, but one of the greatest importance and to which an answer ought to have been given in twenty-four hours in a manner to have influenced the Court at which he was resident. Nevertheless, nothing was done till a few days before Parliament assembled, and then we find a despatch from Earl Cowley in which the noble Earl predicting the storm that was rising, alluded to what he calls the interpellations which might be made in both Houses of Parliament, and knowing that, although he had warned the Minister frequently, his warnings had been expressed in documents which it would not be parliamentary to refer to, absolutely did that which, as far as my experience goes, is without example in the history of diplomacy—referred for his vindication to his private letters in his public despatches. An Ambassador must be hard pressed, a Minister must be in a peculiar position, when he pursues such a course. Parliament meets, and we are presented with a high-sounding despatch. We have had a high-sounding despatch before. Remember the Russian war. We now know the secret of the circumstances which led to that war. It was a grave secret. An accident revealed it. Fifty years might have passed before the secret cause of the Russian war—the communications which took place between the Emperor, Sir Hamilton Seymour, and Her Majesty's Government—could be discovered; but it was accidentally discovered. What happened then? We had a high-sounding despatch, recounting the history of the last of the Medici and the War of Succession; but that despatch, though written with so much literary ability, did not prevent the Russian war. Let us remember, then, that a rhetorical despatch is not a specific against an impending war, if causes exist in Europe calculated to bring it about. I sum up, therefore, in this way, so far as this discussion is concerned, the points upon which I require information—namely, why, with ample information as to the intentions of the French Government, in the event of the aggrandizement of Sardinia, to annex Savoy, Her Majesty's Government took no step whatever to influence the French Government to a contrary policy, while they pursued a policy in Italy which must necessarily lead to that aggrandizement? Why, also, when Her Majesty's Government communicated formally their plan for the settlement of Italy to foreign Courts, they made no simultaneous communication that the adoption of their Italian policy must necessarily bring about the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France? We have had no answer on these points, although we have been replied to by the two most eminent members of the Ministry. Let us now see what has been the conduct of France. Whenever we have made inquiries of the Government as to their foreign policy in this matter, the noble Lord has told us that questions might have a very pernicious effect upon our relations with our near neighbour. He has denounced these inquiries as irritating, as unstatesmanlike. He has told us that information of this kind, if sought for, should be sought for in a more formal manner; and of late—only of late—he has deprecated altogether any discussion. If, when the first inquiry was made about this business of Savoy, the noble Lord had got up in his place, and had said that communications upon the subject at the moment could not be made without serious injury to the public service, and had appealed to the patriotic forbearance of the House of Commons and of the Opposition, as far as I am concerned—and I can answer for every hon. Gentleman who sits on these benches—not a word from that time would have ever issued from our lips. But the noble Lord laid papers on the table, informed us of what had passed, and solicited our opinion. There may be hon. Gentlemen in this House who consider the conduct of the Emperor of the French highly alarming to Europe, and that it ought to be arrested at once by a decided course. But, as they sit on the same side of the House as the noble Lord, he has naturally as much influence upon them as upon us. I say that, so far from irritating conversations in Parliament, dangerous to the public interests, annoying and enfeebling the course of a Government, no British Minister has ever had any real cause for complaint of that kind. The noble Lord has himself placed papers on the table of the House. Why are these papers on the question of the annexation of Savoy laid upon our table if not to invite inquiry—not censure, and probably not confidence? The tastes of the Government are always in the extreme. Nothing seems to suit them but confidence or censure. But, Sir, there is a middle course. The House of Commons has the constitutional right to be made fairly acquainted with public affairs. But they have more than that right. They have a duty to fulfil when a Minister places papers on the table. They must consider those papers, and form an opinion upon them. If on reading those papers their opinion is that the information is imperfect, that it is obscure or involved in mystery, that the narrative requires explanation, short of the expression of confidence or censure, they are bound to take the usual Parliamentary means to make the information sufficient. And I am not aware, as far as I am myself concerned, that I have taken any other means than those which the custom of Parliament recognizes in endeavouring to obtain more ample and more accurate information than has yet been placed upon the table. But let us look at this point of our relations with France, and the danger to those relations in consequence of discussing this question of the annexation of Savoy, because that is why the noble Lord deprecates discussion. I said the other night, and I repeat it, that as far as the conduct of the French Government to the English Government—and therefore, of course, to the English nation—is concerned, it has been a frank, candid, sincere, and straightforward policy. I see nothing that we have to complain of as regards France. I do not see where our quarrel can be with France. France, according to my interpretation of these documents—and I doubt whether after this debate that interpretation can be successfully impugned—France has given timely and repeated notice of her policy. She has told us that if Sardinia be excessively aggrandized she must annex Savoy and Nice; and when there was a notion prevalent that by the Treaty of Zurich or by some arrangement in the spirit of the Treaty of Zurich, the ultra-aggrandizement of Sardinia would not take place, France informed us that she had renounced her policy; and among the latest documents on the table we find again the willingness of France expressed, if the Duchies only, irrespective of Tuscany, were added to Sardinia, although that would be a considerable aggrandizement, not to insist on her policy of annexing Savoy and Nice. I want to know then what quarrel, as far as the announcement of her intentions is concerned, we have with France? None. May all Powers always behave with the same frankness and candour. But this is not all. France told us fairly that if Sardinia were aggrandized, and became a considerable Italian Power, she must inevitably take this course of reconstructing her military frontier. And with that knowledge, Her Majesty's Government favoured a policy which, he knew, must necessarily lead to annexation. I do not want to enter into the merits of the Italian policy of Her Majesty's Government on this occasion, as it would only render confused the clear point to which I wish to confine this discussion. For the sake of argument, I will grant that it may be better for England that Sardinia should be a powerful State, and France should have her frontier extended. That may be the best policy for England; but we cannot turn round and denounce France for annexing the Sardinian provinces, when for months and months she has told us it would be the inevitable consequence and absolute condition of the policy which we were favouring in Italy. Therefore, I say, these are not discussions which tend to irritate and injure the French Emperor and the French nation. They are discussions which may irritate and injure somebody else. The French Government is not the Government which will be ultimately affected by a fair discussion and debate on this policy, and therefore I think we may remove that bugbear from our minds, and not allow ourselves to be thwarted in an expression of opinion upon the conduct of the Government at a moment of interest and importance. My hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. D. Griffith) in one of those entertaining and eccentric speeches with which he enlivens our debates, seemed to me to make a much better defence of the Government, than the noble Lord, the Foreign Secretary, or the noble Viscount, the Chief Minister. They seized with avidity on one of his ingenious speculations. The noble Lord, the Secretary of State, laboured with considerable power, and the Prime Minister followed his example, to prove what?—that they had not succeeded in aggrandizing Sardinia; that it must not be attributed to them, if the Duchies and Tuscany were annexed to that country; that they were not able Ministers; that they had no sincerity; that they had had no success; that it was a wild idea of the House of Commons, to suppose they had accomplished any good whatever, and that it was all mere chance. I gave them credit for deeper design and finer execution. I really thought that the noble Lord, the Foreign Secretary, who has been brooding over Italy for so many years since he first visited it and tried his 'prentice hand at revolution and renovation, had really matured an arrangement with such felicity, that success was inevitable. And I have always been saying, "It is a very serious thing that Savoy and Nice should be annexed to France. Still, though the price may be costly, the treasure gained for the price is not mean. We are in the hands of an eminent statesman, by whose ceaseless labour, happy vigilance, and blended prudence and courage, we shall have at last a chance of a free and independent Italy." "Not at all," says the noble Lord; "we have had nothing to do with it." When the noble Lord considered himself justified in sending proposals for the settlement of Italy to all the Powers of Europe, I thought at least there must be some moral influence in Her Majesty's Government under such circumstances. Nobody can read those proposals—nobody has ever read them, or ever will read them, without applying to them one sense only—namely, that if not a statesmanlike, it was certainly a safe mode, of accomplishing the annexation of the Duchies to Sardinia; and I really did not think the noble Lord would deprive himself and his colleagues of the fair renown which was to be gained by the successful accomplishment of that project. If that be the true view of the case, if France has from the first frankly informed us of her policy, if we, being thus forewarned, have pursued an Italian scheme that inevitably forwarded the policy of France, then I say that England cannot complain of the candour and conduct of the French Government, or of the policy they have pursued. But what is this policy? The noble Secretary is astonished that the House should notice this policy; questions are irritating, a conversation may be perilous to the peace of Europe. The noble Lord even did that which is a peculiarity of some members of the present Cabinet, but certainly not of himself—he lost his temper. He says it is not to be tolerated that the House of Commons should inquire respecting a policy which has been described by the Government, and therefore which humble Members like myself need not seek words again to give an account of it to the House and country. But I venture to say that there is no language on record more calculated to convey to the country that something is happening to alarm, to endanger, and to injure them, than the description which Her Majesty's Government, by the mouth of the Secretary of State, has given of the intended policy of France. The noble Lord's celebrated despatch has been read to-night, and is still fresh in every one's mind; but not merely in that despatch, but also in the House of Commons, one night, the noble Lord wishing, I suppose, to influence events, as a person of authority speaking in a place of authority, expressed the views of the Government on that subject. The words he used were not the calm expressions of the first Minister to-night. No! the noble Lord used language directly calculated to impress upon Parliament and the country that a crisis might be at hand of the most fearful kind; and he appealed to the highest feelings of the Emperor, and even calculated the horoscope of his futurity, to dissuade him from a course which might distract and alarm Europe, and lead to appalling consequences. If such be the policy of the Emperor—and remember it is not the Opposition, not an independent Member on either side of the House, who has given us this description of it—if that be the policy involved in the annexation of these two Sardinian provinces, is it to be expected that the House of Commons should be silent? Is it to be expected that hon. Gentlemen should not avail themselves of some opportunity of ascertaining whether there is or is not a chance of so terrible a danger being averted from the country? The very fact that a Minister should have written that despatch, made that speech denouncing this policy, would alone in old times and even in the present time have been thought a sufficient reason for devoting nearly every night to the subject. Hon. Members would naturally come down and ask Her Majesty's Ministers whether there is any prospect of less distraction and alarm in Europe than the noble Lord spoke of the other night, whether the danger which the noble Lord apprised us was impending over Europe may be mitigated, whether there is no chance of escape left open to us. An inexhaustible fund of inquiries on the Motion for adjournment on Friday! I look forward to Fridays with great alarm, after the denunciation of the policy of the Emperor of the French by the noble Lord. Every night we may inquire anxiously as to the prospect of the long and sanguinary struggles associated in men's minds with the policy of the Emperor of the French. I who take an interest in the peaceful settlement of France, and do not wish to see a change of dynasties, might inquire from the noble Lord whether any fair prospect of the present dynasty continuing really existed. It is unfair, after the Government have gone out of the way to alarm and terrify the country, for them to turn round on us if we ask for any information and say we are imperilling the peace of Europe and doing what is unworthy of the House of Commons. I do not denounce the policy of the Emperor of the French in the alarming language of the noble Lord; but I think it is a policy which demands the calm and careful consideration of the country. It is a policy which involves a great principle, and the Emperor of the French in his speech from his throne has not concealed the principle which regulates his conduct. He has recognized the natural boundaries of his empire, and every one knows, nay, the noble Lord the First Minister himself has fairly, and fully acknowledged to-night, what consequences may possibly emanate from the adoption of such a principle of action by a Prince so powerful as the Emperor, ruling over a nation which has had some sad, but at the same time, much celebrated experience of that principle in practice. I think it is a policy of very great danger, but I cannot see that with regard to the question of these annexations either the Government or the nation have any cause of quarrel with France. The Government of France have given us warning of their policy; we have worked to accomplish that policy; where, then, is our cause of complaint and controversy? But that does not alter the state of circumstances, and if those terrible consequences which the noble Lord has foreseen do occur—if that principle of natural boundaries of empires now to be countenanced by, as I believe, the certain annexation of Savoy and Nice be realized; if distrust and despair be spread throughout Europe; if there be scenes of horror and sanguinary war; if empires be overthrown and dynasties subverted—then I say it is the Minister, it is the Government, who assisted that policy who will be responsible to their country and to history for those calamitous results.

MR. KINGLAKE said, he would trouble the House with but few observations. In the first place, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken in thinking that the tendency of the discussion had been, not to increase the venom which seemed at one time to be infused into it, but, on the contrary, very considerably to remove it. Much of what fell from the noble Lord at the head of the Government was, he thought, extremely gratifying. It was of importance that they should know as soon as possible whether, as the noble Lord said he had reason to believe and hope, the Emperor intended that the annexation of Savoy and Nice would not take place without the counsel and approval of the Powers to be consulted. If that were the case, there was an end to all discussion and all ill-humour. No one in the House had ever said that angry reluctance should be shown by the great States of Europe to consider this question if fairly submitted to them by the Emperor of the French. All he and others had said was, that it might be dangerous to Europe, if the annexation took place without the consent of the great Powers; and if they could be assured that it would not be done without that consent, then they would be content. He must say, however, that the noble Viscount seemed inclined to put more favourable constructions upon the conduct of the Emperor of the French than he did on that of the Members of the House of Commons. The Motion which he (Mr. Kinglake) had put on the paper suggested only a very slight shade of difference between the view he entertained and that which the Government had adopted; and yet the Ministers took it upon them to impute to himself and others who agreed with him that they were favourable to a war policy. He indignantly repelled that accusation. There was no man in the House who looked with greater horror upon the calamity of war than he did. It had been his fate to see something of the horrors of war, and if the sight of those horrors had had any effect on his mind, it was to increase his detestation of those who wickedly inflicted such evils on mankind, and certainly not to lessen the disgust with which they must all look on the cruelty of wantonly involving any nation in war. The noble Viscount had told them that the policy of the Empire was the policy of peace, and that the war of last year was no exception to that policy. He had waited with much curiosity to learn how the noble Lord would justify that extraordinary statement. The noble Viscount had justified it by asserting that the recent war was a noble enterprise. He supposed, therefore, that the noble Viscount agreed with the Emperor that it was a war for "an idea," and that as such it deserved the applause of England. For his own part, he believed that if ever there was a war begun more in cold blood than another it was the late war with Austria, from the first rupture on New Year's Day. The noble Lord seemed to think we were bound at the outset of any discussion with a foreign Power to make up our mind at once whether the question was one worth going to war about, and that we should disclose the result of our meditations. That was contrary to all diplomatic usage, was inconsistent with a course of peace, and was a mode of argument either extremely offensive or entirely imbecile. Though he greatly approved a great deal of the language used by the Foreign Secretary in the correspondence, yet, when the correspondence was compared with the events which followed, one could not help feeling that there was about the whole of it an appearance of the want of reality. The language had not produced its natural result. The noble Lord remonstrated in very strong and vigorous language; but his remonstrances appeared to be vain for all purposes, producing neither acquiescence nor irritation, nor counter argument, but being treated simply as null, and the French Emperor calmly proceeded to deliver his speech to the French Chamber, pleasantly alluding to his relations with Foreign Powers, and his intended annexation of these two provinces. What had transpired during the present discussion afforded some explanation of this matter. It appeared that in July the Foreign Secretary strongly protested against the annexation of Savoy and Nice, and was told, upon the conclusion of peace, that the idea had been abandoned. Afterwards, when it became probable that Central Italy would become annexed to Piedmont, it then appeared to have been fairly enough stated to Earl Cowley that in that case the Emperor would recur to the abandoned idea of the annexation of the two provinces to France. The noble Foreign Secretary said that, inasmuch as the event which was to cause the annexation was only contingent, he thought it his duty to abstain from making any protest against a merely contingent event; but the result was that our relation with France on this question was now very much altered, because the Government of France could say, "We told you all along that we should claim as a counterpoise this annexation of Savoy, and, though you before protested against the latter, yet when it was mentioned, coupled with the annexation of Central Italy, you did not think it necessary to express disapproval."

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he thought the tone of the noble Lord, the First Minister, had been much more satisfactory that evening than when he addressed the House on a former occasion, when he told hon. Members that if they proceeded to discuss this question of the annexation of Savoy they might probably endanger the relations of this country with France; and that, if they referred to the subject at all, they were bound to bring forward a vote of censure. Whether they would ever have an opportunity of discussing the question in a way to have any influence with regard to the annexation it was impossible for him to say; but it appeared to him that long before the House would have that opportunity the annexation would be completely perfected. The peculiar relation in which the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) had placed himself with Earl Cowley had, in his opinion, put the noble Lord in a false position with regard to the House. No one acquainted with the character of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary would believe him capable of want of candour to the House or of wilfully misleading it, yet the peculiar manner in which private letters were mixed up with official communications placed the noble Lord in such difficulty that it was impossible for him at an early part of the Session to answer the questions of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire without appearing to speak uncandidly or in a way to mislead the House. The noble Lord was asked whether he was aware of any communications or negotiations with respect to the annexation of Savoy and Nice, and what was his answer? The noble Lord referred to certain communications which took place last July, and said that any desire for the annexation of Savoy which had been felt by the French Government had been definitely abandoned, and he added that, as far as he knew, no negotiation was on foot for the cession of Savoy. Now, the noble Lord felt the difficulty of referring to private letters, which had informed him that between July and the time when he spoke the French Government had repeatedly warned him that circumstances had so far changed that they did contemplate the annexation, and, under certain circumstances, they must regard it as a political necessity. This showed the dangerous effect of a course which as he (Mr. S. FitzGerald) believed the noble Lord had adopted, for the first time in the history of our diplomacy, of mixing up private correspondence with the official communications of our Minister at a Foreign Court, and he trusted that for the future such a practice would be abandoned. As regarded the conduct of the Government in other respects, it was abundantly clear that it was liable to great disapprobation on two points. In the first place, it put us in a disadvantageous position with respect to France, as it almost placed France in the position of being right, and England in the position of being wrong, and the French Emperor was entitled to say, "I never concealed my desire or intention to effect the annexation of Savoy. During October, November, and December of last year I never ceased to tell you that on a certain contingency I should consider it a political necessity to possess myself of Savoy. I communicated that to your Minister; he must have communicated it to you—I care not whether by public or by private letters. Did you then hold to me the language of remonstrance which for three months past you have used, and which you now address to the House of Commons? Had I not every reason to suppose that you assented to this annexation? I told you that, in the event of a certain territorial aggrandizement by Sardinia, I should think it necessary, for the security of France, that she should possess Savoy. You continued to urge a policy the result of which has been the aggrandizement of Sardinia; you urged the establishment of a great Italian kingdom, and therefore I was entitled to assume that you considered that to be worth the acquisition of Savoy by France." The noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) was still sanguine that this project of annexation would be abandoned. But from the beginning to the end of this business the

Mr. Seymour FitzGerald

Government had manifested a facility of conviction which was most extraordinary. First, the Foreign Secretary told the House that, after all, there would not be much danger, because the great Powers of Europe were to be consulted before the annexation took place. The Prime Minister had to-night repeated that conviction; but since those words were first used had not the Emperor of the French stated in his speech to the Chambers that, instead of "consulting" the great Powers, the subject would only be "explained" (exposé) to them? Nobody, in fact, now believed that the consent of the great Powers would be asked to perfect this annexation. Well, then, the House were told that the wishes of the Savoyards would be ascertained. But that project, too, had now been abandoned, and the will of the municipalities was alone to be taken. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had also told the House that there was a further guarantee, because, before the surrender of Sardinian territory, the Sardinian Parliament would be consulted. But he found a fact calculated to throw a curious light upon that point set forth in a journal which was at one time the most influential organ of independent opinion in France, but which was understood to be at present one of the organs of the French Government—he meant the Journal des Debats. From that journal he learned that, although Count Cavour's despatch, as it appeared in the telegram, contained an assurance of this kind, all reference to any expression of opinion on the part of the Sardinian Parliament was omitted from the despatch when inserted in the Moniteur. Thus, all the guarantees which were to secure a legal and peaceable annexation had one by one disappeared. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) had expressed the general feeling of the House when he said that this should not for one moment be regarded as a question of peace or war, and that any Minister who put the question in that shape deserved great condemnation; but it was certainly never suggested by any hon. Member on that side of the House that such a course should be taken by the Government. He (Mr. S. FitzGerald) had himself suggested that this country ought to take the initiative in expressing their disapproval of the scheme in the hope that the other Powers would follow the same course—not, as the noble Lord said, that it was ever their intention in this way to enter into an offensive alliance against France, but in order that the Government should give to foreign Powers an opportunity of taking a similar course, and of offering a like remonstrance against the intended annexation. In point of fact, the noble Lord stood self-convicted and condemned for not having done so. It was only on the 5th of March that the noble Lord said—

“It is my persuasion that if this language of disapproval is held in Berlin, is held in Vienna, and is held in St. Petersburg, this project of annexation will not be persevered in.”

But hon. Members would look in vain through the papers for any communications from the noble Lord to these Courts which would secure any such protest. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) had pointed out a remarkable despatch on the 4th of February from Lord Bloomfield to the Foreign Secretary; but the noble Lord's letter to which that was an answer, was even more remarkable:—

“I transmit for your information,” it stated, “a copy of a despatch which I have addressed to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris respecting the rumour which has lately prevailed of a plan being in agitation for annexing to France Savoy and the county of Nice. Your Lordship will understand that you are not to read, still less give a copy of, this despatch to Baron Schleinitz; but in speaking to his Excellency on the subject, you will conform your language to what I have stated to Earl Cowley.”

No steps, therefore, were taken to invite from the Court of Berlin an expression of opinion which, according to the noble Lord, would have been effectual in preventing annexation. He had looked in vain through the table of contents for any such letter to Sir J. Crampton or Lord Augustus Loftus. It might possibly have been written; but, if so, it had been carefully omitted from the papers on the table. In conclusion, he hoped that to-night, at least, no one would say that expressions had been used which were calculated to irritate the feelings of the French people, and were conceived in a spirit insulting to the Emperor of that great people. He could only say that at no time had he ever used terms expressive of anything but such respect as was due to the Monarch of so great a nation. Moreover, he had never used language half so strong as that of the noble Lord, who had no right, therefore, to say that those who differed from him on this question were producing irritation between the two nations, and might embroil them in a war.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Sir, if the language of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary has been more satisfactory to the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. S. Fitzgerald), I think the language of the hon. Member must also be more satisfactory to the noble Lord. But I cannot permit the hon. Member to take advantage of a short memory in the apologetic speech we have just heard, when we know that he said the other night, “Don't let us have any figures of rhetoric in your despatches,” and that he was for re-animating the Holy Alliance. Then, he denounced the Emperor of the French by name; but now, by an ingenious change of tactics, having been thrown over and discarded, by his leader, after his denunciations of the Emperor [“No, no!”]—I am in the recollection of the House. The Irish element was strong in the hon. Gentleman at the time, and he was all for a row in Europe at any price. But now, having been completely put on one side by the temperate and able speeches of the right hon. Member (Mr. Disraeli) and of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside), the late Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs finds that he has taken an incorrect view, and now comes cap in hand to his very good friend the Emperor of the French, for whom he entertains so high an opinion. Now, I think that if, as the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater observed, there has been unreality in these despatches, there has also been unreality in this debate. I think I may take the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks in contradistinction to that taken by the hon. Member for Horsham. I think, too, that the Emperor of the French stands altogether acquitted of any deceit in this transaction. No one can read these despatches and maintain that we have a right to accuse the Emperor of the French of any deceit on his part. If there has been any deceit and any subterfuge in this transaction, I think that our good Friends the Sardinians are not quite free from that charge, and that the principle of intervention which, I am sorry to see, we are rashly running into has occasioned this little transaction. But when it is said that the treaty of 1815 has not been respected, I ask who has ever respected the treaty of 1815? The noble Viscount (Viscount Palmerston) has committed the greatest outrage upon the treaty of 1815 I ever heard of, for he has rejoiced on every occasion that Lombardy has been taken from Austria. I believe that Lombardy was guaranteed to Austria by the treaty of 1815. [A cry of "No!"] No, not guaranteed, because there is a distinction; but at any rate the treaty of 1815 was broken, when Lombardy was taken from Austria. The right hon. Member for Bucks mentioned the annexation of Cracow, but he made a great mistake when he said the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) was Premier at the time. I believe it took place in 1836 when Lord Melbourne was Prime Minister [Mr. DISRAELI: in 1840.] Well, at all events a debate on the annexation took place as far back as 1836. The annexation of Cracow was clearly a disruption of the treaty of 1815. Talk of observing the treaty of 1815! Why, every nation at every time for every purpose has put its foot on the treaty of 1815. I do not think that this country has any great interest in hindering this union of Savoy to France. I believe that the annexation of Savoy to France will not strengthen France in any hostile views against country. I believe the real thing is that you are afraid of France going to the Rhine. If you have no confidence in the Emperor of the French, why do you enter into such intimate alliances with him? The whole mistake is this, that we have certain statesmen in this country who, no doubt, with very laudable motives, are determined to interfere to raise up a central kingdom in Italy. Now, I have as great an admiration for the Italians as any man, but I am not inclined to see the Government of this country interfering for the purpose of raising up a great central kingdom in Italy. If they can work out their own independence I shall rejoice, but I am certain that the more we interfere the greater handle we shall give to the Emperor of the French to aggrandize himself. We have no right to expect if we interfere in behalf of this great kingdom of Central Italy, that the Emperor of the French, after the expenditure of so much blood and treasure, will sit down contentedly without annexation. I am surprised to hear noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen believing in proclamations about going to war for an idea. Of course, a proclamation must be issued to an army on going to war, and fine language in a proclamation for French soldiers is of great importance; but I should never suppose that if England were going to erect a central kingdom in Italy it would be for the interest of France, which is not a constitutional Government, to erect a constitutional kingdom at her own gate without some strategetical advantage to compensate her. I cannot help remarking upon the change of tactics on the part of hon. Gentlemen sitting upon the Opposition benches, and most wisely too, because of the language of the hon. Member for Horsham the other night. [Mr. S. FITZGERALD: Repeat it.] I could repeat both the language and the manner, but no man in this House who heard it will say that it was not the language of a man who had been instructed by his party to take a particular line, and who took it with all his heart. I am glad to find that the hon. Gentleman's leader has disowned the language of his Under Secretary, and I hope that in future discussions the same wise and statesman-like spirit will be manifested as that which has been shown by the Opposition leader to-night

Lord JOHN RUSSELL: I have a few words to say at the end of this debate. I cannot but remark that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Horsham (Mr. FitzGerald) has made a statement very different from that which he made the other night, because what I understood him to say then was, that there ought to be a solemn protest on the part of the Powers of Europe, and that it should be collective. [Mr. S. FITZGERALD: I never said a word of the kind.] I recollect the hon. Gentleman using the words, "a solemn protest by England to the Powers of Europe." [Mr. S. FITZGERALD: Hear!] I could not help expressing then, and I cannot help saying now, that if the Powers of Europe make a solemn protest to the Emperor of the French, it will be very difficult for them not to insist upon carrying into effect what they propose, and very difficult for the Emperor of the French to yield what he must consider in the light of a threat. But the hon. Gentleman has now changed his language. Both the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire and the hon. Member for Horsham certainly change the question and transform it very much as they please. I never heard that Her Majesty's Government had brought any charge against the Government of the Emperor of the French of deceiving them. A statement appears in Earl Cowley's despatch on this subject, and we produce that despatch. Earl Cowley says:—"I have often heard from Count Walewski the expression that if this plan, which he thought impossible, should ever succeed, in that case Savoy would be demanded by the Emperor." Earl Cowley goes on to say:—"I never gave Count Walewski any reason to suppose that such a proposal would be approved by Her Majesty's Government." I certainly have every confidence in Earl Cowley's discretion. There is no charge there in that despatch of Earl Cowley. On the contrary, he says truly that he did receive communications from Count Walewski, but that he did not think it was necessary or would be prudent to write despatches on the subject. I might have been writing every week to the French Government the views of Her Majesty's Government, and they might have replied in the language they had held to Earl Cowley, but this would have made no difference at all, because the question was a practical one, and it had not come into discussion. If the Congress had met, the question must have been discussed then; and, if not, very soon after. The hon. Gentleman says I ought to have sent despatches to Vienna, St. Petersburg, and Berlin, and have given copies of them to those Courts. Well, that is the very course I have taken. If the hon. Gentleman had waited until tomorrow, he would have found that I had done what he says I ought to have done. But the hon. Gentleman is too quick at censure, and he blames me for not doing the thing that I have been doing. But what I have not thought proper to do is to ask those Powers to conform their language to ours, or to enter into anything like an alliance or combination which might appear hostile to the Emperor. With regard to the French despatch, I cannot inform the hon. Gentleman what it contains. It has arrived to-day, but it has not been put into my hands, and I cannot say what form it may take. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks goes on repeating, but, at the same time, carefully veiling the meaning of his proposition, that this proposal of the annexation of Savoy is brought on because we persist in the policy of making a great kingdom in Central Italy and annexing Tuscany to Sardinia. But I endeavoured to explain to the right hon. Gentleman that our policy was to prevent any force from being used to control the people of Central Italy. There was one practical way of preventing these annexations, and that was by saying to the Emperor of the French, "You make very unreasonable objections when you oppose the use of force in Central Italy. Let your troops be withdrawn, let the Austrians enter, and then they will be able to restore the Grand Duke to Tuscany and the Pope to the Romagna, and then there will be an end of the question of annexation." That is the practical end to which his proposition would come. The right hon. Gentleman does not say it openly, but that was the way in which you might have prevented this project, by letting the Italians take their own course. If that proposal to the Emperor of the French were successful, the Austrians would have restored the Grand Duke in Tuscany and the Pope in Bologna, and then there would be no question of annexation. We have preferred to leave the Italians to take their own course. They have done so, and they have chosen to annex themselves to the Kingdom of Sardinia, and we are against using force to interfere with their decision.

PETERBOROUGH ELECTION.

REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

"That George Hammond Whalley, esquire, is duly elected a Citizen to serve in this present Parliament for the City of Peterborough.

"And the said determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE INDIAN ARMY.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to move an Address for certain papers connected with the subject of the organization of the army in India. The subject involved was one of the greatest importance, relating as it did to the future safety of our possessions in India, and the well-being of 200,000,000 of people. He mentioned the case of an outrage which was committed by an English officer in desecrating an Hindoo temple, in which some robbers had taken refuge, quite in ignorance; but, still, the entrance of the officer was a desecration of the temple, and created a very unpleasant feeling in the minds of the people. What he wanted to see was that the attention of officers and others who went to India should be specially directed to a knowledge of the habits and the prejudices of the Hindoo race, in order to enable them to avoid shocking those feelings which had long existed among the Natives, and could not now be removed. It might be that the establishment of a local force might be beneficial, because at present the constant changing of the troops and the continual influx of fresh officers not only was injurious to the service generally, but the manner in which it affected and increased the patronage was by no means advantageous. A local army in India got acclimatized through remaining there many years, and the loss of life was very much less than that among the new-comers; indeed, it was only two per cent as against seven per cent. We had now 600 British officers in a state of uncertainty as to their future position, and they feared that the cadetship system having been done away with, it might be followed by some change which would be detrimental to their interest. He thought they ought to be relieved from the doubt and distress in which those officers were placed. With respect to the production of the Returns he could not believe that the Government could object.

RELIGIOUS WORSHIP BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. LOCKE KING said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, the only objection to which he thought was that it did not go far enough, but he was prepared to move in Committee the insertion of words which would extend its scope. The object of the measure was simply to extend that freedom of religious worship at present enjoyed by the ministers of every other denomination to the clergy of the Established Church. The Nonconformist clergy had, since 1855, been able to preach the Gospel anywhere and in any place; but the clergy of the Established Church were unable to do so. If a clergyman held a religious service in any place not regularly appointed without the permission of the incumbent of the parish, and the licence of the Bishop, he was liable to ecclesiastical censure, and to be proceeded against before a tribunal more to be dreaded than any other Court in the kingdom—the Ecclesiastical Court. Religious worship was admitted by all to be the best mode of preventing crime, and yet in consequence of the present state of the law many places that might be opened for Divine worship were now closed, and multitudes of persons would remain destitute of religious teaching unless the Nonconformists came to their aid. Some localities were a great distance from the parish church, and there were many persons who, from whatever cause it might be, would attend worship in other buildings who would not go to a church; and many clergymen without a cure of souls were willing to perform Divine service in other buildings than churches were they not precluded from doing so. From the evidence of Dr. Hume, of Liverpool, before the Lords' Committee on church rates, it appeared that in Southwark 63 per cent of the population attended no place of worship; in Sheffield, 62 per cent; Oldham, 61½ per cent; Brighton, 54; Manchester, 51; Westminster, 50; Coventry, 50; while in 34 of the great towns of England, containing a population of 3,993,467, there were no less than 2,197,388, or 52½ per cent of their whole population, who attended no place of worship whatever. Dr. Hume stated his belief that by the close of the present century 70 per cent of the gross population of the country will be seated in large towns; if the large towns, therefore, were left to themselves, "practical heathenism must inevitably soon outgrow Christianity." Were they, then, to set their faces against these facts, and prevent these multitudes from having the Gospel preached to them? The harvest was indeed great. So, indeed, were the numbers of the reapers; but they stood in the way of the reapers—indeed, practically forbade them by the present state of the law. Something had been done in the metropolis by preaching in theatres, but as the law stood it was illegal for a clergyman to do it; was it desirable that it should be illegal? The clergy of the Church of England had, at first, a strong prejudice against these services in theatres; but many, seeing the good results of the practice, had now entirely changed their opinion. It was a fact that enormous masses of people would attend a service in the theatre who would not go to any place of worship; and it was an extraordinary fact that the clergymen of the churches in the neighbourhood of these theatres found no decrease in the number of their congregations. That the holding a religious service in a theatre by a clergyman of the Church of England was illegal there could be no doubt. The Church of England Protection Society had submitted the case to Dr. Phillimore for his opinion, and he had stated that such a service could not be legally performed by a clergyman—that in doing so he made himself liable to ecclesiastical censure and penalties. He added that “no proposition of ecclesiastical law was better supported by decisions both of the temporal and ecclesiastical courts.” Such was the opinion of Dr. Phillimore, and he felt assured the House would, under those circumstances, see how desirable it was to secure the object which the Bill proposed to effect. Public opinion was no doubt stronger than ecclesiastical law; but it might happen that in some dioceses an unfortunate clergyman might be proceeded against by his diocesan, and subjected to the penalties of ecclesiastical law unless the state of the law was altered. He might add that he should be prepared in Committee, if the Bill should reach that stage, to introduce into it words by which a clergyman under ecclesiastical censure should be precluded from the advantages which the Bill would confer. He might also state that as he understood some hon. Gentlemen looked upon the probable operation of the measure with alarm, as enabling a clergyman to perform services in any private house, against the will of the proprietor, he should, if it were necessary—which he did not believe was the case—introduce into the Bill words by which that objection would be entirely obviated. The Bill was necessary and desirable, not merely on the ground of expediency, but also on the higher ground that its provisions were in conformity with the express teaching of the New Testament. The command of the Saviour was, “Go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature,” without restriction to place; and in the parable of the Marriage Supper, the invitations were not confined to those who assembled in the temple, but to those in the highways and hedges. The clergy assumed to themselves to be the successors of the Apostles. Let us see what the Apostles did. The Apostles did not require a church in which to preach the Gospel; they not only preached in houses, but broke bread from house to house. Now, contrast what the Apostles actually did, and what our Saviour commanded with the canon of the Church, which says no minister shall preach or administer the Holy Communion in a private house! Priestcraft may do a great deal, but it cannot do away with the Divine commands, and set up the canon law in its place. For those reasons he hoped the House would agree to the second reading of his Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

Mr. WALPOLE said, the hon. Gentleman had, in the course of his speech, made several observations, in the justice of which he entirely concurred. He could not at the same time give his assent to the conclusion at which the hon. Gentleman had arrived, inasmuch as he was of opinion that if this Bill were to pass in its present shape it would give satisfaction neither to the members of that Church for which he proposed to legislate, nor, what was of far more importance, conduce to the interests of religion itself. The hon. Gentleman very justly contended that nothing could be more to be regretted than the disproportion between the numbers of the uneducated and uninstructed population of the country, and the means of providing for their spiritual destitution, and he could assure the House that any measure by which that destitution could be met would receive his most cordial and unqualified support. He was sure that the House was anxious to promote that great Christian religion which was common to all; but he believed the large majority of the House was also of opinion that that object could be best promoted by observing, in respect of the Church as well as secular communities, certain regulations for the conduct of their proceedings. The Bill under discussion would not secure that end in a satisfactory manner, but its operation would rather be to produce in every parish throughout the kingdom the utmost confusion. With regard to a minister preaching in a private house against the will of the inhabitants, he saw no reason for any prohibition being introduced into the Bill, because, under its present form, the law gave no such power. The Bill was very short, and its effect would never, therefore, strike the House directly. The Bill was simply a Bill to enable any minister of the Church of England or Ireland to celebrate Divine service according to the rights and ceremonies of the Church in any place, the canons and the law notwithstanding. The first objection to the measure which he would urge was, that unless the hon. Gentleman was prepared to alter by some provision, subsequently to be introduced into it, the canon law of the Church, it would fail to effect its object; for if no such alteration were made, how, he should like to know, could the members of the Established Church, who subscribed to that law, obey an Act of Parliament which merely said that they might do certain things, the canon law notwithstanding? The hon. Gentleman was no doubt taking a most laudable course in desiring to provide for the spiritual destitution of the people. He had quoted Dr. Hume to prove to what an extent that destitution existed, and had described the advantages which had resulted from the fact that permission had been accorded to the ministers of the Church to make use of certain public buildings—as had been recently done in this metropolis—for the purpose of supplying to some extent the spiritual wants of the community. Now, if the description which the hon. Gentleman had given of those advantages was correct, was it not true that the evils of which he complained had been practically half met? That being so, and no disinclination to provide for the existing spiritual destitution on the part of the clergy being observable, a minister of religion, being at liberty to administer the rites of the Church with the consent of the clergyman of the parish in any particular district, and being under present circumstances frequently called upon to afford such assistance,—he could not see that the necessity of altering the law as it stood had been established. So far as his own experience went, he might say that there was hardly a parish in the kingdom in which the clergyman would not invite further spiritual aid to supply the wants of his parishioners. The only difficulty in the matter was to provide a fund by means of which clergymen would be placed in a position to carry their wishes in that respect into execution. But what the hon. Gentleman would effect if his Bill came into operation would be to confer a right on anybody in the Church of England to administer its sacraments and to perform its ceremonies in a manner which might be contrary to the wishes of the inhabitants, and possibly to the disturbance of the peace of the parish in which that right happened to be exercised. That being his opinion, he would appeal to the hon. Gentleman whether it was desirable that, in his eagerness to secure a good object—an object which the Bill would not really accomplish—he should proceed with a measure calculated to produce evils which would more than counterbalance those to which he sought to apply a remedy? Of course, in dealing with the subject, hon. Members could have only one end in view, for they all concurred in the necessity of preaching the Gospel and the expediency of providing, as far as possible, for the spiritual destitution of the people.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that while agreeing in most of what had fallen from his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) there was one portion of his speech from which he felt bound to dissent. He alluded to that portion of it in which he had stated that all the Members of the House concurred as to the necessity of preaching the Gospel. That, he should beg to remind his right hon. Friend, was not exactly the case, for there were four hon. Members who did not believe in the necessity of preaching the Gospel, and by those Gentlemen, whom recent legislation had admitted within the walls of the House, such discussions as the present, he contended, must be regarded as an insult. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] He would repeat it, there was no longer any community between the Christian religion and the House of Commons, and all references to Christianity, and all quotations from the Bible, must now be not only out of place, but an insult to those four Gentlemen. So far as the Bill under discussion was concerned, he was of opinion that its operation would be to destroy that authority which a Bishop ought to have it in his power to exercise within his own diocese. He would remind the House that it was the Bishop who had spiritual charge of his diocese, and they had no more right to interfere with a Bishop in his diocese, and to say that whether he liked or not he should have a particular preaching, than they would have to interfere with every clergyman in his particular parish. At present if the clergyman preached heretical doctrine or otherwise misconduct himself in the performance of his duties within his jurisdiction the Bishop had a power of inhibition; but that power would, after the passing of the Bill, be confined to clergymen who officiated in consecrated places, and would not include these whose services would, after the passing of the measure, be called into existence. To introduce such a state of things as that would be, he maintained to create a revolution in the Church, and a proposition which would have that effect ought not, at all events, to be acceded to in a thin House on a Wednesday morning. Should a Bill of such wide scope and so revolutionary in its tendency pass that House, it was sure to come to an unfortunate end in "another place." This being so, he hoped the hon. Member would not persevere with it, or, that if he did, the House would at once reject it.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that had he not been one of the four Gentlemen personally alluded to by the noble Lord, he should not have taken part in this discussion. The noble Lord no doubt was one of those who had been incapable of understanding the motives and principles by which persons of his (Sir F. Goldsmid's) persuasion were actuated before the Bill passed by which they were admitted to Parliament, and who appeared to be equally incapable of understanding them now that it was law. The noble Lord seemed to be totally unable to understand how it was possible for a Member of the Jewish persuasion to combine attachment to his own faith with a wish that persons born in the Christian faith should be instructed in the doctrines of that religion. He could, however, assure the noble Lord that the two things were perfectly compatible, and that any measure which was brought forward with the view of providing increased facilities for those born in the Christian faith should—although he might take no prominent part in its discussion—be looked upon by him, and those whose religious opinions were the same as his, with favour rather than the contrary. He would go further, and although he was reluctant to refer to a personal matter, tell the noble Lord that in those places with which they were connected by ties of property members of the Jewish persuasion did not scruple—nay, were as anxious as other landlords were—to facilitate the establishment of houses of religious worship and schools in which instruction was conveyed in the Christian religion to those who had been brought up in that faith. He would say nothing more, but he hoped he had made it intelligible to the House, though probably it was not intelligible to the noble Lord, that any measure which really tended to promote freedom of religious worship could not be regarded by persons of his own religion as an insult to themselves.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, that speaking from his personal knowledge of a distinguished family who professed the Jewish religion, and to which two of the hon. Members alluded to belonged, he could testify that there were no persons who performed those duties more liberally, to which the hon. Gentleman who last spoke had just referred, and none who showed more regard to the religious feelings of others. With regard now to this Bill, he had strong objections to it. The Bill did not in fact remedy the supposed illegality of the services of the Church of England which had taken place, with good effect, in some large public buildings in London. If Dr. Phillimore's opinion were correct, that any clergyman who performed those services, even with the full consent of his Bishop, might be cited to answer for a breach of the law, it might be worth the consideration of the House, and indeed extremely useful, to prevent that difficulty. But the Bill would not suffice for that purpose as it stood, though it would allow services of the Church of England, whether High Church or Low Church, to be set up by anybody in parishes where, perhaps, the custom and feeling of the Churchmen there were opposed to the method so introduced. He should be glad, therefore, if his hon. Friend would withdraw this Bill, and bring in one more likely to effect the object which he really desired to attain—an object with which the House would sympathize.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have heard with great regret the observations of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) with regard to gentlemen professing the Jewish religion, and the untenable—indeed,

I will say—highly inconvenient doctrine he has laid down as to the effect of their admission here upon the deliberations and duties of this House. It may be the conscientious opinion of the noble Lord that the duties of this House are totally altered by the admission of hon. Gentlemen professing the Jewish religion within its walls; but that is an opinion hardly worthy of his undoubted ability and high intelligence, and one which is very unworthy of the respect which we owe to those who have at length been admitted into the House, whilst it is also one which, if acted on, would essentially impede and cripple this House in the discharge of its duties. In fact, the opinions of the noble Lord, if full effect were given to them, are totally opposed to the admission into this House of any persons professing any religious sentiments other than those held by the Members of the Established Church. Now, without going back to the case of Dissenters, which was of an earlier date, more than thirty years have elapsed since we avowedly recognized the admission into Parliament of persons not professing the Established religion of the country; and I would appeal to any one connected with the Established religion, including those who are in an especial manner responsible for the defence of its interests, to say whether any injury at all to those interests has arisen from the right which has been conceded. On the contrary, as one of those who represent a large portion of the clergy of this country, I must answer that appeal in the negative, and bear my testimony to the fact that nothing can be more remarkable, as a general rule, than the considerate liberality and the high feeling with which hon. Gentlemen not professing the Established religion of the country have refrained from using any privilege or power they had obtained, as Members of this House, to the prejudice of that religion. Now, I cannot help, as to this Bill, joining in the request of my hon. Friend who has just sat down, that the hon. Mover will not press it, in its present form, upon the House, but will choose some other and more carefully considered instrument, to give effect to his views. I listened to the speech of the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), and I can only take one exception to it. There is a great inconvenience in pressing texts of scripture here into the service of our particular opinions relative to this measure or that. It is a game which two can play at, but which, I think, no one can play at without considerable disparagement to the reverence which we owe to the sacred origin of those words. It would not, perhaps, be difficult for me to show, if it were requisite, by citations from the New Testament, that the ecclesiastical discipline of the early days was exceedingly strict, and that the Apostles of the church inflicted upon offenders, in the matters alluded to, punishments much more severe than any contemplated by, or consonant with the spirit of, modern legislation. But considering the question on general grounds, the object of the hon. Mover is, I presume, comparatively a limited one, and perhaps he is not himself aware of what would be the real scope and effect of his Bill. If he thinks that certain specific enlargements ought to be made of the powers and liberties of clergymen in the performance of divine service, let him make a certain specific proposal limited to the object in view. But this is a Bill the author of which contemplates something quite different to that which it would effect, and I ask him, let us not be put in the painful position of being obliged to vote against a measure which appears to contemplate the extension of the preaching of the gospel, since the object of the measure will probably be judged out of doors by the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has introduced it, and not by what may be shown to be its real consequence. It appears to me that the remark of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) is quite just, that this is a measure which would introduce anarchy and confusion into almost every parish throughout the kingdom. In any single case it might happen that the most exemplary clergyman in England, the best man, the most devoted and orthodox, the most able preacher and amiable pastor, might have, I will not say a minority differing from him on some particular point, but some one parishioner, with a house large enough to assemble a congregation in it, although that parishioner might have no cause of quarrel with him, except a cause creditable to the clergyman himself, as for instance, because the preaching of the clergyman had borne hardly upon his own particular vices, it would then be in the power of such a person, under this Bill, to introduce dissension into the Church by opening in that parish a room, where perhaps some disreputable person in clerical orders might be procured to carry on a rival and antagonistic service. This case might occur, strictly within the effect of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman may say that he will amend this part of the Bill in Committee, but he will find that the Bill, as it stands, requires so many Amendments that none of it will remain. It is an extemporised Bill, which has been drawn up, I presume, without any consultation with persons conversant with the law of the Church, whatever be the philanthropic and benevolent purpose of the hon. Gentleman in bringing it forward. He says, indeed, that in order to prevent any disreputable clergyman from being employed to conduct these services, he is ready to introduce words into the Bill which shall provide that no clergyman who is under ecclesiastical censure shall conduct them. I would remind the House, however, that the clergymen who will be placed under that disability are persons who have held some office in the Church, which has brought them within the scope of the censure they have received; but I am sorry to add that in so large a body as the clergy of the Church of England there are many disreputable persons who do not come under ecclesiastical censure, simply because they do not hold any ecclesiastical office or benefice. This Bill would give them, or enable them to have, ecclesiastical employment which they ought not to have, and yet they would be exempted from coming under ecclesiastical censure. I am sure the hon. Gentleman is not aware of the consequences of the Bill as it stands, and I entreat him to present us with a Bill instead of it which will do justice to the benevolent purpose he has in view, and which will be limited to the attainment of that object. It is not for us to go into Committee upon this Bill in order to fish out the measure which would be calculated to answer the purpose intended; but let him try and frame a measure adapted to the case, and bring it before the House. We ought not to commit ourselves on a matter of so much intricacy and difficulty to the second reading of a Bill until we have some idea of what will really be its effect. I had not intended to speak on this matter, but respecting as I do the hon. Gentleman's motives, it would be painful for me to vote against him, which I must nevertheless do if he presses on this Bill in its present state; but I trust he will withdraw it, for the purpose of presenting to us something better adapted to the attainment of the end in view.

Mr. HORSFALL said, that he had listened with regret to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge as to there being no disinclination on the part of the rectors and incumbents of parishes to admit other clergymen to assist in the performance of the duties which they were called upon to discharge. He did not feel at all satisfied that that statement was correct. He might, for instance, mention the case of the clergyman of a large parish who had gone into the reading-desk in an unbecoming state, as a consequence of which a large majority of the congregation had left the church. A representation on the subject had subsequently been made to the Bishop of the diocese, and a commission had been issued to inquire into the conduct of the clergyman, before which medical evidence had been adduced. The medical man said that the symptoms which had been seen in the reading-desk might have been occasioned by illness; the commissioners gave the incumbent the benefit of the doubt; but the people were convinced that they had come to a wrong decision; their feelings would not allow them to go to the church again; there was not another within four or five miles, and what were they to do? Were they to establish a Nonconformist place of worship, or must they go to the church where the reading-desk and pulpit were so much disgraced by the conduct they had seen? The right hon. Gentleman had said that if this Bill passed, it would compel the clergy to break one of the canons of the Church; but he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the clergy obeyed the whole canons of the Church? He knew that they did not, nor would it be any difficult matter to point out what those canons were. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had put the case of disreputable clergymen being introduced into a diocese. That was somewhat of a slur upon the Church of England as well as on those who were anxious for the success of this Bill. There was no disposition on the part of the supporters of this measure to introduce any but good clergymen who would faithfully and honestly discharge their duty. They were told the Bill struck at the root of the parochial system. That, however, was not the fact. It might be opposed to the spirit of the ultra-parochialism of the present day, but that was quite different from the parochial system. However admirable the parochial system was when first adopted, times and circumstances had now entirely changed. What were then mere hamlets had now become large and populous places, and they required in many cases new ecclesiastical arrangements. If the rector refused to admit other clergymen into his parish—and he knew of such cases—what was to be done? Was he to prevent the poor being provided for? The late Sir R. Peel was one of the first to amend the parochial system. He introduced a Bill the effect of which was to subdivide parishes, so that a clergyman could be introduced into a large parish and have a district allotted to him without a church. The Marquess of Blandford further extended this, and pew-rents were allotted towards the payment of the clergyman's stipend. This Bill would have the effect of making the parochial system more efficient than at present, and he hoped his hon. Friend would not be induced to withdraw it. There were two sections in the Church of England—High and Low Church. A parishioner might conscientiously differ from either one or the other; and was he to be debarred from having a chaplain in his own house, who would preach in accordance with the principles he believed to be the purest? He hoped the House would agree to the second reading of the Bill, and that in Committee the objections which had been urged by right hon. Gentlemen would be obviated. Sure he was, by adopting some such measure as this, the advocates of the Church would take a very long step towards retaining the affections of the people of England.

MR. AYRTON observed, that hon. Gentlemen opposite always talked of the Church of England as being pre-eminently the Church of the poor; but when measures were brought forward the effect of which would make that Church practically so, instead of their authors receiving the assistance they might expect from those who, by position and influence, might be recognized as the guardians of the Church, the right hon. Gentlemen representing the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge met the proposal by showing the knowledge they possessed of the subject in pointing out difficulties and objections, without, at the same time, being good enough to offer the least counsel how these might be removed. Such conduct served rather to obstruct than facilitate legislation on this difficult subject. He put the theology of the question aside. They must take the Church of England as it was, but not without reference to that other Church from which it might be regarded as having descended. In the Roman Catholic Church a very clear distinction had been always drawn between the administration of the Sacraments or the discharge of functions which were strictly confined to the priesthood and hierarchy and the more simple duty of either offering prayer or preaching the Gospel. The parochial system was essentially based on the administration of the Sacraments—it was the territorial limit of the jurisdiction of the priests; but there were oratories in which, although the Sacraments were not administered, men might pray or preach without the authority of the parish priest. And even when in the reign of Henry VIII. a Parliamentary religion was set up by statute, instead of the spiritual religion of the Catholic Church, praying and preaching in oratories were excepted from those acts of religious worship in which a compulsory uniformity was enjoined by law. It was not until the Uniformity Act of Charles II., passed under the influence of the prejudices and passions of the time, that this extravagant violation of the rights of conscience took place; while Dissenters were quite at liberty to pray and preach where and when they pleased, the Uniformity of Worship Act remained in all its stringency on the Church of England. That Act produced two distinct practical effects. A clergyman could not in any church or chapel lawfully say prayers except in the precise prescribed form, and he was not allowed to say prayers in any place different from that prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer. This Bill would be of great use where the population had outgrown the parish church, and where the spiritual destitution in large towns could not be overtaken by the present ecclesiastical machinery; and he could assure hon. Gentlemen that the Church could only stand by really being made the Church of the poor. It would not suffice to stick the people in what were called poor seats, where the finger of scorn was pointed at them. He was not going to defend the language of the Bill, because he believed it to be imperfect; but if the right hon. Gentlemen who represented the two Universities and the Church were not satisfied with it, let them pledge themselves to bring in a Bill properly drawn and providing for the technical difficulties which surrounded the question; and then, no doubt, his hon. Friend would give way in favour of legislation which would be so much better conducted. But if they would not give that pledge, contenting themselves with merely starting objections, he trusted the Bill of which the principle was admitted would be allowed to go into Committee, where they would endeavour to obviate the difficulties as well as they could.

MR. CROSS said, that he rose to join in the appeal which had been made to the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the Bill. Cordially concurring in the object sought to be obtained, he could not, however, vote for the measure in its present shape; but if the hon. Member introduced another in a more perfect form, he would support him. He could assure him that there was no disposition on the part of those that opposed the Bill to interfere with the freedom of the members of the Church of England in the preaching of the Gospel, so that all things were done decently and in order. But it could not be permitted that any parishioner who quarrelled with his clergyman should be at liberty to introduce another clergyman into the parish. Authority must be vested somewhere; and where could it be more properly than in the hands of the Bishop of the diocese? He admitted that in the present state of the law the Bishop had not sufficient power to control divergencies in practice or in doctrine, and he would very gladly see the law in that respect amended. So with regard to the use of private buildings for Divine worship. There, again, he would place the discretion in the hands of the Bishop. Let it not be said, therefore, that the members of the Church of England were opposed to the principle of this Bill. He must advert to one remark of the mover of the Bill. He said that the Apostles went about preaching from house to house, but that their successors, as he called the clergy, did not. Now, he believed that over all England the clergy did visit in their parishes from house to house, and there was certainly nothing in the state of the law to prevent them from doing so. He implored the hon. Member not to put the House into the painful position of voting against a measure which they could not approve as it stood, although they wished to pass something very like it.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, in his opinion those who opposed this Bill rendered themselves liable to the charge that they were preventing the utility of the Church of England among the poor. If hon. Gentlemen agreed in the principle of the Bill, he was surprised to find that they opposed the second reading. The usual course under such circumstances was to read the Bill a second time and amend it in Committee. For his own part he should vote for the second reading, because he agreed with the principle of the measure and believed it would have a very beneficial effect on the Church of England. The number of cases sought to be relieved by this Bill was unfortunately very great. There were parishes in which were disreputable clergymen, and others in which the parish was divided between High Church and Low Church doctrines, and he thought the parishioners ought not to be left to the mercy of their clergymen in these respects. If it was objected that this Bill put a pressure on the Bishops, he would ask whose fault was it that the Bishops were now in such a position? If the measure were objectionable, why had not the heads of the Church been consulted with the view of applying a more appropriate remedy to the admitted evils of the present system? The opposition of the Bench of Bishops had induced the noble Lord now at the head of the Government to withdraw his Ecclesiastical Discipline Bill. The Irish Bench, however, had acted in a far more conciliatory spirit, and the Earl of Derby had, with their consent, introduced another Bill of the same nature, which passed the House of Lords, and was only prevented becoming law by the dissolution of Parliament. Why should not that measure be again introduced? He trusted the English Prelates would follow the example of their right rev. Brethren, and consent to a measure which would improve the Ecclesiastical discipline, and sweep away the existing abuses. It had been said that this Bill interfered improperly with the parochial system. But it must be remembered that the Church of England inclosed within her pale little more than half the population of the community—and were no changes to be adopted in accordance with the altered facts of the case? He thought that parish ministers were too autocratic in their parishes, and he believed that the opposite of what hon. Gentlemen had anticipated could occur, and that many persons who now attended dissenting places of worship would return to the parish church. Being ready to vote for the second reading, he was also ready to support any necessary Amendments; but he really wished to make the Church of England more of a national Church and to see her influence more widely extended amongst the poorer classes of the community.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that in order to bring the matter to a conclusion he would move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. The question was not one between Churchmen and Dissenters, but one which affected only the internal discipline of the Church of England. The hon. Member for Surrey and the Gentleman who supported him had argued entirely apart from the real purport of the Bill. If great need actually existed for further public ministrations in the Church, and for theatres and other large public buildings being licensed for the performance of religious service according to the rules of the Church, let a measure be brought forward avowedly with that object; and it would no doubt receive the support of many who opposed the present one. His objection to the Bill was that it provided a remedy for an alleged abuse, without regard to the existing discipline and framework of the Church. The Bill provided that clergymen of the Church of England might be at liberty to perform Divine Service in a private house irrespective of the Bishop and the incumbent of the parish. He wished to know what the hon. Member for Surrey meant by the words "in a private house." If he meant a private residence, in the ordinary sense of the term, then all the hon. Member's argument fell to the ground. If, however, he included large public buildings, such as theatres, under the term "private house," the House would do well to examine the whole fabric of the Church before they rashly adopted a proposal that would make confusion worse confounded. The Church of England was in its constitution a Church governed by Bishops, and as the law stood it required that no incumbent or curate should commence his functions in a parish without the permission and sanction of the Bishop; but the effect of this measure would be to remove that restriction and safeguard in the case of one class of clergymen, although enforced in the case of the incumbents and curates. It seemed to be supposed by some hon. Members, that nothing had been done for many years back to provide further ministrations in connection with the Church; but the fact was, that there had been repealed Acts of Parliament passed with the view of securing a great number of parish clergy, of dividing parishes, and of meeting those difficulties which were now started, as if for the first time. Up till now the whole fabric of the Church was founded on the district system; but this Bill would introduce an altogether novel and different principle. The argument of the hon. Member for Pool (Mr. Danby Seymour), that this measure would afford a means of relief to those who disapproved of what were called on high authority, "mum-meries" in the performance of Divine worship, cut both ways, because it would at the same time permit those who enjoyed such ceremonies to indulge their tastes in parishes where the incumbent was opposed to them. However, he (Mr. Bouverie) thought it would be a most mischievous thing if a minority in every parish were encouraged at once to secede from the Church, and to open a rival place of worship; thus establishing two pulpits in every parish, from which the ministers might every week assail each other. On the ground that this Bill would introduce more evils than those it attempted to remove, he hoped hon. Members would give their support to his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. BASS said, that after the speeches he had heard, particularly from the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford, he had felt great alarm at the possible provisions of this Bill; but on obtaining a copy, he was surprised to find that nothing could be more simple and unexceptionable than its clauses, and he only wished that every Act of Parliament was framed with equal simplicity. In short, it was the very model of a Bill. It was framed entirely in the interest of the Church of England. To take his own case—he lived two miles from his parish church, and often neither he nor his servants, or neighbours, who were numerous, could get to church. They all knew that they were too ready to find excuses for not going to church. Now he wished to do away with all excuses. It was said that the Bill would allow the Puseyites to set up their forms in their private houses, but he should be very glad if they would keep there. For his own part, he would rather attend an honest Roman Catholic place of worship than a church where the extravagant practices to which allusion had been made were carried on.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that any Bill which was brought forward with an honest bonâ fide intention to advance the interests of religion, ought to be received with attention and careful consideration by the House of Commons. The question, therefore, to be considered was, whether the measure introduced being good in principle as intending an increase of means of worship was such as could be possibly shaped in Committee, so as to carry its intention into effect. His own opinion was that the Bill could not be shaped in Committee for the purpose of carrying out the laudable object in view without being entirely remodelled. In fact, the Bill only presented to the House the wish of the hon. Member who had introduced it, but provided no means of carrying that wish into effect. The House could not legislate in the character of a god, saying, "Let there be light," and expecting light to come. There was nothing in this Bill to direct how it was to be carried out, or how it was to be guarded against the most certain and obvious abuse. He could not agree with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) that it was the business of hon. Members to fish for legislation, and throw out preambles to catch clauses in the House, but held that they were there to bring forward practical measures to which the collective wisdom of the House may give final shape for the regulation of the country. He believed the Bill had received considerable support, from the fact, that it was supported by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall), and that hon. Gentleman had supported it because of a single case that had come under his own observation. It was wonderful how much of the attempted legislation of this House arose from particular cases. The hon. Member said he knew of a clergyman who had entered the reading-desk in a state of intoxication, and the remedy he proposed was to allow Divine service to be performed in private houses. What ought rather to be done to meet such a case would be to give the Bishops greater powers of ousting clergymen who misconducted themselves from the sacred office, and he believed that some larger powers of discipline would have a most beneficial effect. To make this measure quite safe, it was necessary, in his opinion, that it should have the consent of the authorities of the Church; but he thought the best plan by far would be to withdraw this Bill, and re-introduce it in another shape. It was impossible to concur in a measure which would create the utmost confusion. He did not want to throw any impediment in the way of increasing the ministrations of the Church of England; but the real question was, whether the Bishops now did not actually possess the power of giving permission to clergymen to perform Divine service in accordance with the ritual in any building, and if the law did vest that power in the hands of the Bishop, he did not see that the present measure was necessary. This measure was said to be necessary in order to escape from the tyranny of some parochial clergymen who were of High Church principles; but they must remember that tyranny was equally possible on the other side, and if this Bill passed it might introduce interference equally disagreeable to those who proposed it, as it intends to inflict on the particular objects of its aim. No doubt Mr. Bryan King is in the mover's eye; but there are other kings as abhorrent of intrusion, and this Bill would only multiply rivals within every ecclesiastical domain, instead of increasing the efficiency of the existing ministrations.

MR. HORSFALL said, that the case to which he alluded did not occur in his parish; but he regretted to say that it was not a solitary instance.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was desirous of entering his personal protest against the doctrines laid down by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord R. Cecil), in respect to the effect produced in the House by the admission of members of the Jewish persuasion. Political prophecies in general were confined to the time when they were used to prevent the passing of useful and beneficial measures, and it rarely happened that they heard a retrospective effect given to such predictions. But the noble Lord not only repeated the previous prognostication that the admission of Jews would un-Christianise the Legislature, but actually asserted that that effect had already been produced. He could only say that he had observed no disposition on the part of any hon. Member of that persuasion to press his peculiar religious opinions on the attention of the House; and that experience had confirmed the opinion he formerly held — that, in spite of the admission of Jews, this branch of the Legislature had retained its Christianity with no sensible diminution, and that it was quite competent to entertain such a Bill as this. He felt bound to support the Motion of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bouverie), who had expressed dissent from the principles of the Bill. It had been said that the Bill was short and simple, but to his mind it was not characterized by perspicuity or certainty. He must confess that the measure left him in very great doubt what would be its effect if it became law, and also what was the precise grievance for which it was intended as a remedy. With regard to the third clause in particular, the evils which had been pointed to by various Members, including theatres, were totally dissimilar in character. One class of evils was that the Established Church did not provide sufficient accommodation for all the members of that Church who were parishioners, and that it was desirable to furnish them with additional sittings in the church. It was said that the Bill would remedy that defect, but it did not appear to him that it provided a proper mode of meeting the whole case. What was the meaning of the phrase "private house," used in the Bill? The construction generally adopted seemed to be that it meant the private residence of any individual as opposed to a theatre or place of public resort; but he rather thought it was intended to imply any unconsecrated house, whether private or public, including theatres. If he were right, the Bill was very ambiguously and imperfectly expressed. If the object of the Bill was to provide additional accommodation for worshippers of the Established Church, then the proper mode had been pointed out in the course of the discussion, and had been already accomplished to a certain extent by increasing the number of churches and chapels of ease. As he understood the Bill, however, it was in truth directed against a different state of evils. He conceived, in point of fact, that "private house" was intended to mean the private residence of any individual who perhaps from some accidental circumstance had had a dispute with the clergyman of the parish on matters of doctrine or otherwise, and who, being able to employ a clergyman to preach in his house, and not satisfied only with the attendance of his household, which would not generally be objected to by the Bishop, or clergyman of the parish, wished to set up a rival church in a private and necessarily unconsecrated house for the attendance of as many of the parishioners as his influence could draw together. It had been said that this was a Bill for the promotion of religious confusion; but, if by religious confusion was meant the free expression of religious opinion, the evil would not perhaps be so much to be deplored. He was afraid, however, that the Bill would do more than lead to religious confusion, on which ground alone he would not vote against it, and that it would tend to produce religious discord and fanaticism. No doubt the Bill would provide an irregular and unsatisfactory remedy for the case of a parish where a High Church Tractarian clergyman attempted to introduce rites and ceremonies offensive to many of the parishioners. But there was a much larger number of parishes in which there were Low Church clergymen; and there would be an opening in those cases for any ardent missionary of the other class to set up a small rival church in a private residence. No consequence followed more necessarily and logically from the very idea of a national Church than that certain districts were to be appointed in which clergymen, ordained by the spiritual authorities of the Church, should have the exclusive care of souls therein. If they were not to have it exclusively, in what sense could they be said to have it at all, for then they would only be so many out of a number of rivals admitted into their districts? He did not think it desirable to give to the incumbent of a parish any power with regard to strangers; but to deprive the Bishop of the power of excluding persons who came into a parish without his licence, was to destroy the very essence and foundation of a national Church. He conceived that under the existing law a Bishop had the power of licensing any clergyman of the Church of England to preach and perform Divine Service in any parish, though, of course, in an unconsecrated building he could not perform the same service as in a consecrated one. It had been said that the Church of Rome, more liberal than the Church of England, provided oratories where any person not a parochial minister could perform Divine Service on behalf of parishioners; but he ventured to affirm that that could not be done against the consent of the Bishop.

MR. AYRTON explained that he did not say it could be done without the consent of the Bishop.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: By this Bill

the jurisdiction of the Bishop was directly assailed. Not only the incumbent, but the Bishop was deprived of all control in the matter. For these reasons he should oppose the second reading of the Bill.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he had considered this subject for some years. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had stated that the predictions of those who opposed the admission of the Jews into the House had not been verified. He (Mr. Newdegate) had certainly thought that the change was not calculated to promote a feeling in favour of the Church of England, or to render the House more willing to maintain or to correct the discipline of the Church. If it were so he rejoiced. God grant that he might have been deceived. Although the principles of religious liberty had so far prevailed as to lead to the introduction of hon. Members of the Jewish persuasion into that House the Act which admitted them only at the discretion of the House still affirmed its Christian character. Every one knew that he honoured the Church as much as any one did, and was as desirous as any one to see her services extended, but he was decidedly of opinion that the passing of a measure of this kind would only tend to aggravate the evils which already existed. There was no doubt that the greatest latitude prevailed in the preaching of the clergy at present, some of them verging towards Popery, and others towards extreme Calvinism. The result was that in many cases the parish churches were cleared of their congregations. The Bill before the House made no provision for the poor. The hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) said that he should like to go to church in some of these extemporized chapels; but he had no security that in going to these chapels he was going to church, for in them anything but the doctrines of the Church of England might be taught, whilst no provision was secured for the admission or instruction of the poor within their walls. He thought the first provision necessary was a measure that in the parish church the clergyman officiating should preach nothing but the doctrines of the Church. For the people loved the doctrines of the Church of England when faithfully inculcated. What this Bill did was to give liberty for the establishment of small chapels in any parishes in which the clergyman might not be popular, and thus introduce a very objectionable kind of rivalry. He deprecated, with the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, the introduction of anything into the parishes which would create discord. It was to be remembered that there would not be the slightest security that Church of England doctrines would be preached in the chapels to be authorized under this Bill; and the carrying of such a measure would tend to break up the parochial system. It was very true that evils existed under the present system, and that in case of a clergyman preaching doctrines, or indulging in practices which his parishioners did not conceive to be in accordance with the teaching of the Church, it was almost impossible to obtain legal redress. It was true that the Bishop was the proper person to whom such questions ought to be referred. But under the Church Discipline Act the Bishop might refuse to hear the case. Indeed, he was under a penalty to do so, for the expense of proceeding in the ecclesiastical courts in the present state of the law was so great that one or two trials of this nature in a year might absorb the whole of his income. No one could, therefore, be surprised at the Bishop's refusing to proceed, as he had power to do, under the Church Discipline Act. The laity were, in fact, left totally without the power of legal appeal, whatever the annoyances to which they might be subjected. In the Lavington case, where an application had been made to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus to compel the ecclesiastical court to proceed, it was held that the lay court had no power to issue a mandamus. The remedy, it appeared to him (Mr. Newdegate), ought to be the introduction of a Bill empowering the Court of Queen's Bench to issue a mandamus to the Bishop to hear such cases; of course, not compelling him to decide one way or other, but to hear such cases as the Court of Queen's Bench might deem sufficiently founded, the Bill also making due provision for the payment of the necessary costs and expenses either out of the funds in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or such other funds as the House might appoint, thus indemnifying the Bishop from expense. That appeared to be a practical remedy for the evil, the existence of which had been proved before the Courts of this country. The fact was, that by moving so many of the sources of practice from the Ecclesiastical Courts, and thereby destroying the ecclesiastical Bar, they were destroying the representation of the laity; for the lay Bar of the Ecclesiastical Courts had been, in fact, the jury of the laity. The Ecclesiastical Courts had, therefore, become exclusively clerical, and even to these Courts, thus exclusively clerical, the laity had no actual power of appeal. If, however, the lay Court of Queen's Bench could, by mandamus, compel the Ecclesiastical Court to hear the grievances of the laity, as he suggested, a right of access at least would be granted to the laity which was at present denied to them. The present Bill was based upon an acknowledged evil, the effects of which it would simply aggravate instead of providing a remedy. It would create and aggravate religious discord in the various parishes. He believed that the Government might be confident that the House would support them in a measure for correcting the evils in the Church of England to which he had alluded. Why, then, did they not meet these evils at their centre by introducing some such salutary measure as he had described, which the Bill before the House would simply aggravate. He was confident that the House would aid them in giving the people a proper tribunal for the settlement of those differences which were at present throwing the whole Church into confusion.

MR. BAINES said, he should support the Bill, not as a Dissenter, because Dissenters already enjoyed all the privileges which this Bill would confer upon the Church, but he supported it because it would liberate the clergy of the Church from many trammels and restrictions which now bound them, and would give them a freedom of action on behalf of the spiritual interests of the great bulk of the population which at present they did not possess.

MR. LEFROY said, he hoped that the hon. Gentleman who had introduced this Bill would, after the speeches which had been made in opposition to it, consent to its withdrawal. He would support any measure to extend education and religion, consistently with the rights of the Established Church, which he regarded as the safeguard of our religious institutions and opinions; but he thought that no case of necessity for the present measure had been established. Indeed, the arguments in support of the Bill seemed to rest mainly upon individual instances; but to his mind experience had shown that clergymen would rather extend indulgence to than restrain those who were anxious to teach the truth. Moreover, when he saw clergymen preaching in theatres and places of that description, he did not think that the Bishops could be said to exercise too strict a control over the discretion of the clergy.

LORD ASHLEY said, he thought the measure was wholly unnecessary. Under the present system the clergy enjoyed practically as much liberty in preaching and reading the Scriptures as they ought to possess. As an example, he might mention that only the other day a clergyman appeared in the garden scene of a theatre, perhaps surrounded by forbidden fruit, and no doubt looking very picturesque. Not that he wished to throw discredit on the religious services in theatres; on the contrary, he looked upon that movement as one more conducive to the spiritual welfare of the poorer classes than any which has been undertaken for a long time. His objection to the Bill was simply that while, on the one hand it was unnecessary as a measure of protection, on the other hand the effect of it would be to deprive the Bishop of his legitimate and discretionary authority in his diocese, together with that of the incumbent in his parish, thereby producing a state of things most subversive of ecclesiastical order and discipline. As, therefore, he did not see that there was any case made out in behalf of the Bill, he should give his vote against the second reading.

COLONEL SYKES thought that, having regard to the ignorance of spiritual matters at present existing throughout the country, the House ought not to throw an impediment in the way of such a Bill on any mere technical grounds, and he should give his support to it.

MR. HARDY said, it was a mistake to suppose that the clergy of the Church of England did not now seek to reach the poor by preaching and lecturing in places that were not consecrated. The clergy, however, had assented to a certain form of ecclesiastical discipline, and it was unreasonable to ask the House to enable them to dispense with the vows of obedience which they had taken to their superiors at the time of their ordination. He did not believe that the preaching of the doctrines of the Church of England could be extended too widely, but the members of that Church, in pledging themselves to her, had done so not only as to her doctrine, but also as to her discipline. The hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) looked at the Church of England with the view of a Nonconformist, and seemed as if he would set up in the same parish two ministers of the same Church in rivalry with each other, which must inevitably produce religious discord and warfare in the parishes of this kingdom. He did not wish to see the bishops act now in the spirit of their predecessors, who excluded Whitefield and Wesley from the pulpits of the Established Church, and he should not be sorry to see some of the most eminent preachers of that Church sent, under the authority of the Bishops, to preach the doctrines of salvation far and wide, but what he did object to in this Bill was that they were attempting to set free the servants of the Church of England from the obligations they owed to the heads of the Church. He should be glad to see the Ecclesiastical Commissioners employing a considerable part of their funds in sending fresh ministers into populous and overgrown parishes and districts, but he besought the House not to sanction a principle, involved in the second reading of this Bill, which would be fatal to the discipline of the Church of England.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he should support the Bill, believing that it was founded on the principle of religious freedom, and that its effect would be to remove restrictions which now hampered the celebration of Divine worship. He expressed his regret that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who in all other matters was so great a stickler for free trade, should, in dealing with a measure calculated to emancipate the Church of England from the trammels by which she was enthralled, have clothed himself in the robes of Protection.

MR. MELLOR said, he thought much objection might be taken to some parts of the Bill as regarded the wording, and he doubted whether it would be sufficient to carry out the object it had in view. He could not however, in the absence of a more fitting proposal, refuse his assent to go into Committee on it, so that the Bill might be rendered effective for remedying what was an admitted grievance.

MR. SPOONER said, he should vote for the second reading of the Bill, and agreed very much with the view taken by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Mellor) who had just preceded him. He agreed that as the Bill was then framed it might lead to great evils; but it might easily be altered in Committee so as to make it a most useful measure. At present there were vast masses of our population who never had the opportunity of hearing the Gospel preached, and that was a growing and much-to-be-deplored state of things. The right hon. Members for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge had both admitted the evil that existed, but disapproved of the manner of remedying that evil by the Bill now under consideration, and requested the hon. Members who had brought in the Bill to withdraw it, in order that a better Bill, framed in other terms, should be brought in. If the right hon. Members would undertake to apply their distinguished talents to the provision of some remedy for the spiritual destitution now prevailing, he would advise the hon. Members to withdraw their Bill; but without such a pledge, and the House went to a division, he could not conscientiously oppose the second reading of a Bill the main principle and object of which was to provide proper means for the religious education of vast masses of the people in the Christian principles and doctrines taught by the Established Church.

MR. LOCKE KING said, he wished to explain that the words "private house" had been introduced into the enacting clause simply because he found them in the canon which the Bill in that respect proposed to overrule. After the temperate manner in which the measure had been debated, he was astonished that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) should have so stoutly opposed it, until he recollected that the right hon. Gentleman was the other day made an Ecclesiastical Commissioner. As the majority of the House appeared to be in favour of the principle of the Bill, he would recommend that it should be read a second time; that it should then go into Committee pro forma; and in that case he would endeavour to adapt it to the wishes of hon. Members who had taken exception to its wording. With that view he should go to a division.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

CLARE ELECTION.—REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,

“That Colonel Luke White is not duly elected a Knight of the Shire to serve in this present Parliament for the County of Clare.

“That the last Election for the said County, so far as regards the Return of Colonel Luke White, is a void Election.

“And the said Determinations were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.”

ADULTERATION OF FOOD, &c., BILL.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee according to Order.

Clause 4. Power to Justices to have articles of food and drink analyzed in cases where complaints were brought before them.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, it appeared to him that this clause was not necessary. They ought not to make exceptions to the general law of evidence. He would propose to omit the words which stated that the substances which were produced in any court of justice should be taken for what they were called without evidence being required to prove the contrary.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD objected to any alteration in the clause.

Amendment negatived.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the question was, what would be considered adulterated articles and not pure articles. How was discovery to be effected without the aid of an analyst? And then take the article of bread, which was no doubt mixed with potatoes and other things not injurious to health. Would that be adulteration? No doubt under the Bill it would be an offence, and the maker subjected to a heavy penalty. But by what process would the analyst determine whether bread was adulterated or pure? He had received a deputation of bakers, and they said the Bill would be injurious to their trade, and that they would not be able to exist under its operation. A statute was already in existence which in all ordinary cases was sufficiently calculated for the protection of the public, and it was for the Committee to consider whether the Bill might not be too general in its terms. The principle now recognized in all transactions between buyer and seller was that of caveat emptor, and he thought it ought not to be departed from.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, the bakers were sufficiently protected. If they did not warrant their bread to be pure and unadulterated, they would be safe. There was a difference of opinion whether alum did deteriorate bread or not. If tradesmen held out to the public that they were selling pure articles, and they were adulterated, they ought to be prosecuted for the offence.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS instanced the article of mustard for the purpose of showing that it was necessary sometimes to mix another article with the one to be sold, in order to render it vendible.

MR. AYRTON said, the words “expressly warranted” had been introduced into the Bill to obviate possible objections. The measures only proposed to deal with those cases in which persons warranted their goods as being pure and unadulterated. There was already a statute which applied to bread, and the bakers were the only people who could not complain of this Bill. A person was liable to be transported for obtaining money under false pretences. Then, why should not tradesmen be liable to punishment when they cheated the poor people? There were no difficulties in the way of legislation excepting those which existed in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary.

MR. ROEBUCK believed there were already a dozen statutes which were inefficient for the purpose of protection against adulteration. If they told the people the law would protect them against fraud and it did not, they did a very great mischief. He believed the buyer was the best person to protect himself, and so soon as a man was found to be selling impure and bad articles he lost his customers. The simple thing the Committee had to consider was, whether it was wise to spend their time in useless legislation.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, the Bill was founded on the Report of a Committee, which had made careful and extended inquiry into this subject; and he thought it was clear the hon. and learned Gentleman had not read the evidence taken before them. The application of the Bill was confined to articles which were necessities of life, and it appeared that there was not a single article of necessary and general consumption which was not adulterated. The poor had no remedy. They could not prosecute the tradesmen of the village or town, with whom they were obliged to deal. They were compelled to take the food as they could get it—impure and adulterated. All that was required was the power of publishing the names of the adulterators. That would be a protection to the people. There was no country in Europe which did not protect its subjects from adulterated food, and everybody knew that on the Continent articles were much better than in England. He was sorry to say that there was no country in which things were so much adulterated as in England. In America there was a strict law against adulteration, and no drugs from England were allowed to be received before being examined by a properly qualified inspector; and the appointment of such an officer had become necessary in consequence of the bad quality of the articles imported from this country.

MR. PEACOCKE said, the observations of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir G. Lewis) went against the principle of the Bill. He objected to the Bill because of the difficulty of determining what was adulteration. Certainly there was a difficulty in particular instances, but it was not insuperable. It would be decided by practice, and magistrates would necessarily be guided to a considerable extent by previous decisions. The hon. Member for Sheffield said the poor could protect themselves; but the fact was, that practically, neither the rich nor the poor could protect themselves. Take the case of Cayenne pepper. Evidence was given before the Committee that that which was sold as Cayenne pepper was not Cayenne pepper at all. What remedy had the purchaser? There was no law on the subject. As the Bill stood at present the interests of the vendor were only too well provided for, as he could not be punished unless he expressly guaranteed the authenticity of what he sold.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, he did not wish to interfere with the maxim caveat emptor. Under the present law, no doubt, the buyer was left to take care of himself, but the procedure was so cumbrous and expensive, that there was, in effect, no protection at all. With regard to mixture and adulteration, the Bill did not interfere with mixture. A man might mix what he pleased with an article, and if he did not sell it as a pure article, the Bill did not touch him; but if he did sell it as a pure article, he (Mr. Scholefield) thought the House would agree with him that he ought to be punished.

Clause agreed to.

VOL. CLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Clause 5 (Power to appoint analysts).

MR. ROEBUCK inquired whether an analyst was to be appointed in every little village in England, and how the expense was to be borne?

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, it was not as yet decided how those details were to be carried out.

MR. HALIBURTON said, he wanted to know who would analyse the analyst. Would he be subjected to a competitive examination, or appointed by the judge or by the magistrates at quarter sessions? There were not, he believed, half-a-dozen persons in the country fit to be analysts. Those who were examined at Dr. Smet-hurst's trial all contradicted one another, and involved the case in such inextricable confusion that the right hon. Gentleman opposite was obliged to discharge the prisoner as the only practicable solution of the difficulty. He wished to warn the House against over-legislation, which had produced the greatest evils in both the United States and the Colonies. It was said there was but little adulteration in America. Did they never hear of wooden nutmegs? The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State appeared under some uncertainty with regard to the nature of a mixture; and in reply he would only point to the Government of which he was a member, and say—si signum quæris circumspice.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON expressed his approval of the Bill, and did not believe any particular difficulty would be experienced with regard to its operation.

Clause 6 agreed to.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE stated that the Bill did not realize in practice what it professed to accomplish. Its real effect would be to prevent persons from warranting what they sold, which would by no means prevent adulteration. The real difficulty to be overcome was that poor persons bound themselves by a system of credit.

Clause 6, as were also Clauses 7 to 10 inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 11, (Bill not to extend to Scotland or Ireland.)

MR. KER said, he would move the omission of the clause. If the measure were a good one for England, he did not see why it should not be extended to all parts of the United Kingdom.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, that the only reason why he did not propose the extension of the Bill to Ireland and Scotland was that a different machinery would be required for putting it in force in those countries. But he would be perfectly ready to assent to any proposal which would provide the requisite means of carrying out such an enlargement of the measure.

Motion made and Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 101; Noes 88: Majority 13.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he thought there must have been some misconception in the minds of several hon. Members who had voted in the last division. Every Irish Member was, he believed, in favour of the measure being applied to Ireland, and, under the circumstances, he hoped the Attorney General for Ireland and the promoter of the Bill would take counsel together to provide the requisite machinery.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE said, he voted in the majority against extending the Bill to Scotland, but he must say that if the Bill were good for England it was good for Scotland, and he suggested that the promoter of the Bill and the Lord Advocate should, before the Bill was read a third time, agree on a clause to adapt the Bill to Scotland.

Clause 2, which had been postponed,

MR. BLACKBURN said, he wished to point out that, under the terms of the clause, there would be no protection for any one who bought unwarily a bad article. The purchaser would have to prove that he gave notice to the seller that he bought with the design to have the article analyzed, and that he afforded the seller an opportunity of accompanying him to the analyst.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, that protection was necessary for the seller.

MR. BLAKE said, he hoped the Bill would be extended to Ireland. Since the increase of duty on spirits whiskey was much adulterated in that country. Persons who frequented some public-houses were more affected than others. He had at his own expense bought a pint of whiskey, and a celebrated analyst to whom he sent it assured him that, if a man drank such stuff for twelve months, he would at the end of that period lose his reason.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he wanted to know whether the giving an opportunity to accompany the purchaser to the analyst meant providing conveyance for the seller?

Mr. Scholefield

If the analyst lived ten miles off the seller could not be expected to walk.

Motion made and Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 123; Noes 16: Majority, 107.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, March 15, 1860.

MINUTES.] Took the Oath—The Lord Carysfort.

TREATY WITH FRANCE—ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

Order of the Day read.

LORD TAUNTON, in rising to move that their Lordships agree with the House of Commons in the Address to the Crown on the Commercial Treaty with France, said he could have desired that some person of more experience in their Lordships' House had undertaken the duty; but as it was thought that the circumstance of his having been officially connected for many years with the trade of the country would be an excuse for his trespassing upon their patience, he had not felt himself at liberty to decline a duty which was so much in accordance with his personal convictions. He was entitled to say, he thought, in the first place, that this Treaty came before them under circumstances which entitled it to their favourable consideration. After having been concluded by the Crown it had received the sanction—the almost unanimous sanction—of the Lower House of Parliament; and he made bold to say that in giving that sanction the Lower House had done no more than reflect the general sentiments of their constituents. It was notorious that since the Treaty had been before the country it had met with very general approbation. This approbation was not confined to any particular branch of industry. In Lancashire and Yorkshire, the seats of the cotton and woollen manufactures, in the linen districts of the north of Ireland, on the banks of the Clyde, where so many interests were combined, in the great coal districts, and in the Staffordshire Potteries,—in all these districts it had been received with unanimous approbation, and the people of those parts were now waiting with anxiety for the final sanction to be given to it, which would enable them to derive from it the benefits which they, who were the best judges in the matter, confidently anticipated it would produce. As to the objects of the Treaty, they were such as there could be no difference of opinion. In the words of the preamble of the Treaty, they were to "draw closer the ties of friendship which unite the two people, and to improve and extend the commercial relations between the respective dominions." These were objects which must entitle the Treaty to their Lordships' most favourable consideration. The statesmen in this country had long viewed with great concern the small commercial intercourse existing between two countries, united rather than separated by a narrow sea, which, by the difference of their soil, climate, and productions, and by the varied character of their industries, seemed formed by nature to be mutually beneficial to each other. He need scarcely remind their Lordships that at this moment our exports to France were less than our exports to Holland, and not much more than our exports to Turkey or Sweden. We must therefore rejoice at every opportunity which presented itself for extending the intercourse between the two countries; and all our great statesmen had never let slip a chance of effecting so desirable a result. In 1786, Mr. Pitt negotiated his celebrated treaty, which produced excellent effects while it lasted, but which was put an end to by the unfortunate events of the French revolution. The political and social objects of this Treaty were, he thought their Lordships would agree, of no less importance than the commercial objects. He did not go so far as to say that commercial treaties would prevent wars altogether, for the passions of mankind and the ambition of sovereigns, unfortunately, were not to be restrained by such bonds; but he had no hesitation in saying that commercial intercourse between two nations was one of the best modes of preventing wars and of bringing them to a speedier termination when they did occur. There was a striking instance of this in the relations between England and the United States of America. Their Lordships were aware that from time to time there had arisen very difficult and delicate questions between those two countries, which, if not managed with temper and moderation on both sides, might have led to the frightful calamities of war; but the commercial relations of the two countries were so great, and the great body of the industrious classes on either side of the Atlantic were so deeply interested in the preservation of peace, that they would have called their rulers to strict account had they led the two nations into the crimes and miseries of a rupture, without being able to prove that it could not, by any possibility, have been avoided. This was a sufficient indication how desirable it was, with reference to promoting a good understanding, to improve our commercial relations with France.

Before proceeding to consider the provisions of the Treaty, he thought it quite necessary to call their Lordships' attention to the circumstances under which it was made. Ever since the free-trade policy of Sir Robert Peel had been adopted by this country, we had found it necessary to alter our policy with regard to commercial treaties. We had found it was no longer of use to go cap in hand to foreign countries and endeavour to frame commercial treaties with them on the principle of equivalents. The fact was, that foreign countries imagined that we had some great interests distinct from theirs in making proposals of that kind, and the more we urged them to that policy the less they were disposed to reciprocate. In addition to this the more fully we carried out the principles of free trade the more we deprived ourselves of the means of treating on the footing of equivalents. Owing to these circumstances, though still desirous of promoting commercial intercourse with France, we had generally given up all idea of framing a tariff treaty with the French Government. But that suddenly occurred which was most unexpected — overtures came from the Government of France itself for the framing of such a Treaty. In his opinion that entirely altered the whole question, and while he completely agreed with the noble Earl on the cross benches (Earl Grey) who stated his views the other evening with so much force and clearness, that the day of treaties, equivalents, and bargains was long passed, yet he should have deemed the Government very culpable if, when the French Government expressed their willingness to embark in a more liberal course, and only asked this country to give facilities to relax their prohibitive and highly protective system, they had neglected so favourable an opportunity of accomplishing an object which all parties in England had had so long at heart. Those were the circumstances under which this Treaty originated.

He would now call their Lordships' attention to the main provisions which the Treaty contained. They were simple and few. The stipulations on the part of England—he would not say concession, for that was the phraseology of long past times, and there was not one of these engagements which it was not to our interests to do, and which in truth we should not have done sooner or later in following out a policy deliberately adopted and acted upon with entire success—the stipulations on the part of England were—the abolition of import duties on various articles of French produce and manufacture, involving a revenue of £1,190,000, the non-prohibition by an export duty on coal, and the “most favoured nation clause” by which we promised not to impose any duty on articles of French manufacture which were not also imposed on the manufactures of other countries. The present condition of the French tariff was highly protective and prohibitory. Our cottons, wollens, hardware, pottery, and linens, were either absolutely prohibited, or such high duties were levied on them as to amount in effect to prohibition. Now, the counter-stipulations on the part of France were, the admission of all English produce and manufactures at rates not exceeding 30, and subsequently not more than 25 per cent ad valorem, the reduction of duties on coal and coke, iron and machinery at certain dates, and the “most favoured nation clause.” There was considerable latitude left to the French Government in arranging the scale of duties within the limits of 30, and ultimately of 25 per cent, and he admitted that a great deal of the benefit of the Treaty must depend upon the French Government carrying out their engagements—as he trusted they would—upon the liberal and just principles which they professed. But independent of that, he would remind their Lordships that it was possible to have a very extensive trade with countries which imposed high duties on our manufactured articles. He believed that the tariff of the United States, with which we had so large and advantageous a trade, varied between 20 and 30 per cent. It might be said that the circumstances of the United States and of France were not the same, and that while America was only partially a manufacturing country, France was a manufacturing country to a considerable extent. But that was only true to a certain degree, because he believed the exports of France consisted of three-fifths of articles of manufacture, and two-fifths of articles of raw produce, and therefore that there was a great similarity between the trade of France and the trade of the United States. We had a great and valuable trade with the Empire of the Brazils, and there also the duties on articles of import varied from 20 to 30 per cent. He attached the greatest importance to the “most favoured nation clause,” by which France stipulated never again to impose discriminating duties or imports to the disadvantage of English manufacturers. The history of commercial legislation showed how much injury was done to trade by discriminating duties. The most celebrated instance was the Methuen Treaty between this country and Portugal, the bad effects of which were felt to this day, and which succeeded in diverting from its natural channel the commerce which would otherwise have existed between this country and France. France had in recent times entered into a treaty with Belgium, which would not expire till next year, by which differential duties were placed on British goods, to the advantage of similar articles from Belgium. In this way iron, linens, and coals found their way into the French markets from Belgium, when, but for the treaty, better articles of the same sort could have been obtained from England; and France, while she did our trade no inconsiderable injury, undoubtedly did far more harm to herself. He had that confidence in the resources of Great Britain, in the ingenuity and enterprise of the manufacturers, and in the industry of the people, that he felt sure British trade, if it only got fair play, need not fear competition with any other trade in the world. He, therefore, attached great importance to that stipulation on the part of France by which she was prevented from entering into any treaties to our disadvantage with other countries. He ventured to say that we should get the lion's share of any trade under such circumstances. He contended that there was nothing in the counter engagements of England which, unless we had been mistaken in the commercial policy we had pursued of late years, we ought not, merely for our own interest, be glad to adopt.

It might be said that the present was not a time for making a sacrifice of revenue, and that by the reduction of the duties on French wines and spirits a great loss of revenue would be incurred. But he believed it to be a matter of much importance to the people of this country to introduce French wines and spirits to a much greater extent than was the case at present; and to substitute them for those unwholesome beverages, the use of which was more increasing in this country. So great he thought would be the increase in the comforts of the middle and lower classes of this country that he thought the loss of revenue, if any, occasioned by this Article of the Treaty was not to be regretted. He would not enter into the general financial arrangements which had been proposed by the Government. The only part of them which they had then to consider was the loss of revenue connected with the adoption of the Treaty, and which would be £1,200,000—no inconsiderable sum he admitted, but still not such as should deter them from agreeing to so valuable a Commercial Treaty. No one could say that the financial resources of this country were in such a condition that, supposing the Treaty to be a valuable one in itself, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was neither called upon nor justified in accepting the loss of revenue consequent upon its adoption. He was quite aware that in "another place" the financial arrangements of the Government had not met with the same general consent as the Treaty of Commerce; but he did not see that the one question involved the other. No one would commit himself to approval of the Budget by approval of the Treaty. That part of the Treaty which had perhaps excited the strongest opposition was the stipulation by which England engaged not to put any export duty on British coal for the next ten years. He wished to know whether those who raised that objection believed it was either right or possible for any British Finance Minister to lay a tax on the export of British coal? Such a tax had actually been tried and had failed. Sir Robert Peel imposed a duty upon the export of coal; but the experience of a few years showed that it not only failed as a financial measure, but caused great depression in the trade, coals being wasted in large quantities at the pit's mouth because the tax rendered it unprofitable to export them. He recollected the part the noble Earl (Earl Grey) had taken in opposing the tax, and he would leave it to the noble

Earl to answer the objections of those who advocated the policy of an export duty on coal. He could not conceive that it would be seriously maintained that we were depriving ourselves of a valuable financial resource by this Article of the Treaty. It was sometimes argued that as we possessed a great natural monopoly of coal we could afford to put an export duty on it, and make foreigners pay a good price for what they could not procure elsewhere; but that, he thought, was a very dangerous policy to pursue. It had often been tried, and had invariably failed. A single instance of its results occurred some years ago, when the Government of Naples, believing that they had a natural monopoly of sulphur, imposed a duty on its export. A great outcry was raised by our manufacturers. Our chemists at once applied themselves to ascertain whether sulphur could not be procured in other ways, and succeeded in obtaining a considerable quantity of sulphur from iron pyrites, while at the same time explorers, looking through the world, discovered various sources of supply elsewhere than in the dominions of Naples. The consequence was that when Naples at length reversed her policy and abolished the export duty, she found she had lost her monopoly by her greediness in attempting to make too much out of it. That was and always would be the result of a policy which was as narrow-minded as it was contrary to all sound financial principles. Another view of the matter was that the quantity of coal in the United Kingdom was limited, and that there was some danger of its becoming exhausted, not in our own days, but in those of our descendants. That opinion was entertained some years ago by many ingenious men, but he had thought it was now almost altogether exploded. Further investigations and the experience of all practical men had shown that this country had been blessed by Providence with an almost inexhaustible supply of coal. Another objection to this Article of the Treaty was, that it deprived us of the power of prohibiting the export of coal as a munition of war, which, for political purposes, it was necessary we should retain. Now in reply to that he would say that he held that the Treaty, being a commercial one, was to be taken simply in a commercial sense, and that it did not limit or alter the power of this country to prohibit the export of coal in the event of any great emergency. He did not think, however, that it was a point of any great practical importance. Coal was no doubt essential to the manufacturers of foreign countries, but the amount of coal consumed by the military navies was very small. The total consumption in the navy of France was only 160,000 tons a year. He did not believe that this Article would be a ground for disagreeing with the Treaty. The noble Earl (the Earl of Hardwicke) had presented a petition from the shipowners praying that a stipulation might be made to place the carrying trade and the indirect trade with France upon the same footing. He might remind their Lordships that this was a Treaty of Commerce, and not a treaty of navigation. He should be glad to see the indirect trade with France placed upon the same footing as the direct trade, but the effect of this Treaty must be greatly to the advantage of British shipping. With regard to the direct trade between the two countries their Lordships were aware that British and French shipping were already on the same footing. The present Treaty referred only to that direct trade, and in the same degree, in which it promoted commerce between the two countries, it would benefit British shipping. The export of coal was, he believed, very much in the hands of the British shipowners, and as the coal trade between the two countries would doubtless receive a great extension under the Treaty, our shipping would obtain large and profitable employment in carrying coal from England to France. He wished to refer the noble Earl who had presented this petition to an able and interesting document, of which he would not dispute the authority—namely, a Report of the Board of Trade, under the Government of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby). This Report was written in answer to a memorial from the shipowners, complaining, in that day, in the same language as the petition now laid upon the table, of the denigration of the most restricted system of navigation of any country in Europe. In Spain differential duties were levied upon foreign ships engaged both in the direct and indirect trade. France admitted the ships of this country to compete with her own in the direct trade, but endeavoured to secure a monopoly of the indirect trade by high differential duties. The answer of the then President of the Board of Trade was to the effect that if a comparison were made between the amount of French and English tonnage engaged in the whole trade of France, including both the direct and indirect trade, it would appear that in the year 1857 the amount of British tonnage in French ports was two-thirds of the whole, while the French tonnage was only one-third. He believed that at present not less than 2,500,000 tons of British shipping were engaged in the direct and indirect trade with France, while in the whole British trade, direct and indirect, which was entirely open to free competition, and into which French ships were admitted on the same terms as our own, he believed the French tonnage had never exceeded 500,000 tons—the proportion being thus five to one. He had no apprehensions whatever that the shipping interests of this country would suffer from the effects of this Treaty, seeing how indissolubly connected that interest was with the general trade and commerce of the country. It was impossible that we could go on increasing our exports of manufactures to France and that British shipping should not share in that prosperity. Great and successful as had been the extension of our export and import trade, he believed it would be far more easy to make out a case for restricting commerce than navigation; and he believed it was a fortunate thing for this country that we had got rid of the Navigation Laws at a time when the commerce of the world was expanding, and when we were able to secure the inestimable blessing of cheap freights to all parts of the world. He knew that the shipping interest complained of great depression at the present moment. Shipping and shipbuilding were trades liable to great fluctuations; but the tendency of recent legislation had been not to aggravate but to limit those fluctuations. It would be, in his opinion, a most suicidal policy to return to that restrictive system, the abandonment of which had been most fortunate for the country at large, and above all for the shipping interest itself. He did not doubt that the Treaty, in a commercial point of view, would produce very useful results. He did not desire to exaggerate those results, but he felt confident that if the blessing of peace were preserved and the Treaty allowed to develop itself, a greatly increased commercial interchange between the two countries would follow. The Treaty would also be fraught with great political and social benefits. He believed that all the tendencies of this Treaty were for good. He did not see any mischief in a political point of view that could possibly be caused by the Treaty; while, on the other hand, he saw great good likely to flow from it. It was a capital point in English policy by all honourable methods to cultivate friendly relations with the great nation of France, and he valued the ties of commerce especially because they were ties that connected not merely Governments, but, what was far more important—nations; and the extended commerce arising from this Treaty would give rise to a friendly feeling towards us on the part of the inhabitants of France. He devoutly prayed that it might be so. Not that he wished to see any exclusive alliance with France, for it was not the true policy of this country to cultivate an alliance with France in a spirit of hostility to any other country. While the present Treaty held out the hand of friendship to France it did the same equally to all other nations. If we took the wines of France at a low duty we took equally the wines of Spain, Italy, and Germany. In the debates on Mr. Pitt's treaty, statesmen of the highest authority—Mr. Fox, Mr. Burke, and Mr. Francis—objected to it, that it tended to diminish the feeling of jealousy and alarm with which this country, they said, ought always to regard France. No such feelings would be manifested at the present day. The idea that union and discord amongst the nations of Europe were active it was surely incumbent upon us to do what we could to give activity to those better influences, the tendency of which was to cement nations, to prevent wars, and to increase the hopes of peace in Europe. It was because he believed that this Treaty had a very great influence in that direction that he ventured to recommend it to their Lordships. He could not make out that we had sacrificed any principle or made any concession that was not for our interest. On the other hand, we certainly gave facilities to France to enter upon that course which we had seen it our interest to pursue—that of a far more liberal policy. The influence of our example would be very useful to France. It was impossible for the intelligent ruler of France to see the effects produced by this policy in this country without being struck by the result—the welfare and comfort which it had secured to all classes—the loyalty and contentment which it had diffused—the diminution of pauperism—and all the blessed effects which had ensued, not wholly, but in a great degree, from our liberal commercial policy. He heartily hoped that this example might be followed by France; and not by France only; for, with such examples as France and England it would be very difficult indeed for the other nations of Europe longer to maintain a narrow and restrictive policy in matters of trade. Believing that the general diffusion of those principles would be one of the greatest advantages to mankind, would do more to promote human happiness, to diminish the chances of war, and to alleviate its violence when it did unhappily arise, he hailed this policy as one which, by all legitimate means, they were bound as far as possible to promote. The noble Lord concluded by moving to agree with the Commons in the Address to Her Majesty, and to fill up the blank with "Lords Spiritual and Temporal and."

THE EARL OF CORK, in seconding the adoption of the Address, said there would be no necessity, as there certainly was no desire, upon his part to trouble their Lordships at any undue length, nor to weary their attention by seeking to follow out this important subject into all its intricacies of financial details, as might, perhaps, have been fitting had the matter been in any way hastily brought before them, and had the country not been already and most ably led to the full consideration of all its momentous bearings. Intimate, therefore, and, indeed, indissoluble as was the connection between the commercial and the political features of this Treaty, he might be held excused for preferring to pass lightly by the array of facts and figures with which they must have grown familiar in studying the subject, and to ask their Lordships rather to dwell with him a few moments upon the large, he might say immense results, which it promises in other respects. Precedent showed, and a very superficial knowledge of human nature and political history would suffice to teach them, that a Treaty such as this, involving interests so complicated, and pointing to results of such magnitude, is necessarily liable, in its first aspect, to be viewed with eyes of doubt and hesitation, if not of absolute disfavour. The apprehensions of the timid, the small jealousies of the mistrustful, the uncertainties of the wavering, and last, but not least, the antagonism of the unfriendly, were all prone to be awakened by this, as by any other such steps of progress, and all might appear to have on their side some share of plausibility, if not of actual reason. But if it was in the nature of such a Treaty as this to engender a hasty and over-ready opposition, it was no less, he believed, an intrinsic part of the Treaty to commend itself, upon reflection, to the approbation originally withheld; for even jealousy must be calmed, mistrust allayed, and confidence inspired by a careful revision of the advantages it was calculated to confer upon the country—advantages, which it was not too much to expect, might radiate from our country through the world at large. In 1787, the silence of the manufacturing interests was taken as an approval of the treaty concluded by Mr. Pitt; and might not this fact be deemed equally significant, that on the present occasion the representatives of both the manufacturing and mining interests had, by either their votes or speeches, borne unanimous testimony to their convictions, that the interests of their respective constituencies were not only in no danger of injury from the Treaty, but, on the contrary, that they anticipated benefits therefrom? For his own part he was firmly convinced that the advantages to be anticipated from the Treaty, far outweighed any disadvantages; and that Her Majesty's Government, in concluding it, had been actuated solely by the perception how much it tended to the benefit of this country. He would examine some of the principal objections which had been opposed to the details of this Treaty. One of the first to which he naturally recurred, was that raised by the noble Earl (Earl Grey) at the commencement of the Session, when he, in his usual forcible manner, protested against the spirit of a Commercial Treaty recognizing exclusive privileges as a retrograde step in the policy which, he justly remarked, had been wisely and soundly pursued in this country for a successive number of years—in fact, since the repeal of the Navigation Laws in 1849. He, for one, entirely concurred in the remarks that then fell from the noble Earl as to the general error of regulating changes in our home tariffs by concessions to us in those of other countries, when such concessions were neither required by, nor essential to, our financial exigencies. But, in the first place, he was at a loss to understand on what ground the imaginative superstructure of an exclusive engagement treaty was in this case based, believing it, as he did, to be ground quite untenable in reality, and the distinctive mark of our foreign legislation—namely, impartiality in our commercial relations to be in nowise affected or impugned thereby. Secondly, what we give to France by this Treaty she is perfectly aware we give to every other nation. He must equally deny that this act can be looked upon as retrograde; whereas, inasmuch as it enables the country to make a further step towards the entire removal of protective duties, and the simplification of the Tariff, its tendencies were decidedly the reverse. To show the immense impetus it gave in that direction in which we had been steadily going, he would quote some figures taken from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He said, “The Customs’ duties abolished under the Treaty will alone give relief to the consumers of £1,737,000. The number of articles which were subject to Customs’ duty in 1746 was 1425; in 1842, 1052; in 1853, 466; in 1859, 419; and they will have dwindled down, after the passing of this Treaty, to 44 in number.” Let them now look upon this question upon the French side. What was the state of our trade as regarded France? In 1854 our total exports were of the value of £115,321,000. Of this, the amount taken by France was only £6,391,465. In 1857 our exports were £146,174,301, and the amount taken by France was £11,326,823. Last year our exports were £130,440,000, and the amount taken by

France was £9,254,858. Could this state of things be deemed either satisfactory or natural between two countries, of which it had been well observed in the writings of Dr. Adam Smith :—

“ Situated as Great Britain and France are, near to each other, and each possessed of much that the other wants, the one abounding in all the products that a fertile soil and a genial climate can supply, and the other in those that are the fruit of comparative excellence in manufacturing and commercial industry—it is obvious that if no restrictions were laid on the intercourse between them, the one would form the greatest and most advantageous market for the produce of the other ; but their jealousy of each other has so fettered the commercial intercourse between them that we derive more advantage from our commerce with China, than from that which we carry on with our nearest, most opulent, and most populous neighbours.”

It was therefore time that this state of things should be radically altered ; that a better and more friendly system should be introduced, and that both parties should be familiarized with the advantages resulting from a more intimate and extensive intercourse with each other. But these advantages, it had been urged by some of the opponents of the Treaty, were not settled on a strictly reciprocal footing ; it was said we gave more than we received ;—and to a certain, though limited extent, this was true. But was it not possible, by adhering too closely to the letter of a principle, virtually to damage the spirit ? Their Lordships must bear in mind, moreover, the time it required to induce many of themselves to abandon their so-called protective duties, the ruin that was predicted, and by some of them sincerely apprehended, as the consequences of the policy originated in 1846. If, then, the growth of free-trade opinions was slow with us, could we expect that their growth should be otherwise than gradual in France ? And pending their eventual development, which we might confidently anticipate, should we evince either wisdom or justice in refusing such concessions as she might now offer us, when, by their acceptance and the additional stimulus thus given to her commerce and manufactures, we might materially assist in the enlightenment of the public mind of that country, which enlightenment must in turn react powerfully upon our own interests ? Exception had further been taken to the Treaty on a point of not minor importance in connection with the 11th clause ; but the merits of that clause had been ~~was~~ discussed at great length and with great ability in their Lordships' House, and as the Lord Chancellor had given what he considered to be a perfectly satisfactory opinion, he would not detain the House upon that subject. Had he, however, been at first disposed to question, on grounds of general policy, the wisdom of our binding ourselves not to prohibit for a fixed number of years the exportation of coals from this country to France, which was viewed by some as placing in her hands formidable weapons to turn against ourselves, he said—even if that idea could be sustained—his surprise would have been none the less at hearing that clause attacked upon economical pretences, and the authority of Dr. Buckland quoted in support of that theory. But when that statement was made in “another place,” what was the reply to it by the Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Vivian), whose practical experience in coal was undoubted, and particularly with respect to that quality of coal which from its suitability to steam purposes was likely to be in the greatest demand for exportation to the other side of the Channel ? Mr. Vivian said,—

“ I have calculated the area of coal-field in South Wales at 640,000 acres ; the workable beds on an average 60 feet deep ; multiply 600,000 acres, the lowest estimate, by 60, and they would find they had 36,000,000 acres of coal in South Wales ; that multiplied by the weight of an acre of coal at the rate of 1,500 tons to the foot, brought out the fact that there were in South Wales 540,000 millions of tons of coal, or enough, according to the present consumption of coals in England, to supply us for 750 years.”

He went on to say,—

“ The production of coals in South Wales alone was 7,500,000 tons, a tenth part of the production of coal in the whole of England ! So it followed that South Wales could support its present rate of production for 5,000 years. He found, also, that the Yorkshire coal-field from Bradford to Nottingham was 600,000 acres, averaging 70 feet thickness ; therefore very nearly equal to the South Wales coal in extent. The Lancashire coal-field was 300,000 acres, averaging 60 feet thickness. The Bristol coal-field was 128,000 acres, averaging 80 feet thickness ; and the Durham coal-field 400,000 acres, computed to contain 90,000 millions of tons. There was an enormous coal-field in the South of Scotland, which he believed had not been accurately surveyed, but was said to consist of 1,000,000 acres, and in one pit 52 feet of coal was found.”

He (the Earl of Cork) thought that should be a sufficient answer to those who had absurdly enough talked of the exhaustion of coal in this country. Passing, then, from the chief objections which had been raised against this Treaty, he came to the consideration of a few of the benefits which we might fairly expect to reap in a broad political sense from its enactment. Look at them as their Lordships might, those benefits could scarcely, in his opinion, be overestimated in their political results. It seemed difficult, indeed, to raise a country more surely and unalterably in the scale of surrounding nations than by perfecting the scheme of multiplying, as much as possible, the dispersion of our exports far and wide. These exports, it was to be remembered, were not to the recipients mere articles of luxury and superfluity, to be adopted to-day and discarded to-morrow, but the staple commodities of almost primary necessity, which must insensibly grow into their needs, till they formed an element in their daily existence, and elevated our national importance in the full proportion of their dependence upon us. It seemed strange, indeed, upon reflection, that at any time the mistaken idea should have prevailed, even temporarily, of judicious commercial concessions proving otherwise than profitable to the party conceding, and he, for one, must protest earnestly against the illiberality of guaging advantages to ourselves in the inverse ratio of good effected to others. Let them hope that the day was for ever gone by when that House would listen to remarks similar to those which in the course of the discussion upon the treaty of 1786 were uttered by a right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Llandaff), who in all sincerity they must believe, declared,—

“He was an enemy to this Treaty, from a full persuasion that it would in many instances interfere with the manufacturing interests of Great Britain, and from a caution that the wealth of France was the poverty of England, its strength our weakness, its dignity our disgrace.”

The right rev. Prelate said further—

“If France should ever cultivate manufactures and commerce in the same degree that we have done, and that we do, our ruin will be inevitable. There was no policy so good as that which would prevent her from doing so—none so pernicious as that which facilitated her endeavours and stimulated her exertions in that way.”—[Hansard, Parliamentary History, xxvi. 550.]

Their Lordships must bear in mind that the position we now gained was one from which it was next to impossible we could ever be driven. The people of another country once admitted to the enjoyment of cheap coal, once alive to the advantages of having our iron and machinery within their reach, would no more consent to their prohibition or excessive taxation than would the people of England tolerate a return to the old corn law. Our connection with France would, in consequence, be dependent upon no adventitious circumstances, and every month—nay, every day—would see the increase of a powerful peace party among the people, and not the Government only of France. He did not deny that the suspension of the Treaty in the event of war would lay us open to considerable disadvantages, that our financial as well as our mining and manufacturing interests would suffer by the cessation of foreign demands, in addition to the inconvenience of our having to dispense with French wines and silks. But if those would be our share of the penalties of war what would be the position of France in a similar predicament? Look at the effect of this withdrawal of our supplies upon her naval and military resources. It would go nigh to paralyze them at the precise crisis when their activity was most needed. Consider further how it would affect her industries and commerce, and judge how erroneously it was argued that these supplies would render France more formidable to us and more able to take the initiative in hostilities. Was it not clear, then, that no territorial acquisitions she could gain in war would repay her in several years the shock to her financial system, and the distress of thousands upon thousands of her inhabitants which would be caused by the suspension for a few months only of the trade now fairly anticipated by us as a speedy consequence of this Treaty? We might make Treaties with one dynasty which the next might break; but extension of commerce, on the other hand, rendered the connection between all classes of the two countries so solid and intimate, and compelled them to cling so closely together for self-protection, as to make collision between their two Governments less likely, if not virtually, impossible. In conclusion, he must express to noble Lords on both sides of the House his earnest hope, that whatever differences they might entertain as to some of the details of this Treaty, they would be willing to admit that, on the whole, the acceptance of it would conduce more to the interests of this country than its rejection, and that they would at least concur in the words of Mr. Huskisson, who said—

“To be liberal in matters of commercial policy is to remove the difficulties and jealousies which have hitherto prevented a free intercourse between different nations, to extend to each the advantages and enjoyments of the other, and to promote arts, sciences, and civilization; and when we speak with reference to the commercial interests of this country, the argument is strengthened instead of being weakened. Her wealth, her industry, her talent, her prosperity, are all so many inducements for us to liberalize the system. In short, I would be liberal to other countries, because, among other reasons, I feel that by so doing I best consult the interests of my own."

EARL GREY: My Lords, having, in common with your Lordships, listened with great pleasure to the able speeches which have been addressed to us by the Mover and Seconder of this Motion, I regret that I cannot concur in the opinion they have expressed, nor give my vote in favour of the Motion they have submitted to the House. Let me first say that, in voting against this Motion, it is far from being my intention to offer any obstacle to this Treaty coming into operation, much as I disapprove it. It seems to me that it is now too late to attempt to resist carrying the Treaty into effect—matters have gone too far for that—but I say that this Address is not only not necessary, but is useless for the purpose of giving validity to the French Treaty. The assent of Parliament is undoubtedly required to certain parts of the Treaty, but that assent can only be given by Acts of Parliament sanctioning the reduction or abolition of duties which this country has pledged itself to reduce or to remit; and such, I conceive, is the "assent" required by the Treaty. Bills for this purpose will, no doubt, in due course be brought before us, and I entertain no doubt that your Lordships, wisely following your usual practice of not interfering, except in extreme cases, with matters of that kind coming from the other House, will give your assent to those Bills. When you have done that you have done all that is necessary to bring the Treaty into operation. My Lords, I venture to appeal with confidence to the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack to say whether I am not right in this view of the subject, and in affirming that this Address is neither required to give validity to the Treaty, nor can have any operation in doing so. Then, if the Address is not required to give validity to the Treaty, what is its effect? Its effect is simply to express in the most solemn and formal manner your Lordships' complete approval of the Treaty, both of its general policy and of its details. The question, therefore, we have now to consider is this—whether this House is not merely to abstain from opposition to the Treaty, but is to declare its approval, and thus share with the Ministers of the Crown and the other House the responsibility for the agreement entered into with France, by proclaiming that in our opinion the Ministers of the Crown have acted wisely in this matter. I, for one, as entertaining a directly opposite opinion, find it utterly impossible to give my vote in favour of an Address which, in such unqualified terms, expresses approval of the Treaty. I will give my reasons for that opinion; but, in the first place, let me say I do not think this Treaty can be considered by itself, but must be considered as a part—and an essential part—of the general financial arrangements of the Government. I am justified in so considering it, for after the fact of the Treaty having been ratified was announced, the Government refrained for several days from laying it before Parliament, notwithstanding the extreme anxiety of the country to know its terms; but they withheld it until it could be explained in the other House as an essential part of the general financial scheme of the Government. I do not complain that that course was taken, but, on the contrary, think it was quite proper, as the Treaty is inseparably connected with the Budget. The Treaty imposes upon us the necessity of making a large sacrifice of revenue, and before we can judge whether it was wise to make such sacrifices, we must know how the deficiency thus created is to be supplied, and what are to be the general financial arrangements of the Government; I need not therefore offer any apology to the House for venturing to trouble your Lordships with some remarks upon the general financial arrangements of the Government, and stating why it is that I object to the scheme they have laid before us. Let me assure your Lordships that, although I shall make some remarks upon the Budget, I do not intend to trouble you with a long array of figures and details, but shall confine myself to considering the leading features of the scheme; for I cannot but feel how wanting I am in that skill and eloquence which were so conspicuously displayed by the expounder of the scheme in the other House, and which made a long and complicated statement, dealing with a vast variety of subjects, and embracing a large mass of figures, so clear and interesting to all who had the good fortune to hear it. The first remark that I must make upon the financial scheme is, that, in my opinion, it was very happily designated as "an ambitious Budget." It is eminently ambitious; for the Government having to deal with a state of things in which the ordinary balance between expenditure and receipts could not easily be maintained, it was bold of them to begin by increasing the deficiency and making a large reduction of taxation. The Government proposes that indirect taxation to the amount of rather more than £3,900,000 should be remitted. They calculate that by increased consumption of some Articles, the duties upon which are only reduced, by the imposition of new charges, and by a saving in our establishments that first loss will be reduced by £1,800,000, and that consequently the net loss to the revenue will be about £2,100,000. That loss arises mainly from the remission of duties upon wine, brandy, and paper; the loss upon other items of comparatively minor importance being balanced by new charges to which I see no objection. The Treaty, and the scheme connected with it, effect a reduction of duties to the extent of more than £2,000,000, mainly, as I have said, upon the articles of wine, brandy, and paper. We have no surplus, and it is impossible at present to bring our expenditure much below the existing amount. Therefore, if more than £2,000,000 of duties be remitted, that loss must be made good in one of two ways. Either we must anticipate our resources, and effect, either directly or indirectly, some transaction in the nature of a loan, or we must create new taxes. Now, as to change of taxation, I was much struck by the force of an argument very well stated in some remarks on the Budget, known, I believe, to have been written by my noble Friend behind me (Lord Overstone), than whom no one has greater knowledge and experience upon this subject. He has observed in the paper to which I allude that change of taxation is always in itself more or less an evil, and that inconveniences arise from the mere fact of change, because the various interests of the country gradually get accustomed to their burdens, and know how to bear them, and make their arrangements accordingly; but when an old tax is removed and a new one substituted, even if the change is an improvement, yet it inflicts great hardship and inconvenience at first. The conclusion to be drawn from this is that change of taxation ought not to be lightly undertaken. I know there are occasions when a change of taxation may be attended with very great benefit; and those who recommend the present scheme refer, as a striking instance of this, to the policy which was adopted in 1842. No man is more sensible than myself of the advantages which at that time arose from a change of taxes; but I would venture to ask your Lordships whether there is the slightest resemblance in the circumstances of that period to those of the present day? In the year 1842 we had a deficiency in the Exchequer; the indirect taxes had been increased, and the result proved that indirect taxation had been pushed beyond the limit at which it was most productive; at the same time, the indirect taxes we then had were highly objectionable, involving the principle of protection and imposing a burthen upon the country out of all proportion to the income they yielded. As a consequence of this the country, and every branch of trade and industry, afforded unmistakeable proofs that they were overpressed, that some relief was urgently demanded, and that measures must be adopted for that purpose, or the country would suffer severely. Most wisely, therefore, but at the same time, let me observe, most cautiously, the policy of removing indirect taxation by the imposition of a direct burden, in the shape of the income tax, was commenced. I need not tell your Lordships how successful that policy was. But that very success is an argument against the adoption of a similar course at the present time. I have reminded the House of the situation of the country in 1842;—what is it now? Has indirect taxation proved over-burdensome—has it passed the limits of productiveness? Has it crippled industry and trade? Far otherwise. Each succeeding year the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been enabled to come down to Parliament and to state that the extraordinary productiveness of the revenue has exceeded even the most sanguine anticipations which were entertained, and that the revenue was growing almost beyond what was believed to be possible. So much have trade and industry improved in all their branches, that we are congratulated not only by Her Majesty's Ministers, but on every side, on the extraordinary prosperity of the country. Trade and manufactures are not limited by any want of demand, or by the difficulty of discovering profitable markets, but only by the difficulty of finding hands enough to work the machinery that is being continually added to what we already have, and raw material in sufficient quantity to keep that machinery employed. Is that, I say, a state of things in which it is necessary to hazard a great and perilous experiment on the credit of the country? But then, we are told there is a reason for this change; and I must say that in all my experience in Parliament, which is now a pretty long one, I never heard a reason adduced for a great measure of this nature which is so entirely fanciful as that which has been brought forward in this instance. We are told, indeed, that the country has been long looking forward to the period when the Long Annuities should expire, in the hope and confident expectation that great relief from taxation would then be afforded, and that we are bound not to disappoint the expectations so entertained. I quite concur in thinking it natural that the country should have anticipated considerable relief from its burdens when these annuities fell in, and it is greatly to be regretted that those expectations should be disappointed. But I want to know how, under present circumstances, it is possible that those anticipations should be realized? We are told that in the present year £2,100,000 of the charge for the debt will be struck off; but new charges for a very much larger amount have come upon us. We gain £2,100,000 by the falling in of the Long Annuities, but we have to pay £1,400,000 for additional interest on the loans contracted during the Russian war. This will swallow up two-thirds of the melting plum which the people have been so long looking forward to; and the remaining third will go a very small way indeed towards meeting the expenses of the increased establishments we are now maintaining, which have been considered so necessary that they do not appear to have excited any serious opposition in Parliament. If we compare our present expenditure with what it was a few years ago, it will be evident that the saving from the falling in of the annuities has been far more than absorbed by the new charges we have incurred. Under these circumstances, much as it may be regretted, I say it is impossible we can fulfil the expectations which have existed, and we are not in a position to afford relief. To urge, therefore, that it is necessary to remit taxation because it was expected that we should do so in the present year, is not an argument, but a mere fancy. Let me ask your Lordships what would be thought of a man acting on this principle in private life? I will suppose a gentleman with a good estate, but burdened with a heavy life annuity; he has long groaned under the burden, and has promised himself that whenever it expired he would make some additions to his establishment which would contribute very greatly to his comfort. No doubt, to a person in this situation it would be a very great disappointment if, when the life annuity fell in, he found that from other circumstances new charges to a large amount had come upon him. But what should we think of the good sense of such a man who in this situation was to say, "I have always promised myself, when I got rid of this detested annuity, that I would indulge my fancy for something on which my heart was very much set; the time has now come, and, though it is perfectly true that from other causes my means have diminished instead of being increased, and I am less able to afford myself this gratification than at the time when I formed the resolution to do so, still I cannot and will not refuse myself the indulgence, and I will provide for the increased expenditure by some arrangement as to my property, which I have hitherto declined as imprudent." Yet that is precisely the course which Her Majesty's Ministers have advised us to adopt. These wine and paper duties have over and over again been brought under the consideration of Parliament. Successive Chancellors of the Exchequer, and among them the distinguished Gentleman who now holds that office, have concurred in earnestly pressing on Parliament that they ought not to meddle with these taxes; not because they were free from objection—for my part I never yet heard of a tax which was free from objection—but on the ground that the revenue could not afford to sustain the loss, and that no less injurious tax could be imposed in their stead. And yet we are told by one of those very Chancellors of the Exchequer that now, forsooth, when we are less able than formerly to repeal these duties, because it happens that the Long Annuities have fallen in, which have been more than counterbalanced by new expenses, we are bound to please the nation by a large reduction of indirect taxation. My Lords, I confess it seems to me that to deal with the people of this country on such a principle is to treat them like children, and not like sensible men who are capable of forming a sound view of their own affairs. Let me ask your Lordships to consider the real effect of that arrangement which is proposed on such fantastic grounds; and, in considering the effect of these measures, you must forgive me if I do not confine my view merely to the financial year. If we would form a sound judgment on this subject we must look a little further forward. On the year which is about to open, it is quite true that a small balance over expenditure is shown on the Ways and Means. I am afraid that balance will neither be large nor certain, for if we look in the most cursory manner at the estimate of future expenses, I think we must admit that it is taken, to say the least, in a most sanguine temper. For instance, I find that in making the calculation which gives us a small surplus on the opening year the Vote for the expedition to China is set down at only £500,000 beyond the provision which, to a certain extent, is made in the Army and Navy Estimates. I am told that already votes of credit have grown to £850,000, and I think none of your Lordships, who have considered the question, will believe that their growth will stop there. We are all too well aware of the manner in which such calculations are exceeded in practice: and from what I know of expenses now going on, from what I hear from the north of ships being taken up to carry coals to China at freights of from four guineas to 90s. per ton, which will bring the cost of the coals you burn out there to about £5 per ton; from the fact that you have sixty pennants in the Chinese seas, for which you will have to find fuel at this extravagant rate; and when you remember, too, what a tendency hostile operations carried on at a distance have to become far more expensive than possible that there is any truth in another report which is current, that this expense is to be provided for by a loan. Surely it never can be possible that this ruinous and improvident mode of providing for expenses of this description during peace should be recommended by the same Chancellor of the Exchequer who so eloquently and earnestly impressed upon Parliament the duty of providing for the greater part at least of the enormous expenses of an European war within the year in which they were incurred. Assuming, however, that there is a real, and not a nominal balance of expenditure and income at the end of the year, I wish your Lordships to observe the manner in which it is obtained. It is provided partly by imposing for one year only the income tax at the high rate of 10s., partly by re-imposing for little more than a year the high duties on tea and sugar, and, lastly, by availing ourselves for the service of the ensuing year of about £1,400,000 derived from taking up the malt and hop credits, which course, I contend, is as much an application of the capital of the State to the purposes of income as if a loan to the same extent were raised. Suppose the expenditure and income for the year 1860-61 do balance, what will be the case in the following year? Of course, this last sum, £1,400,000, will have been drawn and spent; you cannot reckon on that coming in; your taxes on tea and sugar will expire unless you re-impose them; and it will, therefore, be the duty of Parliament in 1861 to deal with a deficiency of not less than from £10,000,000 to £11,000,000. [Lord MONTAGUE: £12,000,000.] My noble Friend is much more experienced in such matters than I am, and he says £12,000,000. That is surely a serious prospect to look forward to. And how is this deficiency to be met, and by whom? This Budget cuts you off to a great extent from indirect taxation. The bargain you are making with France includes so many articles that it will be impossible for the future to devise any mode of raising a considerable revenue from Customs' duties. Again, with regard to the Excise, the old staple articles upon which the largest revenue has always been raised are already burdened, I am afraid, to their full extent, and when you are repealing the Excise duty on paper, acknowledging deliberately at the same time that of all Excise duties it interferes least of all with the manufacturer and with industry, and that, instead of showing signs of falling off, it is a growing revenue, and that any objections that may exist may be easily removed—yet you are, nevertheless, surrendering it. Where will you be able to discover any new source of revenue at the same time so profitable and so unobjectionable? How are we to provide, then, for this deficiency? A part, no doubt, will be met by retaining the war duties on tea and sugar; but still there will be a large sum remaining, and almost the only resource left to you will be to reimpose the income tax, which, with the additional demands coming on you next year, will have to be imposed at the rate of 1s. in the pound, in order to answer its purpose. I ask any of your Lordships who have been in the habit of paying attention to financial matters, whether it is desirable that an income tax of that amount should be raised? For my own part, I look forward to the future with the utmost alarm, and, if anything were wanting to increase that alarm, it would be the ground on which it is argued by Her Majesty's Government that these taxes ought to be levied for one year only and the question left open for the future. We are informed that a House of Commons chosen by a new constituency is likely to be returned, and we are further informed that it is right that the whole question of what is to be the character of the future taxation of the country should be left to that body with its constitution so altered. Assuming that it really does happen that a new House of Commons is returned next year, elected by a far larger proportion than at present of those who do not pay direct taxes, is it wise or prudent, for the sake of peace, for the sake of good feeling between different classes of society, to leave a question of this kind to be settled by them at the first moment? The present Budget is defended in newspapers, at public meetings, and in the other House on the ground of its likeness to the policy of 1842; but I put it to your Lordships whether this was the policy adopted by Sir Robert Peel. Did his arrangements create an enormous deficiency without pointing out how it was to be filled up? On the contrary, before a single step was taken to remove even the most obnoxious duty, the income tax was imposed for three years, in which time it was calculated the deficiency would be covered, from the stimulus given to consumption and production by reduction of duties. The repeal of indirect taxes in those days was invariably preceded by the imposition of direct taxes which were calculated to entirely fill up the void. The course now pursued is exactly the reverse. No man can believe that the void now created will be filled in the time contemplated. In the first place we take off the paper altogether, so that cannot be recovered at all; and with regard to the wine duty the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his more prudent days—in 1853—while he said it was a bad duty, told the House very fairly that although he believed it ought to be reduced whenever we could spare the income, it would take some years before the revenue would recover. We know it is an affair of time for the habits of men to change, and, therefore, we cannot calculate that the revenue, in the case of the wine duty, will soon recover. I have now stated part of my objections on mere financial grounds to the policy of Her Majesty's Government; I could go further on this head, were it not that I have promised to your Lordships to abstain from details; but abiding by that engagement, I will merely ask your Lordships whether this general and cursory statement is not sufficient to show that the Budget is a dangerous measure, and that the Treaty, which renders the most dangerous of its arrangements indispensable, is not entitled, on financial grounds alone, to our approval? I now turn to another branch of the question. In that part of the able speech of my noble Friend who moved the Address, where he described so forcibly the great advantages of improved intercourse between this country and France, I cordially concur. But the fallacy in my noble Friend's argument was that he confounded the advantages of increased intercourse with France with the advantages of the Treaty, and that he omitted to show that the Treaty was the best mode of securing increased intercourse. I ventured on a former evening to state the reasons which induced me to believe that it is far from being the case. I will not abuse the very great indulgence which your Lordships have shown me by going over again the same ground; but I must be permitted to say that my noble Friend has said nothing which tends to shake my conviction that the Treaty is not the best means of arriving at that end, and that, on the contrary, it is calculated to keep up the fears and apprehensions of the French people.

Let me remind your Lordships that the obstacles to increased intercourse are almost entirely on the side of France; English legislation affords few or none; and what are really protective duties might still be removed, without incurring the financial difficulties which this Treaty entails, without any Treaty at all. If the Government had opened the doors as wide as possible to French produce without any Treaty, or looking for any concessions from France in return, I can assure your Lordships no man would have applauded the proposal more heartily than I should. But I say that this Treaty is calculated to increase the indisposition of the French to a change in their commercial system. France, by this Treaty, makes a very, very small approach to the adoption of a liberal system. She comes to about the point where we were when the first proposals of Mr. Huskisson for mitigating our old restrictions had been carried, and perhaps hardly so far. I rather think Mr. Huskisson regarded thirty per cent as the maximum to which protection could be carried, because beyond that the smuggler stepped in and the duty did nothing. I believe that is exactly what this Treaty will do. It will interfere with the smuggler, but for every other purpose it will have very little effect indeed. I have said that in my opinion this Treaty is calculated to increase the apprehensions in the mind of the French producer, which are the great obstacles to extended intercourse. I was much struck by a fact of which we were reminded by my noble Friend who seconded the Address. He pointed out how sincere and strong were the apprehensions entertained by a numerous body of our own countrymen that on the abolition of protection ruin would come upon them. No doubt they feared such would be the result. But I ask whether your Lordships do not think that the intensity of the opposition to these changes would have been greatly increased if it could have been represented in this country at that time, that the changes were made, not for our own benefit, but to bribe some foreign nation to believe that the apprehension that French industry is sacrificed for political objects will increase the opposition in France to any real reform, and that this Treaty will be an obstacle in the way of establishing that extended intercourse between the two countries which I and my noble Friend equally desire. I adhere to my opinion that there should be no bargains of this kind; but I say if we are to have a Treaty there ought to be some approach to fairness. England has already done so much for France, and what still remains for us to do is so completely accomplished by this Treaty that we have left France nothing more to ask for. We agree to make a very large, and at the present moment, a very inconvenient sacrifice of revenue on wine and brandy, while we had given complete equality to French shipping in our home and colonial ports. If we were to appeal to France and say, "Is there anything more which we can possibly do to favour your trade?" I am persuaded the most intelligent of French Ministers would be puzzled to point out any further concessions. We debar ourselves, under any possible circumstances, from reimposing the duty on coal for ten years. I agree that it is highly improbable that we shall wish to do so, but we deprive ourselves of the power of making any alteration. In return for our concessions what is France to do? Not a single article of English produce is to be admitted free. The most important of those articles are still to remain subject to duties as high as the smugglers practically will allow them to levy. Our shipping is to remain subject to all the existing restrictions. The only articles on which any considerable concession is made are those for which France has immediate occasion, for her manufactures or otherwise; and it is remarkable that during the negotiations we never appear to have asked for the free export of the raw materials of two of our important manufactures—silk and paper. Raw silk is still to remain subject to an export duty; and, as far as the negotiations of the Treaty were concerned, rage would have remained subject to prohibition. A few days ago we were told that the prohibition was to be removed, and were congratulating ourselves on the concession, when our joy was damped by the announcement that the removal of the prohibition only meant the substitution of an export duty, which on so cheap an article as rage was only prohibition under another name. I ask, is that free trade or is it not? Is it just to our paper manufacturers that they should be debarred from purchasing rags on equal terms with the foreign manufacturers with whom they are to be brought into competition? It seems to me it is in nowise fair. But we are told this is a wrong view to take of the matter, and that we have made no bargain with France, because she receives from us no boon which is not a still greater benefit to ourselves. The exports of rags and raw silk were subjects, it is said, quite unfit for negotiation, because to have negotiated on the principle of bargain, demanding an equivalent for every concession, would have thrown the greatest obstacles in the way of the progress of free trade. Well, these are very sound doctrines. They are precisely the arguments I have myself frequently used to show that it is inexpedient to make the reduction of duties on each other's produce matter of bargain between two nations, and that the proper way is for each to regulate her own tariff according to her wants and interests. But the Government ought to make their choice between the one and the other of these two opposing doctrines—that a bargain is a good thing or a bad. If they say that a bargain is a good thing, and that is politic for us to make one with France, then they are bound to see that the bargain is a fair one, and have no right to turn round and accuse us of taking a narrow, mean-spirited view of the matter. If we do not get concessions, let us keep our hands free. Do not let us fetter ourselves by any engagements for the future. Let us reserve the power of re-establishing the duty on wine in case we should find it desirable to do so, and of imposing a duty on coals in case our supply should run short. Do not let us enjoy the disadvantages of being at the same time bond and free. The next point which I have to notice is one which I feel great delicacy in approaching, especially after the intelligencé that has reached us this forenoon, but which it is impossible for me to pass over—I allude to the question of Savoy. I cannot but think the Government are greatly to blame for having signed this Treaty without first obtaining from France a formal disavowal of the intention to add Savoy and Nice to her Empire. We now know what was not admitted at first—that before this Treaty was signed, the Government were well aware that this question was in agitation. They had a distinct warning that, in the event of certain arrangements taking place in Italy, France would think herself entitled to take possession of Savoy; and, knowing that, the Government incurred a heavy responsibility in consenting to sign this Treaty without obtaining a formal disclaimer from France of that intention. I regard the annexation of Savoy to France as a misfortune, not only to England but, to Europe—to the whole civilized world—I believe it to be pregnant with mischief; and I say that while that design was in agitation we ought not to have given France so signal a proof of our confidence and support as is conveyed by the signature of this Commercial Treaty without requiring from her the abandonment of the project. But, further than that, I say it was impossible under those circumstances, and with the knowledge of what was impending, to sign that Treaty without inflicting a stain on the honour of England in the eyes of Europe. How is the matter regarded on the Continent—in France especially? I have the testimony of a gentleman, on whose judgment I place the greatest reliance, that the manner in which the subject is viewed in France is this:—They believe, as foreign nations have long believed, that our whole policy is directed to the one object of selling our cotton, that all other considerations are as nothing in comparison with that, that that is all we think of, and that the key to our policy on every other question is to be found within those narrow limits. Regarding us in this light, they imagine that the Commercial Treaty has been conceded to us as a sop to induce us to submit with patience to the annexation of Savoy. They believe that our resistance is all a sham. I know they are wrong. I will not do Her Majesty's Government the injustice to believe for a moment they are incapable of such baseness as that of writing high-sounding despatches unless they really wished to oppose the arrangement, and with no other view than to have them laid before Parliament. But that is what is imputed to us, and is gaining ground in the minds of the people of France, and I fear not only of France but of Europe. There can be no doubt that such an opinion is calculated to lower the character of England, to bring her down from the high position she ought to occupy, and to degrade her in the eyes of the world. I am confirmed in this view by the Report upon the Commercial Treaty by the French Minister, published a few days ago, in which there is an elaborate argument to show that the Treaty has been based solely on industrial and commercial reasons, and that there are no political objects in the background. There is an old proverb, and a very true one—Qui s'excuse s'accuse; and I believe that the elaborate excuse of the motives of the Treaty put forward by the French Minister is only a proof that he knows it is differently regarded by the people. My Lords, we all know that the annexation of Savoy is a most dangerous step to the future peace of Europe. We know this by the proof it gives us that the old appetite of territorial aggrandizement, which in the beginning of the present century made France such a curse to Europe and to herself, is not extinct, and that the feelings which directed the policy of the first Emperor are not alien to the second. We know that questions of natural boundaries and the natural limits of France are rising into alarming proximity—that the confidence which a few years ago existed cannot for years and years be again established, and that Europe, from one end to the other, will feel the effects of the alarm that has been created. While that state of things continues it will be impossible for this country, with a due regard to its own safety, to diminish its naval and military defences. This annexation of Savoy imposes upon us an enormous charge for military and naval expenditure, and our Government had a right to say to the French Government, "We will not sign a treaty by which we throw away £1,000,000 of revenue, while you by this act increase our present burthens." I say that is the reply which it was the bounden duty of Her Majesty's Government to have given. I will pursue this subject no further. I beg to acknowledge the great indulgence of the House, and I will ask your Lordships whether I have not shown good reasons why this House, without attempting to interfere with the execution of this Treaty, should yet decline to share with Her Majesty's Government the responsibility of so objectionable a measure.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he quite agreed with the noble Earl that it was necessary to show that the measures which Her Majesty's Government had recommended to Parliament were good in themselves, without reference to the Treaty. With this view he would endeavour to follow the noble Earl upon some of the financial considerations of the question. The noble Earl declared that the Budget of the present Government was a dangerous and ambitious Budget. He had, however, overlooked the fact that the Budget of 1842 was open to the same objections. In 1842 Sir Robert Peel, finding a very large deficit of £2,500,000, remitted duties to the amount of £1,270,000, making a deficit of near £3,780,000, to cover which he imposed new taxes bringing in £4,380,000. By these means he changed a deficit into a surplus. In 1845 Sir Robert Peel took a step still more remarkable, for having a surplus of only £1,200,000, he made remissions to the amount of upwards of £4,000,000. In 1853 the present Chancellor took the same course. The object of both was the same—to remove burdens from trade, that it might have room for more elastic expansion, and thereby to restore the revenue of the country to its previous prosperous condition. In the present year the Government had to face a very large expenditure; and, therefore, according to the noble Earl, this was not the time for a reduction of taxation. But he would contend that the very best course to take was to lighten the springs of industry when they were about to impose heavy burdens upon the people. The noble Earl did not appear to remember in regard to wine that the importation was not greater in the last five years than it had been in the five years preceding 1790. He did not understand how the noble Earl could call that a revenue of an elastic kind. Considering the high protective duty upon brandy, he did not think the Government had acted unwisely, even with an eye to the revenue, in reducing the duty on that article. With regard to the very important article of silk, there was no article in the whole range of Customs' revenue the duty upon which was more indefensible than that upon silk. Before 1826 the importation of foreign silk was virtually prohibited:—the duty was then reduced to 15 per cent, and now the manufacture of silk had immensely increased. The noble Earl had made the comparison of a gentleman whose expenditure was increasing, and who was, nevertheless, indulging in luxuries that he had no right to enjoy. But he would rather compare the circumstances of the country to those of a gentleman of a large estate who had expended considerable sums in its improvement, which gave him an increasing return. When the moment of large expenditure came, the gentleman, according to the noble Earl, ought to starve his estate; while, according to the Government, it would be better for him to carry on the successful system of outlay and improvement which would enable him to bear his burdens. The noble Earl, in the course of his speech, adverted to the China war, and said that the vote of credit of £500,000 was really a vote of £800,000. But the noble Earl must remember that of the £800,000, the sum of £300,000, was a vote of credit for the next year—the vote for this year was, in fact, only £500,000. His noble Friend complained of the arrangement as to the tea and sugar duties, and used rather strong language as to the impropriety of leaving to a reformed Parliament next year the task of dealing with the deficiency that, he said, must arise. Now, the noble Earl knew that one Parliament could not fetter the discretion of a succeeding Parliament; therefore, whatever course the Government had adopted it would clearly have been open to the succeeding Parliament to adopt or reverse their policy; and he could not help thinking that, if they were to show distrust of the new Parliament that might meet next year, the effect would be to suggest to them a suspicion that the measures now adopted were not such as they ought to approve of. His noble Friend objected to treaties of this kind altogether, because he said they were bargains, and the present he characterized as a bad bargain; but he (Lord Wodehouse) did not see what possible objection could be taken to our engaging ourselves to a certain course for a period of ten years, if mutual advantage was to be the result. His noble Friend spoke lightly of the French concessions and said we should derive no advantage from them; but if he took the Returns that had been laid on the table, and observed the high duties hitherto levied on British goods imported into France, and compared them with the reductions now effected, he must surely admit that great advantages would in future accrue to our trade. He would see that at present the duties on iron, cutlery, cotton manufactures, &c., were so high as to put trade in those articles almost entirely out of the question; while under the present Treaty the duties would be from 25 to 30 per cent, and surely under such very great reductions, a very large increase in our trade to France might be anticipated. We carried on a very large trade with the United States, though the tariff of that country imposed import duties as large as would be imposed under the new tariff in France; and from this it might be inferred that we should be able to carry on a large trade with the latter country also. The state of our trade with France was exceedingly unsatisfactory, and, in point of fact, it had been falling off during the last two years, and even of the articles exported, a very small proportion consisted of manufactured goods. He thought, therefore, that nothing could be more wise or natural than to attempt to bring about a new state of things. His noble Friend said we had already removed the restrictions from all the principal articles of commerce, and that there was nothing to complain of in the existing state of things. But the principal articles produced by France—such as wines, silk manufactures, and brandy, were still subjected to high duties in this country. The noble Earl said we should not have proceeded by treaty, but placed our dependence on France and other countries imitating the example we had set. Now, he had heard it said in foreign countries that we had not taken the duties off those articles in the production of which those countries excelled—that we had kept high duties on French wines, silks, and brandies, which we could not ourselves produce, and only taken the duties off those in the production of which our superiority was undoubted. He did not say that was a just argument, but it was put forth as a reason why our example was not followed in regard to the reduction of duties. His noble Friend argued that this Treaty, instead of promoting friendly feelings between the two countries, would render friendship more difficult; and he based this on the belief that the French people were adverse to the Treaty. He did not put any faith in that statement. They knew that protected interests always cried out loudly when assailed; but he believed that in France the great body of the consumers, the wine-growers, the silk-manufacturers, and all who were interested in getting cheap iron and coals, hailed the Treaty with satisfaction. Did they suppose that the French Emperor was not aware of the feelings of his own people? The position of the Emperor of the French was that of a monarch whose throne was based on universal suffrage, and he, of course, knew well what the opinions of the mass of the people were on this subject. To his surprise, the noble Earl had imported into the discussion the delicate and important question of the annexation of Savoy; but he (Lord Wodehouse) submitted there was no connection whatever between the Treaty of Commerce and that annexation. The noble Earl had said that he would not impute to Her Majesty's Government the base idea of selling this country for the sake of commercial advantages. That was scarcely called for, seeing that no one of their Lordships, to whatever political party he might belong, would ever think of accusing his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of entertaining for a moment the idea of sacrificing the honour of the country in any way. Her Majesty's Government had taken the course they had done in this matter of the Treaty because they thought it was based on good grounds of policy with reference to the general interests of the country. In concluding this Treaty, they had endeavoured, not to obtain any exclusive advantages for ourselves, but such as would be as manifest for the French people as they would be for our own. Such a policy carried its own defence with it; and he was satisfied that, whatever might be the opinions of political parties in this country as to the annexation of Savoy, they would not believe that Her Majesty's Government wrote despatches on that subject merely for the purpose of being published in a blue-book, and that at the same time they were concluding a bargain with France by which they sold the honour of the country; but, on the contrary, that they would rather believe the Government had concluded this Treaty on commercial grounds, and on those grounds alone. The noble Earl had said that we ought not to have concluded this Treaty of Commerce at a period like the present. It was true that a feeling of jealousy had existed for many years between the two nations; but in no way was that more likely to be removed than by extending commercial intercourse between them. Her Majesty's Government wanted to see a similar feeling established between England and France as existed, for example, between this country and the United States, and if they could create that feeling, it would result in an alliance, not only of Governments, but of peoples. Mr. Pitt was not deterred by any angry feelings which then existed between the two nations from concluding a commercial treaty in 1786. The edifice which Mr. Pitt then constructed had for forty years been left in ruins, and he (Lord Wodehouse) thought the day had come when we might begin to reconstruct it. He regarded this Treaty as a step towards that reconstruction; and if, as he sincerely hoped, reasonable and patriotic men on both sides of the Channel would assist in its completion and consolidation, he believed, in spite of anticipations to the contrary, that the friendship between the French and English people, and with it the peace of Europe, would rest on a more solid and durable basis than ever they had done in the history of the two nations.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY:—My Lords, I am anxious to state in a few words why I shall support the views of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey), and to express my regret that I cannot join in approaching the Throne with the Address now under the consideration of your Lordships. I think the noble Baron (Lord Wodehouse) who has defended the course taken by Her Majesty's Government in this matter has not been happy in the allusions he made to two great men. In the first place, the noble Baron said, that the conduct of Sir Robert Peel in 1842 was precisely the same as that of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman, like Sir Robert Peel before him, had created a deficit. But there is this great difference between the two,—the one created a deficit from a surplus, and the other adds a considerable deficit to one already existing. The noble Baron referring to the Commercial Treaty with France made by Mr. Pitt in 1786, as a ground for entering into the present Treaty, stated that Mr. Pitt grounded that Treaty on the hope of thereby ensuring peace and amity with that country. If Mr. Pitt did found his Treaty on that basis, he must have been grievously disappointed, for I believe not three years passed after its conclusion before a war between England and France broke out. For myself, I should be glad to see a good Commercial Treaty concluded between England and France. Nay, more; the Government to which I had the honour to belong seven years ago did enter into negotiations with the French Government with the view, if possible, to conclude a Treaty between the two countries; but I am free to confess that we thought the terms offered by the French Government were not sufficiently satisfactory to induce us to proceed further in the matter. Our object was simply to establish some arrangement with France by which the commerce of the two countries might be extended. The noble Baron has said that the present Treaty was not intended as a bargain; but how, let me ask, can it be otherwise? Every Treaty must necessarily be a bargain. It is an agreement, or a convention, or a covenant—call it what you will—between two parties. One says, “I will do this if you will do that;” and I am utterly unable to understand what in the English language is called a bargain if a treaty is not one, and if, therefore, this Treaty was not a bargain between this country and France. My Lords, it was not only a bargain, but a very bad one on our part; and it is because it is a bad one that I cannot join in the farce of complimenting Her Majesty on such an arrangement. Furthermore, political reasons add to my difficulties in concurring in the Address which is now proposed to be made to the Throne. There can be no doubt that the duty placed by France on the importation of our manufactures will amount very much to a prohibition; and that, indeed, is what the French newspapers assure the French Protectionists. I am unable to discover why Her Majesty’s Government were in such extreme haste to carry this Treaty out during the present year, instead of deferring it to another year. In another year the hands of the French Emperor would have been free, and France would have been able to advance pari passu with this country. But, although the French Government offered to give Her Majesty’s Government another year before Her Majesty’s Government sought to give practical effect to their own stipulations, they refused that offer. How is that explained? I will tell your Lordships how it is explained by the French newspapers. They say that France gives you this Treaty as a boon, not to the country, but to the Palmerston Government; that it is a great advantage to the Palmerston Government, that advantage consisting in the support of a certain body in the House of Commons of whose support they did not feel sure. That is the French explanation of the hurry with which this Treaty has been concluded. My Lords, there are some other trifling points which induce me to object to the Treaty in a commercial point of view. One which has not been referred to by the noble Earl opposite is this:—It appears to me a most fair and natural proceeding that if you admit the native beverages of one country, such as the wines of France, that country should in return accept the beverages which are manufactured in this country better than in any other. I should like to know why the Government did not press upon the French Government and even insist upon the necessity of their admitting our malt liquors free, or at a reduced duty? But it seems that nothing of the kind was spoken of, and certainly nothing of the sort was obtained. There was an additional reason for pressing that point upon the French Government, because a most anomalous and enormous tax is levied upon our national beverage—the malt tax, which is condemned by all financiers and political economists, and is only to be justified upon the ground of necessity. But when an article grown by your own agriculturists and manufactured into a beverage by your own countrymen is an article so highly taxed, surely the least that could have been done would have been to ask the French Government to accept it on the same terms as we accept their native beverages. The least that should have been demanded was perfect reciprocity in this matter. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated that the loss to the revenue will be only £700,000. That may or may not be so. I prefer arguments to prophecies, unless I am sure of the prevision of the prophet. I must say I have not that great confidence in the judgment of the right hon. Gentleman as respects the future, although no one can more admire his talents than I do; but from his past conclusions in 1853, I cannot be quite sure that the loss will not be more than £700,000. One thing is quite clear, that if the vacuum caused by the reduction to one-half of the duties on French wine is to be filled up it must be from the English drinking twice as much French wine as they do now. But we may conclude that if they do drink twice the quantity of wine then they will drink less English beer, and if so there will be a proportionate diminution in the proceeds of the malt tax. Therefore, in order to fill up the vacuum that will be caused by the reduction of the duty on wine, and also to fill up the consequent vacuum in the malt tax, the people of this country must, in order to satisfy the Chancellor of the Exchequer, drink twice as much wine and half as much beer again as they drink now. I shall say no more upon the commercial aspect of the Treaty; but I must say I was astonished to hear the noble Baron (Lord Wodehouse) declare this was not a political but a commercial Treaty—that it had been entered into upon commercial grounds alone. I will not quote my own crude opinions upon this point, but I will refer to the words of his noble chief, in a despatch to Earl Cowley, dated Jan. 17, in which he says, speaking of the Commercial Treaty:—

If that be not a political view of the Treaty, I am at a loss to understand the force of the English language. Those are remarkable words. In what part of the Continent will they be of significance at the present moment? Is it Italy, or is it Savoy? This Treaty, as I have said, was one between the noble Viscount at the head of Her Majesty's Government and the Emperor of the French. It is not a Treaty between the English and the French peoples. To prove that I will tell your Lordships what is the opinion of one of the most distinguished French journals as to the history of this Treaty. The Journal des Debats, your Lordships will recollect, was a journal that used to delight Europe with the harmony of its principles, its consistency, and its writings; but I am afraid that “now are the mighty fallen,” and that that once important and influential journal is now only playing second fiddle in the large orchestra of the great maestro of Europe. In that case its opinions are doubly valuable. The Journal des Debats of the 10th of March says:—

“The policy of the Emperor's speech on the 1st of March is no rupture with England, nor is it a reaction against Italy. It is simply a policy not so far English as to maintain the Palmerston Government at any price. It was no doubt very fine for Lord Palmerston to tell England, ‘Our policy has triumphed without spending an English shilling or an English drop of blood; our good friends the French have undertaken to pay both in blood and money.’ This doubtless would have secured the Palmerston Administration. Must it, then, fall unless we do all it asks? We sustain it by the Treaty of Commerce, of which we have made it a gift; while we weaken it by Savoy, que nous revendiquons.”

That word “revendiquer” is worth translating. According to the best French dictionary—namely, Le Dictionnaire de L'Academie—it means, “Reclamer une chose qui nous appartient et qui est dans les mains d'un autre.” The article goes on to say:—

The Earl of Malmesbury

“Whence it follows that between the force we give it on the one hand and which we withdraw from it on the other the Palmerston Government remains on its own natural legs. What we have done serves English interests; what we do against it shocks English feelings, Lord Palmerston's Government ought to stand; it represents a real gain and a moral check.”

That is the opinion of one of the organs of His Imperial Majesty. I cannot deduce from that any hope that the Commercial Treaty will produce that perpetual friendship and amity which Lord John Russell speaks of. But what is its significance in the eyes of the rest of Europe? It can only be in relation to Italy, or to Savoy. Europe knows that long ago the noble Lord was aware that, under certain circumstances, Savoy would be annexed, and yet he was the very man to propose to bring about that state of circumstances. He knew that a large independent kingdom in the north of Italy would bring about the annexation of Savoy, and yet that was what he recommended to the French Emperor. It is no wonder that for a long time he said nothing about the annexation of Savoy. He must have expected it as a natural consequence of his own advice; but at the eleventh hour, being probably roused by the English press and Parliament, he did speak, as I must do him the justice to say, in a very proper tone. But, I am free to add, I do not think the noble Lord quite sees things as they are. I do not think he looked at the matter with the eyes of a statesman, or of one conversant with the laws of Europe, or of nations. He does not appear sensible of the international obligations involved. What is Sardinia? What is England, or Russia, or Prussia, or Austria? They are co-trustees to guard the Treaties of Vienna, and among them that which embraces the neutrality of part of Savoy and of Switzerland. I cannot but think when an English Minister saw a serious intention to annex Savoy, when he saw the French Emperor nibbling at the frontier out of which he is about to take so large a bite, it was his duty to call upon our co-trustees of the treaties of 1815, and ask what they thought of the matter. I know the French Emperor would have been very much angered at any appearance of being threatened by a new coalition. We ought to be careful not to excite jealousy on that account. But, on the point of duty, when a whole population is about to be transferred like cattle from one sovereign to another, when frontiers most important to the safety of Europe are about to be changed, when landmarks are about to be altered, all of which were guaranteed by the most important treaties of the age, of which, as I have said, we are not only co-signatories but trustees—that the noble Lord should have satisfied himself, as a British Foreign Minister, with solely and singly addressing some not very strong remonstrances to the Emperor of the French, is to me utterly unintelligible, and I think most reprehensible. It is the opinion of Europe that the Government has been indifferent on that point; and if any significance attaches, in the eyes of Europe, to this Commercial Treaty, it is, I believe, the significance described by the noble Earl who opposed the Address, that we think it of less consequence to defend Savoy by argument, by remonstrance, and by protests, than to sacrifice the chance which is thrown out to us of selling a certain additional quantity of cotton and other manufactures. I cannot sit down without expressing, in common with the noble Earl, my very great apprehension at what has taken place. I have a greater right, perhaps, than any man to remember the promise given by the French Emperor when he established his Empire and mounted his Imperial throne. At the time the Government of my noble Friend, who sits beside me (the Earl of Derby), was in office, and I had to conduct a correspondence of great importance on that very point—the question was one which alarmed the whole of Europe—namely, the title of which the Emperor of the French had made choice. Significant, indeed, was the word which was well used to express the ideas that arose in the minds of all when the Emperor called himself Napoleon the Third. It was necessary to ascertain whether, in adopting that title, he assumed it in direct descent from Napoleon I., as having obtained his throne by inheritance, or whether he stood on it by the election of the people; it was indispensably necessary to ascertain whether, as Napoleon III., he recognised the present authority of Europe, and all the acts which had passed between the fall of his uncle and his own accession. Most frankly, candidly, and loyally he came forward and said he accepted and would observe the Treaties of 1814 and 1815, and all the public acts of Europe, which had taken place in the interval. And I will add that until this moment he has kept his word most faithfully. I repeat, that I know no instance in which he has diverged from that promise. It is, therefore, with the deepest regret and the greatest apprehension that I see him, for the first time, step out of the straight and honourable path he has pursued—a path which, if he still chose to pursue, would ensure to him the respect of all Europe, and the strongest desire on the part of this country to retain his friendship and alliance.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he would not follow the noble Earl who had just sat down into the question of Savoy, because no one who did not entertain opinions identical with those of the noble Earl, and of the noble Earl who had previously spoken, and who did not believe Her Majesty's Government capable of enacting mere shams, and his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary of writing despatches without feeling the sentiments which they expressed, would consider that Her Majesty's Government could be indifferent on this important subject. It was fortunate, as far as regarded the foreign aspect of the question, that no difference of opinion existed on either side of the House; but, although it was natural that the name of Savoy should rise to the lips of any one who spoke at the present moment, the subject with which they had to deal that evening was the Commercial Treaty with France, to the consideration of which he would endeavour to recall attention. Those opposed to the policy of the Government were apt to lay great stress on the word "bargain," and to contend that, as every treaty must be a bargain, the present ought to be looked at solely in a financial and commercial point of view; and then, shifting their ground, the House was reminded that other countries believed this Treaty to be a bargain of another description, and that for the advantages which we were to obtain under it we had tacitly agreed to the annexation of Savoy. He denied that Her Majesty's Government had been parties to the agreement in any such sense. The case was not one in which the advantages given to France by a reduction of duties being placed at one side of the account, and the amount of the reductions made by France on the other, and, a balance being struck, it could be held that the bargain was a good or a bad one for this country. From such a point of view the terms might be disadvantageous. But the sound and intelligible principle on which the Government took its stand was, that the reductions proposed were in themselves beneficial, and that the advantages given by France were merely in addition to those which were conferred on the people of this country. The Government, he contended, had followed most accurately in the steps of the great finance Ministers who had preceded them, and had acted on the principles which had guided the commercial policy of England for the last eighteen years. The noble Earl who had just sat down had referred to the financial policy of Sir Robert Peel; but whatever ground there might have been for his remarks as applied to 1845 they certainly did apply to the year 1842.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: You are quite right. I made a mistake in the years.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON: Sir Robert Peel, in 1842, found a deficit of £2,000,000, and he effected remissions which made the total deficit £3,500,000—a process very similar to that pursued by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. With regard to the opinion of the Leeds Chamber of Commerce, the noble Earl, not unnaturally, had been led into a statement which was not borne out by the facts. Having seen it stated that the opinion of that influential body was unfavourable to the Treaty, and being connected with Leeds himself, he had thought it worth while to look into the matter, and he found that the Chamber of Commerce had signed a petition expressive of their hearty approval of the Treaty concluded by Her Majesty's Government; but they did express a fear that, if the duty levied in France on certain articles in which they were interested were raised to the uniform rate of 30 per cent, it would exercise a prohibitive tendency. But the general tone of the petition, as well as the speech of the able representative of that constituency, were strongly in favour of the Treaty concluded by Her Majesty's Government. The House had been told that France regarded us as a nation of shopkeepers, and the noble Earl (Earl Grey) said they ought to pause in the course which they were

justice on many occasions and with regard to many subjects, and the persons who once entertained them had on nearer acquaintance discovered their fallacy, so he thought it would be on the present occasion. At any rate they afforded, in his mind, no argument against the present proposals of the Government, and this country might very fairly disregard them. The noble Earl assumed that what was said in the despatch of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary as to the significance of the Treaty, referred to Italy and Savoy. But it was obvious that it referred to the effect on Europe of the indication of a peaceful disposition on the part of France and England. In reference to the article from the Journal des Debats which the noble Earl had read, he (Earl de Grey) was astonished to hear it suggested that the only object the Emperor of the French had in concluding the Treaty was to keep the Palmerston Ministry in office. The suggestion was more far-fetched even than usual, but attempts were always being made to attribute the conduct of the Emperor of the French, not to ordinary motives, but to some deep-laid policy. Surely it was easy to find plain, simple, common-sense reasons for the Emperor's conduct in regard to the Treaty without resorting to the ingenious speculations in which the noble Earl had indulged. A new market would be opened for a staple French product, and the French people would be admitted, to a limited degree certainly, to the benefits of the free trade. Peace would be promoted by the spread of commercial relations, and the Imperial revenue would be increased by the reduction of duties. All these were very satisfactory reasons why the Emperor should have negotiated the Treaty, without assuming that he was always pursuing a mysterious inscrutable policy. He denied altogether that the Treaty was a bargain in a financial sense. Neither nation sought any advantage over the other, and both nations profited greatly by the extended intercourse it would bring about between them. He could not understand the course proposed by the noble Earl (Earl Grey) who said that if the Address were rejected it need not prevent the Bills from passing. If the Treaty were as bad as the noble Earl described it—if, indeed, it were tinged with something like a forgetfulness of England's honour, then the simple rejection of the Address would not be sufficient—it would behove their Lordships to take a more vigorous course—

to pass a vote of censure on Her Majesty's Ministers and reject the Treaty altogether. But he hoped that the noble Earl would not succeed in inducing them to separate themselves from the career of commercial legislation in which they had so long been joint-labourers with the House of Commons, but that, on the contrary, by giving a cordial assent to the Motion, they would vindicate for themselves a share in contributing to bring about the benefits which the Treaty must confer on the cause of peace and civilization.

EARL STANHOPE said, that if he were inclined to find any fault with the speech by which the noble Lord had introduced this Motion to their Lordships, it would be only with the latter part, in which his noble Friend had seemed to intimate an opinion that those who might find fault with the policy of the Treaty were on that account insensible to the importance of maintaining a friendly understanding with France. He yielded to no man in the value which he placed on the maintenance of friendly relations with France, and his great objections to the Treaty proceeded from a doubt whether it really would have that effect. Nor did he express that doubt without strong testimony in that direction. He had received many letters from persons of great eminence in France—some, no doubt, unfavourable to the existing Government in that country, but others who had always been its supporters; and judging from these letters, there seemed to be a very general opinion at Paris that the first effect of this Treaty, at least, would be to produce in France a feeling of alienation in regard to England. Many classes considered themselves aggrieved by the removal of the prohibitory and protective duties; and, instead of blaming their own Government, there was an inclination to throw the blame on the English people and Government. For this reason he should have preferred to see these changes effected by the respective Governments without the intervention of a treaty at all. He thought it a matter of great regret that there should be on this account, as he understood that there was, a renewal of the old cries of "encroaching England," and "perfidious Albion." He had the highest authority for saying there was no necessity for the Treaty, because the Emperor in his Speech to the Legislative Assembly on the 1st of the present month, recommended it upon the ground that the French protective system must, under any circumstances, very soon come to an end. All the changes which were desired would then have been accomplished without any risk of alienation between the two nations, which he deprecated, but which he firmly believed the Treaty would excite. He thought it was a great misfortune that treaties of commerce should ever be concluded when the nations were not ripe for them, and he thought, moreover, that a long period of time must elapse before a change of opinions of this kind could be brought about. Of this fact our own History records an instance. When in May, 1713, immediately on the conclusion of the Peace of Utrecht, a treaty of commerce with France was laid before the House of Commons. There was very general dissatisfaction on that account in England. The Treaty was rejected by the House of Commons, and then, as we are told, there were bonfires and illuminations in consequence through the whole of London. But now, supposing a different course had been taken by that House of Commons; supposing that in spite of the popular dissatisfaction the Treaty had been still maintained, would not then, in all probability, the popular dissatisfaction have grown into an angry feeling with the neighbouring nation? Would it, then, have been possible, shortly afterwards, for those two wise statesmen, Sir Robert Walpole, in England, and Cardinal Fleury, to maintain, so much to the advantage of both countries, a peace of twenty years? But with regard to treaties of commerce generally, he confessed he thought that the period for them was past. He confessed he did not think that they ought to be entered into at the present day; and when his noble Friend who had just spoken said that this was not a treaty of a common kind, he confessed he did not see in what respect it was an extraordinary treaty, or how it was not a treaty of commerce like the rest. The noble Earl who spoke on that side of the House (the Earl of Malmesbury) said, he thought very justly, that a treaty of commerce was a kind of bargain. Why, it could not be otherwise. All treaties were of the nature of bargains; the Treaty of Villafranca was a bargain, by which the Austrians, having been defeated in several engagements, ceded a province as the price of peace. Then, judging from this point of view, he asked why, if the argument were good for a treaty of commerce with France, should it not also be good for attempting a treaty of commerce at the same time with other countries? He alluded particularly to Spain. They were about, not certainly by, but in consequence of, this Treaty, to make a large reduction of the duties on Spanish wines. He asked, then, if the principle were good as regarded these protective duties for France, why did they not apply to Spain, than which a better field for commercial reform could not be found, or one more important to the interests of this country? There was no country in which higher protective duties existed, or a more absolute system of protection than in Spain. Of this he would give the House only one instance. It is stated in MacGregor's Commercial Tables that the tariff of Spain enumerates seventy-seven articles under the head of manufacturers of wool and hair, and of these seventy-seven there are absolute prohibitions on the import of no less than sixty-three. He (Earl Stanhope) felt considerable objections to the treaty in regard to the coal duties upon export and in several other respects, but he would not enter upon these further points in detail, after the able and comprehensive speech of his noble Friend below the gangway (Earl Grey)—a speech which seemed to exhaust the whole question. There was, however, a point to which his noble Friend did not advert, upon which he wished to add an observation. The point was one which he remembered to have mentioned before to his noble Friend. It was with regard to the wording of the third Article of the Treaty in the English and French versions. The treaty seemed to him to signify one thing in the French and quite another thing in the English version. From the use of the words droits établis in the French version, it was plain that the Treaty was intended to protect duties then subsisting, and no others. But in the English version the word "established" did not occur at all; the expression was only "the differential duties in favour of French shipping." But this was not all. In the English version a further clause was added, "with which duties they shall not interfere;" and of this clause, would it be believed? there was not the smallest trace or vestige in the English. It really looked as if Mr. Cobden—if Mr. Cobden was the person who negotiated this Treaty—had never taken the trouble to compare together the

Earl Stanhope

French and the English versions. The result, as he (Earl Stanhope) apprehended, was, that if the Emperor Napoleon did desire at any future time to increase the scale of these differential duties, he was free to do so according to the English version, but not according to the French. If that opinion were correct, the two versions were susceptible of totally different meanings. He did entertain great doubts as to the policy of the Treaty, and whether it was really calculated to advance the friendly relations of the two countries; but though entertaining these doubts, and with every wish to do justice to the able speech of his noble Friend, he also felt very considerable doubts as to the propriety of the course his noble Friend was adopting. He had great doubts as to the propriety of dividing the House against the Address. His noble Friend advocated a division for the singular reason that it would have no effect upon the Treaty. Was it consistent with the dignity of the House to pass a vote which, even if carried, would avowedly have no effect upon the Treaty? He, therefore, ventured to appeal to his noble Friend. The question before the House was not whether, in the first instance, it was wise or politic to conclude this Treaty; the question before the House was whether, in the state to which this question had arrived, having passed the House of Commons by a large majority, and when, as he understood, a new scale of duties had already been established at the Customhouse, it was desirable to put the House into the disadvantageous position of refusing to assent to the Address, when no practical result could follow. To that vote he (Earl Stanhope) would therefore not be a party.

LORD OVERSTONE: * My Lords, I never rise to address your Lordships without great reluctance; but this feeling becomes peculiarly painful on the present occasion. I find myself called upon to discuss and criticise the terms of a Treaty which must, after all, become the basis of the inter-commercial relations of this country and France; and to place myself in opposition to a Government towards which I entertain the most friendly feelings, and the permanent success of which I believe, under present circumstances, to be associated with the best interests of the country.

My Lords, I cannot take the favourable view of the Treaty now before us which would justify me in supporting the present Address. The terms of the Treaty, in my judgment, afford ground for much criticism, and may give rise to some reasonable apprehension. I entertain great doubts of the expediency of having entered into any Commercial Treaty whatever. I thought that that description of commercial arrangements had been deliberately abandoned by this country, under a conviction, founded upon experience, that they are invariably fraught with embarrassment and danger; with embarrassment as regards our own internal affairs; and with danger in reference to our relations with the other contracting party. The true policy I believe to be this:—Let each country consult its own interests exclusively, under an enlightened view of what those interests really are. Let it repeal whatever Customs' duties it can properly part with, regulating its own tariff according to its fiscal necessities, and giving every practicable facility for the introduction of foreign commodities. Had we made the same reductions in our tariff without a Treaty which we have made under that now entered into, our imports of French products would have been as great as they will be under the new system; and they must have been paid for, directly or indirectly, by an equal increase of our exports. Whilst each country thus pursues its own interests steadily and wisely, it will soon be found that their mutual interests become coincident. Hence will arise a commercial intercourse beneficial to both countries, free from mutual jealousy, and forming a sure foundation for permanent good-will and friendly relations. Treaty obligations, on the other hand, I fear, will never be found to be the efficient means for tying the true lover's knot between great and jealous nations like England and France.

Such treaties must necessarily fetter our free discretion in the management of our own internal affairs and fiscal interests. It is not difficult to point to examples illustrating this principle in the present Treaty. Take, in the first place, the question, which has been already so pointedly alluded to in this discussion, of the suggested duty upon the export of coal. I cannot concur in the view upon this point of the noble Lord who opened the present debate (Lord Taunton). It is not necessary for my present argument to contend positively that we ought to impose a duty upon the export of that article. It is sufficient for me to say that the question is one of great importance, and that our power to exercise a free discretion, now or hereafter, upon that point ought not to have been surrendered. The danger of an absolute exhaustion of coal may be of a chimerical character. But it is not in reference to that consideration that the expediency of imposing a duty upon the export of it is to be maintained. Whenever any country has a peculiar advantage in the production of a commodity, either as regards the cost or the quality of the article, a duty upon the export of it, cautiously imposed, may be amongst the best possible sources of revenue. It is legitimate on the part of this country—indeed, under certain circumstances, it may become our duty—to take care that any fiscal advantages to be derived from our superior opportunities should be secured for our own Exchequer, and not be permitted to go to the advantage of foreign nations. If it be the fact that we have the means of supplying coal more abundantly, better in quality, or at a lower price than other nations, the benefit of that advantage may be secured to this country by the imposition of a moderate duty upon the export of it; whereas, in the absence of that duty, that benefit will pass to the foreign consumer. The Chinese, for instance, impose a limited duty upon the export of tea; and there can be no doubt that that duty is really paid by the foreign consumer; and were the Chinese to repeal that duty, the benefit would accrue not to them but to the various nations of the world which purchase their product. So again with respect to opium; the large amount of revenue raised by our Indian Government upon that article becomes a charge which is really paid by the foreign consumers of opium; and the abandonment of that duty would be a loss to the Indian Exchequer, and a benefit to the foreign consumer. This principle, no doubt, applies more strictly to the case of an absolute monopoly; but, nevertheless, clear superiority in the production of an article, as regards price or quality, partakes for this purpose more or less of the character of a monopoly.

As to this particular article, coal, we must further recollect that although the supply may be apparently without limit, still it is a quantity, however great, absolutely fixed in its amount. It is a mineral. There is no re-creative process to fall back upon, as in the case of agricultural or manufactured products; and at the same time, whilst the supply, however vast, is absolutely limited, the demand is annually increasing at a rate beyond all possible calculation. It is, moreover, an article which may be looked upon as the raw material of manufacturing competition; whilst it has unquestionably become a most important munition of war. I think, therefore, that the proposal to impose an export duty on coal is one entitled to the most serious consideration, and which ought not to have been precluded, as it is, by the provisions of the present Treaty.

I will now take the question upon broader and more comprehensive grounds; and I will beg your Lordships' attention to the question of Customs' duties generally. I doubt whether any valid objection can be urged to the imposition generally of a moderate Customs' duty upon all articles of import, excepting those two great classes of import, the raw materials of industry, and the primo articles of food. By this means a considerable revenue might be raised in a manner to which little serious objection could be made, and the pressure of which would be scarcely perceptible. Considering the heavy demands on the Exchequer of the country, and the large amount of revenue which it has now become essential even for our safety that we should raise, the propriety of levying a moderate tax on all articles of foreign import, with the exceptions I have already stated, becomes a grave and important question; one at all events the decision of which ought not to have been closed prospectively regardless of any emergency which may arise.

But, my Lords, if this Treaty be objectionable when we look to its effects upon our internal arrangements, it seems to me equally so if we proceed to consider the probable influence it may exert upon our external relations. The tendency of such Treaties must be to excite mutual suspicion and jealousy between the contracting parties, each country thinking that she had been overreached by the other. Hence danger may arise to our amicable relations from this cause more serious than the countervailing strength to those relations which we can venture to anticipate from increased commercial intercourse. This apprehension is not merely a matter of anticipation; the effect has already been produced. For example, in one of our more early discussions upon this subject, when it was urged that the present Treaty was one-sided and unfair as regards this country, the noble President of the

Lord Overstone

Council replied that similar objections were urged, with at least equal pertinacity, on the part of France; and in the same spirit the noble Lord, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, observed, "It is said in France that this Treaty is entirely a one-sided Treaty; that it makes France the slave of England." This, my Lords, is an illustration of the tone of international feeling, the jealousy and mutual irritation, which not unnaturally arise out of compacts of this nature.

But I may take a still stronger case. A very remarkable letter has recently appeared with the signature of a distinguished person, who has probably been the prime mover in this matter, M. Chevalier, who first endeavours to prove that France is entirely independent of England as regards the supply of coal, and that any duty upon the export of that article imposed by England would be an act on her part of purely suicidal folly; and he then proceeds, nevertheless, to declare that such is the feeling of the French people upon this question that they would regard any modification of the Article in the Treaty which has reference to the export of coal with great dissatisfaction; and that, were such a modification suggested or sanctioned even by the Emperor himself, it would still be received by the French people as an injustice and an affront on the part of this country.

I will now beg your Lordships' attention to the terms of the Treaty. I think they bear the marks of haste and want of sufficient care and deliberation. A negotiator on the part of France, knowing that he was about to treat with a country possessing coal, iron, and machinery, articles which constitute the raw material of manufacturing industry and warlike armament, important in the highest degree to his nation, would endeavour to obtain the removal of all obstructions to the export of those articles from England. He would at the same time know that the means which France possesses of paying for these and other articles of import consist in her brandy, wines, silks, and various lighter articles of taste, for which he would be anxious to secure greater facilities of export. These objects the French negotiator has fully and completely secured.

On the other hand, the negotiator on the part of England would naturally remember that he had many concessions to make that would be eminently beneficial to France; and that the one equivalent which it was desirable for him to secure was a more free and extended market for the manufactured products of his own country. All that has been obtained in this respect is the abandonment on the part of France of absolute prohibition, and the substitution of a protective duty which may for years to come be maintained at 30 per cent. I cannot look upon these terms as characterized by that degree of reciprocal fairness which we were entitled to look for in this Treaty, if it were entered into at all.

All credit to the negotiator of this Treaty for his former services. As an eloquent and successful agitator against a great national grievance, he deserved his country's gratitude and all the honour which he has received. But the very qualities which fitted him for that purpose,—that strenuous and uncompromising one-sidedness, which led him entirely to discard all qualifying considerations, and to fix his exclusive attention upon one great principle in agitating against a great grievance,—seem to me necessarily to disqualify him for the delicate discrimination and cautious estimate of conflicting claims requisite in a negotiator.

This Treaty, we are now told, does not partake of the character of a bargain. Whether this be so or not must, of course, depend upon the sense in which that term is used. In what light, however, was it viewed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself when he first submitted the Treaty to the consideration of Parliament? "They think there is a chivalry in free trade which is degraded if it becomes a matter of bargain; whereas, it appears to me, that bargain is the true end and aim of the whole. The only reason why we have not made bargains similar to the present in former years, was simply because we could not make them."

Let us now, my Lords, turn our attention for a few moments to the effects of this Treaty in a fiscal point of view. It has compelled us to give up much revenue that we could ill afford to part with; to surrender taxes that were singularly unexceptionable, and to impose other taxes as a substitute which are open to the most serious objections. We are about to repeal duties on French luxuries; brandy, wines, manufactured silks, gloves, clocks and watches, and articles of Parisian fancy and taste; whilst, instead of these, we maintain high duties on tea, sugar, and beer, the prime articles of consumption of the classes living upon wages.

This leads me to some points which have been alluded to this evening, but which have been brought into more prominent notice in discussions upon this subject out of doors. The principles of "free trade," "differential duties," "development of the policy of Sir Robert Peel;" those phrases have been paraded before the public like the dancing lights of a magic lantern. But let us endeavour for a moment to fix our attention upon them, and ascertain what they have of reality and sound reasoning. It is important that the country should clearly understand what is the true meaning of free trade. It means trade freed, not from those necessary duties which are raised only for purposes of revenue, but trade freed from all charges or duties which arise either from an ignorant jealousy of other countries, or from an equally foolish impression that it is our interest to foster unnatural productions in our own country, rather than to receive them from other countries whence, being produced under more favourable circumstances, they can be obtained in larger quantities, of better quality, and at a lower price. This I apprehend to be the true meaning of free trade. It was so understood and described in the celebrated petition of the merchants of London, presented to Parliament in the year 1820:—

"As long as the necessity for the present amount of revenue subsists, your petitioners cannot expect so important a branch of it as the Customs to be given up, or to be materially diminished, unless some substitute less objectionable be suggested; but it is against every restricted regulation of trade not essential to the revenue, against all duties merely protective from foreign competition, and against an excess of such duties as are partly for the purpose of revenue and partly for that of protection, that the prayer of the present petition is respectfully submitted to the wisdom of Parliament."

My Lords, are not the duties now proposed to be repealed, in the full sense of the words, "essential to the revenue?" And can we consider the substitute suggested, namely, a heavy income tax, as less objectionable? Every one of the duties proposed to be abolished in consequence of this Treaty might be retained without any violation of the principles of free trade.

But we are told that this Treaty is a development of the policy of Sir Robert Peel. If there be, indeed, any connection between the arrangements now under consideration and the policy of Sir Robert Peel as developed in his Commercial Tariff of 1842, it is, I submit, a connection of contrast and not one of imitation or development.

In the first place that statesman encumbered himself with no commercial treaties. He looked exclusively to the interest of his own country, and the necessities of her financial position; and repealing those duties which he felt could be surrendered consistently with the interests of England and for the safety of the British exchequer, he trusted to the success of that experiment and the force of the example gradually to exercise their legitimate influence over the policy and the measures of other Governments.

Sir Robert Peel entered upon his commercial reforms in consequence of the distressed state of the country. Commodities were passing out of consumption through the poverty of the people. The revenue returns indicated a lessened consumption of articles of popular comfort. Something was necessary to relieve the pressure which then weighed down the labouring classes, and to restore elasticity to the springs of industry. Is there any similarity to this state of things in the present condition of the country? Are we not in a state of unusual, indeed of unexampled prosperity? Has there ever been a time in our history when those who live by wages were in so prosperous a condition as at present? Is not the buoyancy of revenue, and its continuous improvement, year by year, the subject of universal remark and surprise? Can any one say that there is now any unnatural or alarming pressure upon the springs of industry? Has not our trade within a very moderate period increased threefold, from £45,000,000 of exports to about £13,000,000? And is there not every indication that this progressive increase is still in operation? In what, then, consists the similarity between the present period and that at which Sir Robert Peel entered upon his commercial reforms?

But, again, my Lords, upon what principle did Sir Robert Peel proceed? He proposed to remove two classes of duties; duties upon the raw materials of industry, and duties upon the prime articles of the food of the people. Are we proceeding in this course at present? Are we not taking off duties upon the lighter luxuries which are derived from France, and maintaining the duties upon articles of general consumption by the people? The object of Sir Robert Peel was to relieve the physical wants of the labouring classes, by cheapening the cost of provisions and clothing, and to raise their wages by giving increased facilities to manufacturing industry. The taxes which it is now proposed to reduce are not levied upon the necessities of life, nor upon the raw materials of manufacturing industry.

My Lords, there still remains one consideration; that which has been already alluded to with so much gravity and force by the noble Earl (Earl Grey), the connection between this Treaty and the general financial arrangements of the year. I speak not my own feelings and conviction alone, but those of many intelligent and reflecting persons, friends to the Government and to liberal principles, who entertain serious alarm at the effect which the financial arrangements of Government for the present year must, in their judgment, produce on the permanent financial condition of the country. We are about to surrender large sources of revenue which the country can ill spare, and which there is no necessity for sacrificing. We are contracting the area of indirect taxation, which is at once unwise and dangerous. We are proceeding to levy Customs' duties, heavy in amount, on a few articles; instead of lighter duties spread over a greater number of articles. And what are the articles upon which those heavy duties are to be levied? They are articles of prime necessity with the mass of the people. It is fortunate, indeed, that tea and sugar are not the natural products of France; otherwise, I presume the duties upon those articles must have been abandoned, and we must have parted with those important sources of revenue.

It has, indeed, been made a subject of boast in the course of this debate that we are accumulating our indirect taxation upon a few articles only. Let me entreat your Lordships to consider for a moment what is necessarily involved in this system. Why is so large a revenue raised from these few articles of taxation,—tea, sugar, coffee, tobacco? It is because these are articles of prime necessity with the great mass of the people, and therefore productive of a large revenue. Consequently, if we persist in the principle of raising a large revenue by Customs' duties upon a few articles, these must necessarily be the articles of general consumption with the people; on the other hand, if we repeal the duty upon all articles which yield but a limited amount of revenue, the repeal must fall, for the most part, upon those articles which are in reality consumed only by the Comparatively rich classes. To levy a large Customs' revenue upon a few articles, at the same time repealing Customs' duties upon all articles which yield only a small revenue, necessarily involves the principle of taxing the consumption of the people generally, and removing the taxes which press more peculiarly upon the richer classes. The luxuries derived from France are to go untaxed, whilst from tea, sugar, coffee, and tobacco (articles of almost absolute necessity to the mass of the people) a large and heavy amount of revenue is to be raised. Is this a safe system upon which to proceed? Or can we expect that the people at large will tolerate such a system of Customs' revenue?

Let us now take another view of this question. It is surely the duty of statesmen to recognize future responsibilities, and to satisfy Parliament and the country that the measures which they proposed are not only sufficient for the emergencies of the moment, but that they tend to place our financial system upon a permanently sound and safe foundation. I must say that I share with the noble Earl (Earl Grey) the apprehensions which he has expressed with regard to the fiscal condition of the country at the end of another year. We are now abolishing duties which can never be replaced; and for those we are substituting a tax which is imposed only for a single year. What will be the balance against us at the beginning of another year? It is difficult, no doubt, to form a correct estimate upon that point, so complicated are the financial arrangements for the present year. But I believe that the probable deficit has been understated by the noble Earl, and that it will be, according to all reasonable probability, incumbent upon the Government to propose for the next year a very heavy income tax. My Lords, a reduction of estimates is a pleasing dream, the realization of which, I fear, no reasonable person will venture to anticipate with confidence. Is there anything in the political prospects of the country to justify it? Consider the expenses of the Chinese war, very insufficiently provided for in the present Budget. Consider the fortification of our dockyards and coasts, for which no provision has been made. Consider the expense which must be incurred in the improved armament of our military and naval forces; in gunnery and in musketry. Consider the expense which must necessarily attend the establishment of an efficient naval reserve.

Consider the large amount brought to the credit of the present year's account from sources which are not really revenue, and which will therefore disappear in the account of the ensuing year. Looking to all these considerations, it can hardly be doubted that the sources of revenue which we are now voluntarily abandoning must be supplied by the permanent imposition of a very heavy income tax.

But, my Lords, how many delicate, difficult, and dangerous questions beset the assessment of an income tax? And what financial provision do we reserve for the emergencies of war, if, during a period of peace, we press thus heavily on our great resource, the income tax? To meet the necessities of the last year, we imposed temporarily a heavy income tax; and we proceeded to collect the whole of that tax upon the last half of the year. By this step, an injustice, perhaps the greatest and most palpable that has ever been perpetrated in any financial arrangement, was inflicted upon one class of persons. At that time, one final payment of the Long Annuities remained to be made. That payment was in reality a repayment of capital, and not of income. Nevertheless, on that payment the Government levied a whole year's income tax. That was a special case of unquestionable hardship and injustice. It was, however, accidental; it could not recur, and therefore it was acquiesced in without murmur. But the repetition of similar cases of injustice, which must arise under an income tax liable to annual variations of amount, will not be borne. These questions, as regards terminable annuities and precarious annuities, the profits of professions and of trade, salaries, &c., will rise up in endless variety. I have been told, and I believe upon good authority, that when Sir Robert Peel first proposed the income tax, he sat up night after night consulting with mathematicians, actuaries, and financial authorities, to ascertain whether any modification of the tax could be safely made with regard to the different classes of incomes. He found, however, that it was impossible to do anything of the kind; that every provision by which it was attempted to meet one difficulty would create a greater difficulty in its stead; and he, therefore, came to the conclusion that it was necessary to impose the same rate of tax upon all descriptions of income. I believe to that conclusion every inquiry upon the subject must inevitably lead.

There is but one mode by which the income tax can be made to approach to equality or justice; that is, by making the tax permanent and invariable in amount; so that the character of the tax will assimilate itself to the character of each varying income. In this form, a moderate income tax may become a steady and fixed element in the financial system of the country, susceptible of sudden increase only in the emergency of war.

There remains another question with regard to the income tax of very serious import, namely, the question of a graduated income tax. In the accounts which have recently reached this country from India, it appears that the Government there are about to impose an income tax of two per cent on incomes up to a certain amount, and of four per cent upon all incomes above that amount. Is this one of those cases in which coming events cast their shadows before? Is there now rising in the East the ill-omened star which is destined shortly to shed its disastrous influence over the financial system of this country? A graduated income tax is one of the plausible and dangerous forms under which the principle of confiscation makes its first insidious approaches.

My Lords, I feel that I have too long trespassed upon your attention. For what purpose, let me beg the House to consider, is it found necessary to bring forward these large Estimates? And for what purpose is it that the country so cheerfully bears the heavy weight of taxation? It is for the greatest of all considerations,—the national security. But for this end there are three great requisites; first, the tone and temper of the people, the feeling of loyal attachment to their Sovereign, and a readiness to devote their property and their lives to the defence of our institutions. In this respect the country is sound; and could any doubt have been entertained upon this point, recent events have given us a most assuring demonstration. Second, the complete and efficient condition of all our defensive armaments. To this state I believe we are surely and rapidly advancing. But beyond this there is a third requisite, a sound and solid condition of our financial system. How much of national weakness, how much loss of moral influence throughout Europe, must arise from any impression that the finances of this country are in any respect in an unsettled or doubtful condition? It is, my Lords, because I fear that the Commercial Treaty, in connection with the financial arrangements which have arisen out of it, have shaken the solidity of our financial system, that I am compelled to withhold my assent from the present Address.

At the same time I feel myself placed in a painful embarrassment. The Treaty before us must now come into operation, and by its provisions the commercial relations of France and England must henceforth be regulated. It has been concluded by the Governments of the two countries; it has obtained the sanction of the other House of Parliament; it has been adopted by the country. Is it then wise, it may be asked, or consistent with our best interests, to disparage the terms of the bargain into which we are about to enter, and by which we must henceforth be bound? I have felt the force of these considerations, and I would gladly have evaded the duty which I am now endeavouring to discharge. But, though I cannot give my concurrence to this Address, I may nevertheless offer my hearty good wishes for the success of the Treaty. Most sincerely and unreservedly do I hope that the apprehensions which have been expressed upon this subject may prove to be unfounded; most earnestly do I hope that all the good results anticipated by the friends of this measure may be fully realized; that it may be the means of substituting the virtuous relations of commerce for the discreditable feelings of international jealousy; that it may extend friendly intercourse between the two great nations by whom it has been contracted, that it may widen the field of industry, and thus augment the comforts and extend the prosperity of our own country.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he was not inclined to complain that the scope of this debate had extended far beyond the immediate subject of their deliberations, and that it had embraced the whole financial scheme of the Government, because there might be Members of the House who were willing to approve the Treaty, but who retained in their minds certain objections with regard to other portions of the financial scheme; and he was willing to admit that this was an occasion when they had a right to enter into a discussion of the whole question. He therefore accepted the grounds of discussion raised by his noble Friend who had just sat down, and by his noble Friend who first addressed their Lordships in opposition to the Treaty, and would endeavour to give some answer to the main arguments which they had used. In the first place, he complained of his noble Friend who had just spoken, that while he had been charging carelessness against the Government and Mr. Cobden in the framing of this Treaty, he himself proved that he had never read the Treaty with even tolerable care. The noble Lord said he would give an instance—a crucial instance, as he called it—of the carelessness of Mr. Cobden—and that was in respect to the article of rags. It was evident the noble Lord spoke under the delusion that the abolition of the paper duty was part of the Treaty with France. But it was no such thing. The only stipulation in the Treaty having any reference to paper, was that the duty on French paper-hangings should not exceed the amount of excise duty leviable in this country. Mr. Cobden, when he negotiated this Treaty, was not even aware of the intention of the Government to propose to repeal the duty on paper. The repeal of the Excise duty on paper was a separate transaction, and even if Mr. Cobden had been aware of it he could not know whether it would receive the sanction of Parliament. This crucial instance of carelessness on the part of Mr. Cobden and the Government therefore fell to the ground. Another noble Lord had quoted as an instance of carelessness the article on shipping. But though he admitted that there seemed to be some diversity of language between the French and English versions of the third clause in the Treaty, they were in spirit identical, and he maintained that the interests of British shipping were amply protected in the clause. He gathered from the speech of his noble Friend that there was some misunderstanding as to the real facts of the case with respect to the effect of the changes that were made by the Treaty and the other fiscal arrangements connected with it. The noble Lords, in criticising the financial arrangements of the Government, spoke of the Government increasing unnecessarily, by their remissions of duty, the existing deficiency, and thereby necessitating an increase of the income tax. Now, that was not a correct statement of the facts of the case. The whole amount of remissions that was effected by the Government scheme was not greater than the amount of remissions which would arise under the operation of the existing law. The deficiency arose first from the total lapse of the income tax, and next from the lapse of the tea and sugar duties. By a mistake in the wording of the Act the tea and sugar duties were to lapse altogether this year. The intention of Parliament was, that what was called the war tax on tea and sugar only should fall; but, by a mistake in the wording of the Act, the whole of the duties fell. In estimating the deficiency of the year, Mr. Gladstone assumed that Parliament, as a matter of course, would rectify this error; but he did not assume that Parliament would maintain the higher scale of duty which it was intended should cease with the present year. £2,100,000, the produce of the war tea and sugar duties, was therefore included in the deficiency of £9,400,000, to which his noble Friend referred. The Government had not increased that deficiency in any way. But instead of making remissions on tea and sugar they made them on a series of other articles, which would give to the country an additional advantage by opening the trade with France. He had carefully listened to the speeches of the two noble Lords (Lords Grey and Overstone) with a view to discover what sort of Budget they themselves would have been disposed to recommend. It must have been one avoiding the evils which they had pointed out as arising out of the plan of the Government. And what were they? First, there would have been no sacrifice of revenue—which means no remissions of taxation. What a position the Government would have been in if they had followed this advice! The first step they would have had to take would have been to bring in a Bill to maintain the war duties on tea and sugar; secondly, they would have had them continue the income tax at 9d. at least; they would have had them announce to Parliament that they had absorbed in their expenditure of the year all the advantages arising from the falling in of the Long Annuities; that they had postponed all obligations of payment of debt; and, lastly, that they proposed to give no relief whatever to trade or industry. Those were the steps which must have been taken by the Government to avoid the evils of which his two noble Friends complained. But he ventured to say that the Government would not have been able to pass such a Budget through Parliament. The income tax was already complained of as being too high. It had been the experience of every Government that unless they continued to connect the income tax with remissions in favour of trade and industry they could not succeed in continuing it for any lengthened period without danger. Again, his noble Friends complained that the Budget of the Government had rendered necessary a considerable increase of the income tax. He (the Duke of Argyll) ventured to say that the general cause of that increase was not to be found in the remissions the Government were making, but in the large amount of military and naval Estimates which they had been compelled to sustain. The House would recollect that during the Russian war the income tax stood at 16*d.*, and after its conclusion there was a considerable portion of the year in which the war income tax continued. At the opening of the Session of 1857 the whole pressure of the Opposition, and of many others not in the Opposition, was to induce the Government to reduce their Estimates, and to take off what was called the war 9*d.* The Government conceded that point; but it was further contended, with great ability, by Mr. Disraeli and others, that even after the war 9*d.* had been abandoned the Estimates were still much too high, and that a large deficit was in prospect for the ensuing year. It so happened that Mr. Disraeli became Chancellor of the Exchequer before the period when that said deficit was to arise; and what was the course which the Government of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) took in that state of things? Why that Government adopted the naval and military Estimates of Lord Palmerston's Government, with some little alteration. But in the course of that year the Government of the noble Earl found it necessary to raise very considerably the naval and military Estimates; but before making that discovery they had announced that they would allow a further drop in the income tax from 7*d.* to 5*d.*, which, of course entailed a further loss of revenue. In the meantime, towards the end of the year, they took energetic steps to raise the navy to what they considered a proper level; but before they came to provide the taxes necessary for the expenditure they had incurred they had gone out of office; and the consequence was that when Mr. Gladstone came into office he found the naval and military Estimates so very large that he was obliged, looking to the means at his disposal, to bring back the income tax to 9*d.*, and to raise the whole of it in half-a-year. That was the necessity imposed—

The Duke of Argyll

he did not say wrongly imposed—upon the present Government by the policy of their predecessors. It was idle to say, then, that the high income tax was due to the remissions now proposed by the Government. He would state how the naval and military Estimates had stood since 1857. In 1857-58 the army and navy Estimates amounted to £20,699,000. The income tax was then lowered to 7*d.*, but with half year of the war 9*d.* still to be collected. In 1858-59 the army and navy Estimates had risen to £21,610,000; in 1859-60 they were increased to £26,082,000, and in the present year they had risen to the enormous sum of £29,700,000. He (the Duke of Argyll) contended that in the face of those enormous Estimates it was impossible for the Government to avoid a large income tax. His noble Friend (Lord Overstone) next complained that the measures of the Government tended to alter, in a very dangerous degree, the relative proportions between direct and indirect taxation; but, unless his noble Friend could show that there were essential differences of principle between the remissions of taxation now proposed and those formerly proposed by Sir Robert Peel and by several succeeding Governments, he would fail to prove that the remissions now contemplated could materially alter the proportions between taxation direct and indirect. The produce of the indirect taxation of this country, since 1842, had been increased by no less a sum than nearly £8,000,000, by a process which he (the Duke of Argyll) maintained was identical in principle with that which the Government now proposed to adopt. There had been remissions in the Customs' duties alone to the amount of nearly £11,000,000. But the policy had been one not of remissions only, for there had been additions in the Excise. His noble Friend had adverted to the different circumstances under which Sir Robert Peel, on the one hand, and the present Government on the other, had propounded their financial schemes, and argued that Sir Robert Peel's remissions were only proposed in periods when relief was required by national distress. But although in 1842, when Sir Robert Peel commenced his commercial reforms, there was a considerable deficit, yet in 1845, when Sir Robert carried his measures to an extent almost identical with that proposed by the present Government, there was no public distress. Sir Robert did so from a conviction that his measures would not only promote industry, but would also benefit the revenue. And Sir Robert Peel was right, for in 1845 he did not confine himself to reductions, but proceeded also to abolition of duties upon a very large scale, and yet the revenue recovered itself. His noble Friend (Lord Overstone) had said that the abolition of duties now proposed was not such as Sir Robert Peel would have proposed; but he (the Duke of Argyll) ventured respectfully to dissent from that opinion. A very large number of articles, the duties upon which were abolished by Sir Robert Peel, were strictly analogous to those which were now to be dealt with. Many other articles entering into the consumption of the people, such as butter, he did not deal with, because he had enough on his hands for the moment, but he left them to be considered at a future period. The noble Lord had dwelt with much force on one charge against the Treaty which applied to all treaties; that it fettered our action for the future, but that evil was reduced to a minimum, when care was taken that we should not prevent ourselves from doing anything which there was any probability of our doing, and not to promise to do anything that would be injurious to our interests. The question, therefore, came back to this — whether the remissions and abolition of duties proposed were of themselves evil, or whether they were not only innocent, but beneficial alike to England and to France. When his noble Friend argued in favour of an export duty on coal he propounded an opinion which no English Minister would venture to act upon. The plan of an export duty had been tried by Sir Robert Peel, and had failed, for it was found that the duty, although moderate in amount, was almost unproductive, and seriously interfered with the coal trade. By the Treaty we had not undertaken to abstain from doing anything which it was morally possible we should ever think of doing, and as to the Article respecting coal, although objections had naturally arisen at first, he ventured to hope the House would now regard the Article as one which showed a sincere expectation on the part of the French Government of a long continuance of peaceful intercourse between the two countries. Coal was used far more for commercial than for warlike purposes; for, although France might be out of coal for commercial use, yet we might be sure she would always obtain enough for her naval purposes. When the manufacturers of France found that the Emperor was about to expose them to competition with England they naturally asked him to secure for them, as far as he could, a supply of English coal. The reply of the English Government, no doubt, was that there was no intention of reviving an export duty which had already failed; but the French manufacturers required a guarantee that they might not at some future time be suddenly deprived of a supply of coal; and thereupon the English Government said it was willing to promise not to do that which it had already tried and abandoned. He contended, therefore, that this stipulation, perhaps more than any other in the Treaty, indicated a belief on the part of the manufacturers of France in a long peaceful intercourse to the mutual benefit of themselves and of us. Coming to the question of the wine duties, he would observe that some persons spoke of wine as a luxury. It was true that former reductions of wine duties had been ineffectual to increase largely the consumption; but that arose from the fact that the reduction had never been carried low enough to reach an entirely new class of consumers. If the duties were reduced to an extent that would bring wine within the reach of the better classes of artisans and the lower middle classes, he thought there would be a great prospect of the revenue sustaining no loss, and of a great boon being conferred upon the people, both in point of comfort and of health. He was informed by one of the largest employers of labour in Manchester that the working classes exhibited a strong desire to have the best articles of consumption — the whitest bread and the whitest sugar — and, in fact, to have the same articles of food as were enjoyed by the richer classes. The Treaty was objected to as a bad bargain. He (the Duke of Argyll) heard that charge with pleasure, for it meant that France, whatever benefit we might derive from it, would certainly derive great benefit. But what did that imply? It meant that France would send us a considerable amount of imports; and if so, whether or not we sent them a corresponding amount of our goods, the intercourse must be beneficial to both countries. It was possible that France might send us more goods than we should send them in return; but that would be a gain to England, and not a loss. The noble Lord seemed to hold to the old exploded error in respect to the balance of trade. After all, who were the best judges of the character of the bargain? Had Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Sheffield, or any other manufacturing town objected to the Treaty? No! such a pressure had been brought to bear by the constituencies on their representatives in Parliament that this measure had not been carried by any mere party strength of the Government, but by a very large adhesion from those who were ordinarily their political enemies. It was no party victory, but the noblest triumph which could attend the measures of a Government. He would not conceal that Ministers had entered Parliament at the commencement of the present Session with the prospect of no very great Parliamentary strength; They were obliged to depend, not on party organization, but on the character of the measures which they might produce. And so powerful had been the effect of those measures on the public mind, so rapidly had they gained acceptance in all the great centres of our commercial industry, that the Treaty, and every portion of the financial scheme, so far as it had yet been considered, had been carried by majorities unprecedented in our recent Parliamentary annals. Great as was the importance which he attached to the opinion of his noble Friend, he preferred in this instance to rely on the opinion which had been so unmistakeably expressed on an appeal to the verdict of the country as to whether Her Majesty's Government had, or had not, made a good bargain for the people of England. Whatever difference of opinion might exist in regard to the financial scheme of the Government, he hoped the House would not be persuaded to divide against the adoption of an Address which he could assure their Lordships there had been every anxiety to word so that it might not commit the opinion of any Member of that House, in an unnecessary degree, to the measures of Government, or even to the character of this Treaty. The first sentence expressed the desire of the House "to approach Her Majesty with sincere and grateful acknowledgments for this new proof of Her Majesty's desire to promote the welfare and happiness of her subjects;" and in the second paragraph the House intimated that they would "proceed to take such steps as might be necessary to give effect to a system which they trusted would promote the beneficial intercourse between Great Britain and France." His noble Friend (Earl Grey) seemed certainly to have adopted the most extraordinary line of argument. He said he did not want to defeat or interfere with the Treaty; he was perfectly willing to take the steps requisite to give effect to it, but he would not express his hope that those steps might be successful. Other noble Lords, however, would not, he hoped, give to the Address a grudging or a reluctant assent. He was not willing to speak with bated breath, either there or elsewhere, of the financial policy of the Government, which he believed to be sound in principle. It proceeded not on matter of experiment, but on the result of actual experience. Measures precisely similar to those which they were now recommending had contributed in past years to the comfort and contentment of the people, to the simplicity and productiveness of the financial system, to the creation of new rewards in every branch of industry; and by adding to the wealth of England, they had likewise increased her military power. Ministers, therefore, were prepared to recommend those measures to the adoption of the House, although they did not at present ask for the expression of an opinion upon them; and when the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) came to speak, though he would probably find many faults with the measure, and pass, perhaps, a severe censure on the conduct of the Government, he trusted that, so far as his influence and vote were concerned, the Address would receive the unanimous sanction of their Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, at this late hour of the evening I am very reluctant to trespass on your Lordships by any lengthened observations, more especially as I feel that the ground has been to a great extent occupied, and the subject entirely exhausted by the able and eloquent speech of the noble Earl who first opened the opposition to this Address, Earl Grey, and by the equally impressive speech from the noble Earl, whose great experience on subjects of this kind, more especially when speaking in opposition to a Government which he generally supports, deserves the most serious consideration on the part of this House. At the same time there are certain points which, it appears to me, have not been made very clear in the course of this debate, and some observations have fallen from the noble Duke who has just sat down which it would be impossible for me to pass over in absolute silence. I do not grudge the noble Duke the little song of triumph in which he indulged when speaking of the large majorities that have supported Her Majesty's Government on questions connected with this Treaty, and which have especially signalized the present question; nor will I trouble myself to inquire to what cause these large majorities are to be ascribed—whether to a general concurrence in the financial policy of Her Majesty's Government, or to the general confidence reposed in the united counsels of Her Majesty's Ministers, or whether or not they are attributable in some degree to the skill and ability with which the various baits have been thrown out to the various specific interests through which those interests find themselves specially benefited by the provisions of a Treaty; and who, for the sake of obtaining advantages for themselves, are inclined to look with a somewhat indulgent eye on the remaining details of the Treaty. It is rather a singular thing that at this moment, when we are approaching the termination of the debate, it does not appear clear to the House what is the precise subject on which your Lordships' opinion is required. One thing, I think, the noble Duke will acknowledge—that whatever may be the political opinions of noble Lords on one side of the House or the other, there has been nothing, in the course or conduct of this debate, to indicate party policy or a party question. For I will recall your Lordships' attention, in the first place, to the state of the benches on this side of the House; and next—without in any way intending to reflect on my noble Friends behind me—to the fact that the most powerful and most eloquent arguments against the measure have proceeded not from political opponents but from political supporters of the Government. I said it was doubtful upon what point we are going to pass a vote this evening. We are not about to pass a vote on the financial policy of the Government; we are not about to pass a vote on the general expediency or merits of extending our commercial intercourse with France; and we are not even about to pass a vote on the expediency or in expediency, at this moment or in this manner, of extending our commercial relations with France; but we are asked whether we will take a course—undoubtedly an unusual one—whether we will, by this Address to Her Majesty which has been placed before us, volunteer to signify to Her Majesty our approval of the Treaty, which we are at the same time to pass over with silent acquiescence. If what we are now asked to do does not—as the noble Duke has told us it does not—in the slightest degree bind us to approval or assent to the financial policy of Her Majesty's Government, what is the object of asking your Lordships to assent to it? I had thought that the ground on which the Government rested the necessity of an Address to the Crown was that particular stipulation in the Treaty which requires that the assent of Parliament shall be specifically given to enable Her Majesty to carry into effect the engagements she has contracted. I was prepared to argue that point; and I did understand that it was in consequence of the existence of that Article in the Treaty that Her Majesty's Government departed in this case from the usual course of not laying the Treaty on the table of the House for the consideration, judgment, or condemnation, if necessary, or for the tacit acquiescence of this, and of the other House of Parliament; that they felt there was something peculiar in the circumstances of the Treaty that rendered a specific acquiescence and not a tacit one required. But the noble Duke says that we have nothing to do with the Treaty—that this Address has nothing to do with the Treaty—that it does not call for our assent or our approval—that the Address is so carefully worded that it does not approve of the Treaty. Then why not be satisfied with communicating the Treaty, if the terms do not require the assent of Parliament? And if that is so, the inviting discussion on it is waste of time:—though I must say, that looking at the discussion that has taken place the time of your Lordships has been anything but wasted. I wish, however, to know precisely how the matter stands with regard to the Parliamentary assent to be given to this Treaty. The noble Earl who first moved the rejection of the Address had referred with great confidence to the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, and was confident of receiving an answer from him, that in point of fact this Address, whether rejected or assented to, made not the slightest difference whatever with regard to the ratification or validity of the Treaty. I waited with patience; but I have yet heard no answer from the noble and learned Lord; but I still hope I shall hear one before the debate concludes. If the noble and learned Lord is prepared to say that the rejection of the Address would be the rejection of the Treaty, then I think noble Lords may well pause to consider whether they will incur this consequence, notwithstanding their objections to the Treaty; but if, on the other hand, the noble and learned Lord is prepared to argue that so far as the Treaty is concerned, the Address is waste paper, then all the objections to the Address fall to the ground, and the objections lie against those who unnecessarily and gratuitously provoke and demand discussion on the question. I speak with all diffidence in the presence of the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack on this subject; but having given my best attention to the terms of the Treaty as connected with the Address, it appears to me that this Address is, in any point of view in which we consider it, absolutely and utterly useless. It is mainly a question what is the meaning of the provision of the 20th Article, by which it is stipulated that the Treaty shall be of no validity, unless Her Majesty is empowered, with the assent of Parliament, to give effect to the engagements contracted under the Treaty. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey) argued—and I believe quite correctly—that with regard to the Articles that touched the commercial question in this Treaty, the assent of Parliament would be sufficiently and adequately given by the concurrence of the two Houses on those legislative measures, which, originating in Resolutions of the Committee on Customs, will be then embodied in Bills carrying out the financial arrangements of the Treaty. If so, clearly with regard to these articles, this Address is wholly unnecessary. But there is another Article in the Treaty, to which I wish to draw your Lordship's attention, and particularly the attention of the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, the terms of which cannot be said to be satisfied by the sanction of Parliament, conveyed by an Address of this kind. I refer to the 11th Article, by which Her Majesty binds herself, for the space of ten years, not to prohibit nor to place any duty on the export of coal. That particular Article in the Treaty is not in the slightest degree touched on by any Resolution or Bill that can be carried in the Commons and sent up here, in consequence of the recommendation of the Committee on Customs. If the assent of Parliament is to be given, in any form, to that Article, it cannot be given by the merely commercial Bills touching the commercial part of the question. I think it is equally clear that the assent of Parliament cannot be given to it by an Address of the two Houses of Parliament, and the subsequent answer of the Crown. For how does the Crown possess this power, which it is advised to dispense with, or for a time abolish altogether? It is not a part of the prerogative of the Crown; but it is a power conferred on the Sovereign for the highest interests of the country by an Act of Parliament. The Crown is empowered, and consequently it is the duty of the Crown, under certain supposable circumstances, for the advantage and security of the country, to prohibit the exportation of a certain article, the export of which may be dangerous to the interests of the country. That authority is given to the Crown by Act of Parliament; and without the sanction of another Act of Parliament, I say the Crown cannot constitutionally dispossess itself of that authority which has been vested in its hands by Parliament for the good of the nation;—the Crown cannot will away to another Power that which has been entrusted to it for the defence and security of the country. Without, then, a word on the policy of the Treaty, without a word on the policy of prohibiting the export of coals—still further, without going into the question whether coal is a legitimate source of taxation—and still more, without the least idea of entering upon the vexed question as to the probable duration of the supply of coal, upon which, as we have heard from the noble Lord who seconded the Motion (the Earl of Cork), we have an abundant supply for the next 5000 years—and upon which I received this morning a paper from another source, satisfactorily proving that the supply of coal could not last 250 years, and between whom I am not prepared to give a decision at this moment—without arguing whether the export of coals at all be or be not desirable, or whether coals can be a legitimate source of revenue or not—I say it is not in the power of the Crown, in my humble judgment, without the sanction of an Act of Parliament to give away that power. In my humble judgment, it is only by an Act of Parliament that the Crown can dispossess itself of the power which Parliament has placed in its hands. With regard to the commercial articles of the Treaty, the Bills founded on Resolutions of Committees on the Customs' Acts, are sufficient assent; but, with regard to them and to this 11th Article, this Address can have no effect either one way or the other. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey) and the noble Baron who followed him on the same side (Lord Overstone) entered—as the noble Duke allowed they had a right to enter—into the circumstances of the Budget and the financial position of the country, as bearing upon the policy of the Treaty—because, be it observed that, independently altogether of the merits of the Treaty, and supposing that the arrangements with France were of the most beneficial character, there remains the further question—are the finances of the country in a position, is this the moment, and are these the circumstances under which it is wise, politic, or safe to give effect even to an ultimately beneficial arrangement with France? The case of the Budget has been put before you pretty clearly; and I thought there could be no difference of opinion with regard to the financial position of the country, calmly explained as it has been. But, to my astonishment, I find the noble Duke who has just sat down, has thrown a new light on the subject; he says that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not, in the slightest degree, increased the deficit he found on entering office. I listened with great attention to the noble Duke, and I am at a loss to know by what process of argument, by what train of thought, he has brought his mind to a conclusion absolutely contradicted by the facts of the case. He says—and I do not contradict him, though I was not exactly aware of it before he mentioned it—that by a clause in a former Act it was not the war duties merely on tea and sugar that fell to the ground, but the whole of the duties. That may be so, but it does not affect the argument at all; because the right hon. Gentleman's assumption of a deficit of £9,400,000 was not based on the supposition that the tea and sugar duties fell in altogether, but that the war duties merely fell in. His balance was the result of a comparison of the expenditure and income of the ensuing year; he took credit for the ordinary revenue on tea and sugar, and only supposed that the war duties fell in. I do not intend to trouble your Lordships with long statistics, for I have not them here. I speak merely from recollection; and here the noble Duke has the advantage of me. If I recollect aright, the Chancellor of the Exchequer calculated the probable income of the year at £60,700,000, and the probable expenditure at £70,100,000, leaving, of course, a deficit of £9,400,000. Now, my Lords, I should be much gratified and no less surprised, to find that the right hon. Gentleman's calculations with regard to his deficit are correct. In the first place, I am afraid he takes credit for an amount of revenue which, I think, will hardly be realized; and, on the other hand, I feel confident that he has much understated the expenditure which is absolutely necessary for the service of the ensuing year. Without going so far as to calculate the expense of the Chinese expedition at £5,000,000, it must be obvious that for an expedition undertaken on such a scale a provision of £500,000 is ludicrously insufficient; and yet, if the expenditure for that service exceeds that sum—if it only exceed it by £450,000—the whole apparent balance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer disappears. But yet the noble Duke says, having found a deficit, the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not increase it. And what does the Chancellor of the Exchequer proceed to do? The first thing he does is to sacrifice £1,100,000 wine duty under the Treaty with France, in which he assumes that the loss to the revenue—or what he calls the gain to the consumer, but of which I believe the consumer will obtain but a portion—what he calls the gain to the consumer by lessening the prices he estimates at £1,700,000; but in consequence of an increase in the consumption of wine to the amount of 35 per cent, which, he says, will follow the reduction of the duties, he calculates a net loss to the revenue of £1,100,000, I should certainly have thought that £1,100,000 some addition to the deficit. Moreover, unless the Chancellor of the Exchequer's expectations be realized, and, without diminishing the consumption of ale and spirits, the increase of the consumption of wines be 35 per cent, the Chancellor of the Exchequer underrates the deficiency he will have to make good. Next, he volunteers to take off £910,000 in other Customs' duties on articles which, individually, are of no great importance, but some of which contribute a respectable sum to the revenue. Then he takes off the paper duty, which he estimates at £1,000,000; and let me observe in passing, that although he estimates in the present year a loss of £1,000,000, he estimates upon next year a loss of £1,230,000. There will thus be in the revenue of next year an increase of deficit to the amount of £230,000. To the deficit which the Chancellor of the Exchequer found of £9,400,000, he adds a new deficit of £3,100,000, and in the face of that fact the noble Duke tells us that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made no addition to the deficit which he found. What is the course the Chancellor of the Exchequer takes to supply the deficit thus increased from £9,400,000 to £12,500,000? This £12,500,000 has to be made good by the Chancellor of the Exchequer next year. In what manner does he propose to deal with it? In the first place the Chancellor of the Exchequer reimposes the whole war duties on tea and sugar, and reckons on obtaining £2,100,000 from that source. He next takes an increased income tax, of which he proposes to receive this year three-quarters instead of one-half, at the unprecedented amount of 10*d.* in the pound. That amounts, according to the estimate of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to £8,400,000. This still leaves a considerable deficit; and after taking several thousand pounds of small additions in the shape of operations in commerce, penny stamps, and so on, he obtains a sum of money sufficient to meet his little chasm of £900,000. Still there was a considerable deficit. And how does he meet that? By taking in the present year the £1,400,000 of malt and hop credits belonging to next year; and, so by the various devices I have enumerated he supplies both the deficit which he found and the deficit which he creates. My noble Friend says there is a casual resource in the course of the present year; but that was included in the estimated revenue which left the deficit of £9,400,000—a receipt, I mean, which he obtained through the interference of my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Malmesbury) with the Spanish Government. Now, this cannot be calculated upon for the next year; and, therefore, for the service of the next year we should be left in this position—supposing all the Chancellor of the Exchequer's calculations to be fair and reasonable, suppose all to be borne out by the result, instead of having a surplus of £470,000, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's own story, we should, at the expiration of the next financial year, have a deficit of certainly not less than £11,000,000. Now, I ask Her Majesty's Government whether they have carried their thoughts so far forward—

whether they have calculated in any way the means of meeting that vast deficit otherwise than by an increased income tax, rendered necessary by the course of policy they are now pursuing? The noble Duke and the noble Lord on the other side of the House have submitted that their policy is in accordance with that pursued by Sir Robert Peel in 1842 and 1845. I beg to dissent from that proposition. Although it is quite true that they are at the present moment taking off indirect taxes, and Sir Robert Peel also took off indirect taxes; that is the only circumstance of resemblance between them. The circumstances of the country, the views of the Government, the object for which the taxes are taken off, are as different as light from darkness. Sir Robert Peel reduced and abolished taxes; but he did so in the confident expectation that the relief so given would directly or indirectly give an increased revenue by a larger consumption of the articles on which a lower duty was made payable. But the noble Duke expressed his extreme astonishment that we could not imagine—that we could not conceive—they were pursuing the course of Sir Robert Peel, in the teeth of the fact that Sir Robert Peel lowered the duties on 400 articles of Customs, and the present Government are lowering the duties on 400 articles of consumption, and that Sir Robert Peel imposed a temporary income tax, and they impose an income tax. How, he says, can we see a difference between the course Sir Robert Peel pursued, and the course of policy they pursue? How can we argue, he says, that the course they are now taking will have any effect upon the permanent relations between the direct and indirect taxation of the country? I have not heard a hint from any Member of the Government that from the reductions of indirect taxation which they contemplate under the Treaty and the Budget they anticipate an increased revenue, which would enable them to get rid of the direct taxation, which temporarily they find necessary to place on the Statute-book. I must say, that with regard to the honesty of the course which the Government has been pursuing, and with regard to the Budget brought forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it is strangely at variance with propositions made in former times by the same right hon. Gentleman. But it is more directly, and remarkably, and signally opposite to the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman who now holds the office of Secretary of State for the Home Department, and who preceded the right hon. Gentleman as Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir G. Lewis). What was the policy laid down by him as Chancellor of the Exchequer? It was "We cannot afford to take off the duties on French wines; the revenue cannot afford it. We cannot afford to take off the paper duty, because it is an increasing duty, and upon the whole not a bad duty, and the revenue cannot spare it. But, above all," said the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day, "I protest against the mischievous doctrine of concentrating all your Customs' duties upon a small number of articles of prime necessity, and contend, on the contrary, that it is expedient, in order that the burden may be lightly borne, that your Customs' taxation should be spread over a considerable number of articles, instead of being concentrated upon a few." But what says the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the present day, with his right hon. Colleague sitting by his side, and assenting to the propositions of his Budget? He says, "Take off the wine duties, though the revenue cannot bear it; abolish the paper duty, though the money cannot be spared; but, above all, the merit which we claim for our Budget is a merit dear to every Free-trader—that of having concentrated the whole of our Customs' taxation upon a small and insignificant number of articles." Look a little further forward, my Lords. The noble Earl who commenced this discussion (Earl Grey), referred to the advent of an alteration in the constitution of Parliament. I would ask the noble Duke, who I see is to follow me (the Duke of Newcastle), whether the Government have considered the course which may be pursued by a Parliament elected by those who, if the Reform Bill of the Government become law, will take part in future elections, when that Parliament finds that the whole customs revenue of the country, not amounting to hundreds of thousands but to millions sterling, is raised on articles that enter into the daily consumption of the labouring man—tea, coffee, tobacco, and the necessaries of life? I would ask the noble Duke whether the natural tendency of such a House of Commons will not be to reduce still further the indirect taxation, and to place the burden of taxation on those who are most affected by it in its direct form? I see in this Budget the first step to a permanent, large, and extensive income tax; and that I believe would be full of serious danger in the country. I see serious danger to our system of taxation in a time of peace; but I see absolute ruin by a profuse and lavish expenditure of our resources when there is no need of it, of what ought to be our last and most powerful instrument for raising funds to a large and immediate amount in time of war. There is another and most material question, namely, whether, admitting the Treaty to be a good one, this is the moment which you ought to have chosen for increasing your deficit, and thereby rendering necessary a large amount of income tax. I shall not go into the question whether an increased income tax might or might not have been necessary in consequence of the additional naval and military armaments necessary for the defence of the country. Of this I am sure, that if Her Majesty's Government had been obliged to come forward with a proposition for an increased income tax rendered necessary by such armaments, they would have received no opposition on the part of even those most opposed to an income tax; because all parties would have considered that a proper application of an income tax, the time not being one of actual war, but a time when the circumstances of the world rendered it necessary that our peace establishments should be put upon a war footing in order to provide for the security and independence of the country. The first ground on which I take my stand is this—Even supposing the Treaty to be as advantageous as I think it to be the contrary, it was an injudicious step on the part of Her Majesty's Government, for the purpose of obtaining the Treaty, to make the sacrifice of revenue which we are called upon to do. A noble Earl, the Under Secretary for War, has said, "If you think this Treaty so objectionable, why do you not oppose it? Why satisfy yourselves by opposing the Address on the Treaty?" The answer is that, so far as the fiscal arrangements are concerned, we have already incurred the loss. Already by its vote the House of Commons has thrown away the wine duties; already it has subjected itself to the loss of that convenient £2,000,000, which are to be sacrificed to the Treaty. Therefore, we are placed in a disadvantageous position, when we are asked to throw away the advantages which the Treaty confers on British trade, after the revenue which we derived on articles of French produce coming into this country has been given up. My Lords,

I cannot but think that there appears on the face of the Treaty manifest marks of haste. I shall not go into the question whether it was wise to make the Treaty: I shall not go into the question—though I have a very strong opinion on the subject—whether in the financial position of the country we should have bound ourselves to those engagements from which we cannot escape for ten years; but I say that the Treaty bears on the face of it manifest marks of haste and of a want of due consideration. It appears from the statement of the noble Earl opposite that the negotiator was not responsible for the omission of an article to remove the prohibition of the exportation of rags from France; but how is it, I would ask, that the Treaty having been ratified on the 31st January, the negotiations by which it was entered into not being commenced till the 7th, Her Majesty's assent having been given to it on the 25th January, and the Budget, which but for an accident would have been brought forward on the 3rd February, having been brought forward on the 10th of that month—how is it, I ask, that in that Treaty there appears an article providing that on French paper which should thereafter be imported into this country the duty should be at the fixed amounts of the Excise duty on the paper of this country—namely, 14s. on one description of paper and 15s. on another—when this Treaty was signed on the day before, and ratified a few days after, the meeting of Parliament; and when on the production of the Budget the excise on paper in this country was to be entirely abolished. Although the noble Duke has successfully shown that the question of paper was not so hastily negotiated, yet he must see that there are other points which are not capable of the same satisfactory answer. Whether this Treaty is to be considered as a bargain or not, I take it I am right in assuming that whether France gains on the one side or England on the other, it was intended to place the productions of the two countries on the same footing. It was not intended to give an advantage to French manufactures over English, or to English over French; because there is a power reserved to each nation, by which, in case it should impose any Excise duty on any article of home manufacture, it was entitled to impose a Customs' duty to the same amount on a similar article the production of the foreigner. This being so, I should like to know on what principle

you can enter into an arrangement by which the silk manufacture of France is to be admitted duty free into this country, and by which British manufactured silk is, after a certain time, to be admitted into France not duty free, but subject to a duty of any amount up to 30 per cent. There is no stipulation whatever by which France is bound to admit any article of British manufacture at the duty at present charged on it. I do not mean to say that there are not advantages to the trade of England secured by the removal of some of the existing French prohibitions, the absence of which prohibitions will considerably increase our trade with that country; but, as to the exact conditions on which British articles are to be introduced into France, we are wholly in the dark. There is a supplemental convention to be signed by which the rates to be charged on British goods imported into France are to be set out. But we have already signed away our assent to the convention by assenting to the Treaty. We have already given our assent to those stipulations in the Treaty by which duties may be imposed on articles of British manufacture, so long as those duties do not exceed 30 per cent. We may lift up our voice, we may remonstrate, but we have no power to compel France to do any thing more or less than she likes within that margin of 30 per cent. At present there are a vast number of articles in the French tariff on which the duties range very much below 30 per cent. Very good care has been taken of the cotton manufactures. But what is the case with linens? What is the case with silks? The present French tariff on linens is charged on the hundred-weight, and is in some cases 11 per cent. On bleached goods it is in some cases eight. On the silk manufactures it is from fifteen to twenty. The present tariff varies very much, but on some articles it is as low as 5 per cent. Now, there is no stipulation in the Treaty that no additions shall be made to the existing duties. Therefore, as long as no duties are imposed exceeding 30 per cent, the conditions of the Treaty are fully realized, although articles now paying 5 per cent should be raised to 25, or even to 30 per cent. It is very important to bear in mind how the present duties are levied. Upon almost all articles it is by weight, and weight only; and the consequence is, that on the heavier and coarser articles a duty is charged that amounts to absolute prohibition, while on the lighter and finer manufactures the duty is very light as compared with the intrinsic value of the articles. Suppose the French bring down their duties to an average ad valorem duty of 20 or 25 per cent, it may still be sufficiently high to be prohibitory on the coarser articles, but it will be raised to such an amount as that the finer articles may be excluded by an ad valorem duty infinitely higher than that charged at present on the weight. We must rely on the good nature of the French Government, in construing liberally and largely the engagements into which they have entered, because our Government have placed us in the power of the French Government in the manner which I have just endeavoured to explain to your Lordships. I shall not at this hour enter at greater length into the several provisions of the Treaty. No doubt it will confer some benefits on the British manufacturers; but I think on the other hand that the Government have committed a greater error in binding themselves to it; because apart from the financial considerations, and apart from the time at which it has been entered into, there is another and most serious matter to be considered in connection with it, and that is its political significance. My Lords, I will not say—as seems to be considered by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey)—that it was the absolute duty of Her Majesty's Government to have made, as a condition to the adoption of the Treaty, that there should be an unequivocal declaration on the part of France that she would not annex Savoy. But I will say this, notwithstanding what has fallen from the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, I think it is impossible that this Treaty could have been considered solely in a commercial point of view. As it has been admitted by the noble Lord at the head of Foreign Affairs, it had a political character. In the instructions for the framing of the Treaty the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord J. Russell) wrote—

“At the same time Her Majesty's Government wish the Government of France to understand that they are about to give, by the steps which they now authorize you to take, no small earnest of the value they set upon strengthening and extending their relations with that country. The productions of France are not, in general, articles of such primary necessity, or of such universal use among the people of the United Kingdom, as to entitle them on these grounds to the first attention of the Government. They are selected then for relief, in part, indeed, upon commercial grounds, but in part also because of the collateral effects which we anticipate from the conclusion of the Treaty.”

What those “collateral effects” were was to be learned from the same despatch—

“But, over and above these considerations, they attach a high social and political value to the conclusion of a commercial treaty with France. Its general tendency would be to lay broad and deep foundations in common interest and in friendly intercourse for the confirmation of the amicable relations that so happily exist between the two countries; and, while thus making a provision for the future, which would progressively become more and more solid and efficacious, its significance at the present moment, when the condition of some parts of the Continent is critical, would be at once understood, and would powerfully reassure the public mind in the various countries of Europe.”

What are those “collateral interests” that are alluded to except the social and political relations, and not the commercial relations, between England and France? What is the meaning of the words, “critical circumstances” in this paper? Why is it deemed necessary to establish social and political relations with France? It is significant that the Treaty is intended to show that the policy of England and France not commercially, but politically, is identical. This is the political inference to be drawn from this Treaty, and from this dangerous misconception of its serious consequences are likely to arise. At the moment you were framing this Treaty, did you mean that your policy, your past, your existing, or your future policy, was, or is, or is to be, identical with France? Had you not at the moment when you concluded the Treaty, the knowledge that your policy in Italy was precisely opposite to that of France? Had you not the knowledge that France had declared her determination, under certain contingencies, to annex Savoy? And with that knowledge, did you not persevere in exciting the population of Italy to reject the proposals made by France, and thus bring about the very contingency which France had told you would necessarily lead to the annexation of Savoy? Under these circumstances did you make known to the other Powers of Europe that which had been made known to you—that under certain circumstances there was a serious danger of Savoy being annexed? Did you consult your co-trustees in the settlement of Europe in 1815? Did you call upon those Powers to point out to France how the confidence of Europe in the future professions of peace and friendship of the Emperor would be shaken by this policy of annexation? You did no such thing. You went on to precipitate the course, which France avowed her intention of following. You did not for three months say a word to dissuade the Emperor from taking that course. You took no steps whatever to remonstrate upon that policy, or to consult your Allies in Europe in regard to this annexation of Savoy. Under these circumstances I think the Treaty to be unfortunate in every point of view. It is, as we know, the firm conviction of the French people, that this commercial Treaty was but a sop given, not to England, but to the present Government, whereby that Government might obtain the assistance of certain parties of whose allegiance there was some doubt a short time ago. And the return for that—not to use so strong a word as bribe—that inducement, would be that, Her Majesty's Government being maintained in power, no very serious opposition to the designs of France upon Savoy was to be anticipated from them. He did not impute such conduct to Her Majesty's Ministers; but it was certainly a very painful position for the Government of this country to be in; and it was very unfortunate that the significant coincidence of the Treaty with the annexation should give so suspicious an appearance to the motives and policy of England in the eyes of foreign nations. I suppose from what we hear, in spite of the late representations of Her Majesty's Government—in spite of an assurance given in "another place" within the last few hours, that no steps would be taken by the Emperor in regard to Savoy without consulting the other Powers of Europe—that that measure will be persevered in. Although it appears that universal suffrage is considered good for France, for Tuscany, for Bologna, and the other States of Italy, we are told now that it is not good for Savoy—that whatever may be the feeling of the people, Savoy must be annexed to France, the Treaties of Europe being summarily, without necessity, argument, or consultation set, aside. Is this a question upon which Europe has no right to speak? Is this a question upon which the King of Sardinia is not to be allowed freedom of action? The King of Sardinia, from the commencement, has told you that the annexation of Savoy to France was not a measure upon which he had given his approval—that, in fact, it had never entered into his mind. Well, my Lords, I ask whether he is warranted in rejecting the allegiance of his subjects, and transferring them to another ruler? Is he warranted in setting aside those pacific treaties which had secured a portion of those territories to Switzerland? And is this the moment at which Her Majesty's Government think it necessary to proclaim to the world their acquiescence in a Treaty by which we bind ourselves to a political identification with the policy of France for the next ten years? Let me not be mistaken. I say that the Sovereign of France has up to this moment loyally fulfilled all the engagements he has entered into with us. I deprecated—I deplored—the unfortunate war that took place last year in Italy; I could not, however, blame the Emperor of the French for the course he had taken in that affair, inasmuch as he had broken no pledge nor violated any Treaty. If, however, on the present occasion, from any pretence—for there can be nothing but a pretence put forward—he, the mighty Emperor of the French—he who is at the head of that Empire, and of a great and warlike people—if he should seriously think it necessary to attach to his Empire a small territory like that of Savoy in spite of treaties, upon the apprehension that his great Empire would be subject to an invasion from the King of Piedmont, I must say it is a pretext so shallow and transparent that I cannot imagine any human being with any regard for truth would put it forward. And that England should calmly submit to such a policy, I confess passes my comprehension. But that the Emperor of the French should condescend to such a pretext for entering Savoy is, in my opinion, too palpable and transparent to deceive any one. Well, what is the consequence? I grieve to think that the consequences must be far from the promotion of peace. They are such as to discourage all hopes on our part of a diminished expenditure by the reduction of our armaments. From this moment all Europe will be in a state of painful expectation and anxiety as to what the next move of the Emperor will be. If the pretext of the apprehended invasion of France by Piedmont be put forward in justification of the annexation of Savoy, what may we not expect from the future movements of the Emperor? Will not the result of such a policy be this;—whereas we have hitherto given implicit credit to the Emperor, and to his declaration that the Empire means peace, whereas we have laboured to persuade ourselves that he would never flinch from his engagements—if this unhappy annexation—and unhappy it will be for the Emperor more than for any one else—does take place, he will induce throughout Europe a permanent suspicion of his future policy which years will not efface, and which will involve the expenditure of millions of treasure in the maintenance of warlike preparations which will be deemed necessary in order to guard effectually against contingencies which no man can foresee, but which every nation will feel it its duty to provide against. My Lords, before I sit down I wish to say a word upon the argument used by the noble Earl against your Lordships dividing on this Treaty. Much as I dislike this Treaty, if I thought that to refuse to join in this Address would produce any effect upon the Treaty, if it would cause any embarrassment to the Government, or increase any difficulty between this country and France, much as I dislike the Treaty, I think it has gone so far, and we have made such sacrifices to obtain it, that I should be sorry to see your Lordships throw any difficulty in the way. But if this Address, as I believe, will have no significance upon the Treaty, if your Lordships will not, by refusing to vote this Address, pass any comment upon the Treaty; if in refusing to pass the Address, we do not pass any censure either upon the Treaty or the Government, but merely protest against the Treaty and against giving any approval, or concurrence in the Treaty, then I do not see the force of the noble Earl's attempt to induce me to refrain from dividing. If the noble Earl looks to the present state of your Lordships' benches, he may see reason to think that any decision to which the House may come to-night will not give a true criterion of the strength of feeling and the predominant opinion of your Lordships' House, and in that sense I admit it may be politic and wise on the noble Earl's part not to press his Motion to a division. Looking at the state of the benches behind me, a small minority on this side, and a large majority on that, independent of the merits of the question, might be misconstrued both in this country and abroad. But my sense of the impolicy of this Treaty is so great that I cannot consent to give my sanction to an Address which may be construed into an approval of it; and if the noble Earl on the whole thinks fit to divide, I shall feel it my duty, in justice to my sincere opinion, to go out with him and say "Non-Content" to the Motion.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) had asked whether or not this Address to the Crown on the part of their Lordships was necessary to give validity to the Treaty. He had no difficulty in saying that it was unnecessary. He was never more surprised than when on a former evening he heard the noble Earl contend that, in order to give validity to the Treaty, it was necessary that an Act of Parliament should be passed approving every Article of the Treaty. By the constitution of the United States a treaty was not binding without the assent of the Senate—but, by the constitution of this country, the Crown might make any treaty by virtue of the prerogative of the Crown and without requiring any sanction on the part of Parliament, so that all the Articles of the Treaty could be carried into effect by the existing law of England. Parliament might indeed censure, impeach, or punish the Ministers who had advised the Crown to conclude any treaty, but the treaty itself was valid. By the 20th Article of the present Treaty with France it was said:—

"The present Treaty shall not be valid unless Her Britannic Majesty shall be authorized by the assent of Her Parliament to execute the engagements contracted by Her in the Articles of the present Treaty."

It was plain that this Article referred to engagements which Her Majesty might be unable, according to the existing law, to carry into effect without the consent of Parliament. The Treaty altered the taxation and diminished the revenue of the country: these alterations of duty could not be carried into effect without the authority of Parliament; and the consent of Parliament was therefore necessary to enable Her Majesty to carry out these particular engagements, but these only. The noble Earl also inquired whether the 11th Article of the Treaty required an Act of Parliament to make it valid. That Article said, "The two High Contracting Parties engage not to prohibit the exportation of coal, and to levy no duty upon such exportation." His answer was that it required no Act of Parliament. All that was requisite to give effect to that Article was to allow the law to remain as it was. The Article would not in any way interfere with the belligerent rights of the Crown. The Treaty was exclusively a commercial treaty, and like all other treaties was to be interpreted according to the true intent of the parties. In the case of the present Treaty this intention was found expressed in the Preamble, which set forth that Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French "being equally animated with the desire to draw closer the ties of friendship which unite their two peoples, and wishing to improve and extend the relations of commerce between their respective dominions, have resolved to conclude a treaty for that purpose." The noble Earl had referred to the power of the Crown to prohibit the export of coal under certain circumstances. That power had nothing to do with the present Treaty, and could be exercised as though this Treaty were not in existence. It was a power inherent in the Crown and was part of the prerogative of the Crown. By an Act of the 53rd Geo. III., facility was given to the Crown to prohibit the exportation of certain articles, including coal. This the Crown could do at common law. The Act was a purely municipal law, and did not affect our relations with Foreign Powers. Whatever our relations with France, the Crown might do in certain contingencies exactly what the Crown might have done had this Treaty never been contracted. The Crown had the power of stopping the export of all articles which were "contraband of war," and coal, if used for belligerent purposes, as for the furnaces of vessels of war, was as much contraband of war as gunpowder. The Treaty only looked to what was to be done commercially, and not to what might be done during war or in the apprehension that war is impending. After the almost unanimous assent which the House of Commons had given to the Treaty, and taking into account the state of public opinion on the subject, he trusted there would be no division of sentiment between the two Houses, but that their Lordships would express their hearty concurrence in the proposed Address.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, it was very important that they should fully understand the position in which they were placed, and what would be the consequence of their refusing to concur with the Commons in the Address to the Crown in relation to the Treaty. Now, the noble Earl who first opposed the Address (Earl Grey) anticipated that he would have the sanction of the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack for saying that if the Address was rejected it would have no prejudicial effect on the Treaty. The noble Earl's expectations had been fully confirmed by what had just fallen from the noble and learned Lord. Considering, therefore, that there was no necessity whatever for this Address to render the Treaty effectual, he, for one, would not incur any of the responsibility of adopting it, as it would be taken to imply approval of the Treaty. The questions as to the greater part of the Articles of the Treaty had already been settled by the Resolutions of the other House on the Customs' duties involved in it, so that whatever their Lordships might do with the Address would have no effect whatever on the Treaty itself. The Resolutions of the House of Commons relative to the abolition and reduction of the Customs' duties required to be embodied in an Act, and it was the invariable rule of their Lordships to give their sanction to any such Act that came up from the Commons. On the question relating to the 11th Article he had the misfortune to differ from the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack. If he understood the noble and learned Lord correctly, he had said that there was no necessity for an Act of Parliament to enable Her Majesty to fulfil the engagements into which she had entered by that Article. Now, by the 150th section of the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, Her Majesty was empowered to prohibit the exportation of any articles which she might judge capable of being converted into or made useful in increasing the quantity of military or naval stores, and there could be no doubt that coal is an article of that description. This is a power vested in Her Majesty to be kept in reserve for any emergency which may arise, and she is not at liberty to divest herself of it, even for a day, without the sanction of the same legislative authority which conferred it. Although, therefore, an Act respecting the Customs' duties will be a sufficient assent of Parliament to those Articles of the Treaty which relate to these duties, without an express sanction of the Treaty itself, yet with respect to the 11th Article, relating to coal, as a power conferred by Act of Parliament, can only be dispensed with by the same authority by which it was created, Her Majesty cannot be authorized to execute the engagement contracted by Her in this Article of the Treaty without an express Act of the Legislature for the purpose, and therefore he was of opinion that his noble and learned Friend was incorrect in his view of the effect of the 11th Article of the Treaty.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR repeated that no Act was necessary. Her Majesty could not lose the power which she had at common law by entering into the engagement provided for in this Article.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, there was one point to which no noble Lord had referred during the debate, arising out of the 3rd Article of the Treaty, in which it was stated that the rates of duty mentioned in the preceding Articles were independent of the differential duties in favour of French shipping, with which duties they should not interfere. On an occasion when a treaty was made with France the Liverpool shipowners complained that the Government had greatly neglected their interests in not having urged on the French Government the necessity of giving further advantages to the shipping of this country than it at present possessed. The steam shipping of England was able to compete with the whole world; but at no period of our history had the sailing shipping interest of this country suffered greater depression than at present. The owners of sailing ships, which were chiefly employed in carrying cargoes of cotton, thought they had been much neglected by the Government in connection with this Treaty. At this moment British ships coming from America, for instance, laden with cotton, and entering a French port, were compelled to pay very large differential duties as compared with vessels belonging to the United States. The effect of that was to give an undue advantage to the chief competitor with whom the British shipowner had now to contend; and he complained that that state of things, instead of having been altered in his interest by the recent Treaty, had been perpetuated to his injury.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, that as his noble and learned Friend (Lord Chelmsford) had made a sort of appeal to him, he must say he had at least a great doubt whether his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack was right in his opinion, that the 11th Article did not require a statutory authority to be given to Her Majesty. As a question of constitutional law, he should have thought that the power granted to the Sovereign by an Act of Parliament—the 57th Geo. III—to stop the exportation of coal, was a power to be exercised from time to time, according to his discretion, with a view to the public good, and ought not to be parted with absolutely for a term of years.

LORD CRANWORTH said, he should be deserting his duty if he did not say that he thought the view taken by his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack was the right one.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: I assure your Lordships that under any circumstances I should feel strongly the difficulty of my position in having to address you at the close of a debate of such importance and duration as this; but I feel it the more under existing circumstances, because I have to follow not only a speech of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) in which he has brought forward sundry grave charges both against the Treaty and against the Government, but also a speech of a noble Friend of mine, who addressed your Lordships earlier in the debate (Lord Overstone), and who, from the feeling which I know he entertains towards her Majesty's Government, would not have spoken in the spirit in which he has unless he felt warmly the sentiments to which he gave expression. The House will forgive me if, before I travel into matters more germane to the Treaty, I advert for a moment to the close of the speech of the noble Earl, in which he dwelt so warmly on what he called the "political significance" of this Treaty. If I understand the meaning and intention of the expression, I deny the political significance; but I readily admit the political bearing and importance of the Treaty. The noble Earl endeavoured to show that the language used by the Foreign Secretary must have reference to the annexation of Savoy. But, in the first place, I would call your Lordships' attention to the fact, that the negotiation for this Treaty commenced at a moment when the question of the annexation of Savoy was not before Her Majesty's Government. Again, the remonstrances made by the Government of Her Majesty to that of France on that subject, although couched in the strongest language, were made in a perfectly friendly spirit towards that Government; and I have yet to learn that because you are engaged in friendly remonstrance with another Power on a matter connected with its foreign policy, you are to be precluded from drawing closer the ties of amity with that Power by international arrangements—unless, indeed, there are circumstances which disentitle it to such consideration. I could, indeed, better understand the argument—that this was not the moment when we should enter into this friendly Treaty, when an hon. and learned Gentleman, who was connected with the Government of the noble Earl (Sir H. Cairns), spoke in “another place” in the strongest language of the Emperor of the French and his Government, charging the Emperor with treachery, and his Ministers with falsehood. But now those tactics have changed, and noble Lords turn round and say that the conduct of the Emperor has been candid and fair; that the announcements of M. Walewski have been perfectly truthful and honest. Well, if so then, whatever blame may attach to the Government in your opinion, these objections fall to the ground. I now come to the graver charge raised by the noble Earl opposite against Her Majesty’s Government. But before I deal with his accusation, I must contradict him upon a matter of fact. It is not the fact that we were in possession of the intentions of the Emperor for three months and that we never made any communication to the other Powers. I stated the other night that as soon as the Emperor’s intentions assumed a tangible shape, we did make communications to the three Powers, Austria, Prussia, and Russia; and that copies of the despatches we sent to Earl Cowley were forwarded to them for their information. What is the charge made against the Government? The noble Earls opposite say that it is declared—although they do not profess to believe it—that this Treaty is a sop to England, not to say a bribe. I deny that there is any connection between the two things. I deny solemnly before your Lordships, on the part of my colleagues, that there is any connection between the negotiations for this Treaty of Commerce and the cession of Savoy. They are as separate as any two transactions can be, and I can only say, if the telegram upon which the noble Earl opposite has relied be true, whatever course we may take, it will not in any way be influenced by having carried this Treaty to its consummation. The noble Earl has also said that he does not see the motive for this Motion, and spoke of it as an unusual course. I can only say that it is the very one which Mr. Pitt adopted in 1787, and that its motive is one of which the noble Earl ought to be the last to complain, for he asked my noble Friend the President of the Council some days ago what opportunity would be given to the House of discussing the Treaty; and therefore, while following precedent, we have taken that course which we thought was most likely to be satisfactory to the noble Earl, by proposing an Address to the Crown, in order that any objections which might be felt to the Treaty might be raised and met. There is, indeed, no doubt that, whether this Address be carried or not, it will not in any way affect the carrying out of the Treaty. But then, again, the noble Earl attempted to show that this Treaty was a matter of bargain. No doubt, in a certain sense, it is a bargain; but in the sense intended by the noble Earl, it certainly is not. It is not a bargain, for we do not give up anything that we wish to keep, and we do not ask for anything that it is inconvenient for others to concede. It is really an interchange of gifts—perhaps not of equivalents; for how could we, who have for years been removing our restrictive duties, expect to be able to give equivalents to a country which, until now, has maintained a highly prohibitive system? This Treaty is valuable in a sense that has not been touched upon to-night—it is useful, if not necessary, to lead France into that path which we have been so long treading. We first led France by the Methuen Treaty into a highly restrictive system, and it is proper we should now set her right. But with regard to ourselves it is important. In 1842 France effected a treaty with Belgium which has materially affected our trade, and I have returns here which, at this hour, I shall not quote, but which show that in many articles—linen and coal, for example—our trade has fallen off, while the trade of Belgium has advanced. Shall we not, then, take steps to restore the legitimate course of trade between this country and France? The question has been argued as though this Treaty with France was a novel transaction. I could understand the argument from my noble Friend (Earl Grey), but not from noble Lords opposite. France has always been an exceptional case, and from 1830 down to the last three or four years all Governments have endeavoured to strengthen the connection between the two countries by means of treaties. My noble Friend (Lord Overstone) was in error in supposing that Sir Robert Peel never proceeded by treaty, for in truth there was a constant negotiation carried on by Lord Aberdeen, in the Administration of Sir Robert Peel, with France, with a view to modify their protective system. The noble Earls opposite certainly ought not to complain of this proceeding, for they exerted themselves greatly to effect a commercial treaty with France, and this very article of coal was a prominent feature; the main obstacle in 1852 being that there was an objection to exchange coal for brandy. In the course of his speech the noble Earl touched lightly on the question of wine, stating that the remission of duty on it would be likely to create a deficit in the revenue; he apprehended also that the wine imported would displace malt liquors, and injuriously affect the revenue in that manner. But when Mr. Pitt concluded his treaty with France, an enormous increase in the consumption of wine took place; and we may expect even a greater improvement from the present Treaty. From 1781 to 1785, just previous to Mr. Pitt's treaty, the average annual import of French wine into this country was 83,800 gallons. Immediately after the treaty in the following year the quantity increased from 83,000 to 969,000 gallons; and that this was no exceptional year is proved by the fact that from 1787 to 1792, when of course the treaty fell to the ground, the average yearly importation was 727,000 gallons. If malt be displaced it may be a misfortune in other points of view, but not as it will affect revenue, as the practical result will be that a lower duty will be displaced by a higher. Much has been said in the course of the debate on the question of coal. I will not now go into the discussion of the quantity of coal that remains in this country, but from calculations I have made, from the returns of the mineral survey of England and from other sources, I can say they do not bear out any anticipations of an early failure of the supply. It has been contended by my noble Friend (Lord Overstone) that we have a right to put an export duty on coal, because we have a monopoly of the material; and the tea duties levied by the Chinese, and on opium by the Indian Government were cited in support of the argument. But the assumption is erroneous; we have not that monopoly of coal that would render it safe to impose an export duty. We much underrate the capability of France to produce coal, and certainly Belgium can largely supply her. Indeed, the export of coal from Belgium to France has been much larger than that from England. An export duty on coal has already been tried; the experiment failed, and the duty was abandoned in 1845. My noble Friend (Lord Overstone) asserts that we are contracting the sphere of our indirect taxation. I admit that the articles on which Customs' and Excise duties are levied have been reduced to forty-four; but it is a mistake to suppose that in the sum produced by those articles the proportion between our direct and indirect taxation has been greatly lessened, or that we obtain from indirect taxation less than formerly. In 1842 the revenue from Customs and Excise was £33,542,000. Between 1842 and 1858 the Customs' and Excise duties repealed amounted to about £11,100,000. But so far from the revenue having lost these £11,000,000, the amount now raised from Customs' and Excise duties is £40,087,000, showing an actual increase over the same revenue in 1842 of nearly £7,000,000, notwithstanding the reduction of £11,100,000. That is conclusive with regard to the policy of a remission of duties. It has been stated that the time is approaching when the direct taxation will bear a greater proportion to the indirect taxation than formerly; but, under the operation of the new tariff the indirect taxation is no less than 78 per cent of the whole revenue of the country. Under all the changes made since 1842 it has never been less than 71 per cent of the whole taxation, and it was only so low as that during the Russian war. Is it not then proved that the remission of duties is really a sound system. The noble Earl said that by the Treaty the Government have abandoned all power to impose any addition to the Customs' duties in the event of a war, or any other emergency; but if he refers to clause 9, he will see that they have not precluded themselves from increasing those duties. Now I wish for one moment to refer to the observations which fell from the noble Earl opposite, who expressed a wish to receive an explanation as to how it happened that between the 17th of January and the date of the ratification of the Treaty no provision had been inserted in the Treaty based upon the remission of the Excise duty on paper. My answer to that question is that the Treaty was not negotiated by a Member of the Government, and the noble Earl must be aware that it is in a matter of this kind absolutely necessary that entire secrecy should be maintained, inasmuch as the result of a contrary course might be that an inducement would be held out to the practice of every kind of fraud and evasion by those interested in the trade about to be affected by a remission of duty. The noble Earl says he is undecided as to the course he will take with regard to the vote which is about to be taken, and that if he thought the carrying of the Amendment was likely to be prejudicial to the Treaty or inconvenient to the course of public business he would not vote for it. I really must leave the noble Earl to decide for himself which course he will take; though I must say I should deeply regret if the Address were negatived, for many reasons. I feel confident that the inclinations of the noble Earl are right, and that he would not wish to place this House in opposition to the vote come to by the House of Commons. I hope the Treaty will be sanctioned by your Lordships as it has been by the other House, because I feel certain, notwithstanding all that has been said this evening, that it will, if peace be maintained, add to the wealth and happiness of the people of this country—that it will enlarge our fiscal means, and by increasing eventually our revenue, will equally tend, even in the event of war, to the future strength and security of England. Under these circumstances, I do earnestly hope that your Lordships will give your sanction to a measure, which is calculated to improve the condition of both countries, and moreover the relations existing between them—a measure which even those who oppose it admit to have received the approval of the people at large.

EARL GREY said, an appeal had been made to him by the noble Lord opposite not to press his opposition to the Address to a division, and he was unwilling to act contrary to that advice. He must at the same time observe that, entertaining a strong feeling that the House ought not to record the solemn expression of its unqualified approval of the Treaty under discussion, and knowing that many noble Lords who held a similar opinion had trusted to his declaration that he intended to afford them an opportunity of recording that opinion, he did not feel quite justified in depriving them of that opportunity.

On Question, “Whether to agree with the Commons in the said Address, &c.?” their Lordships divided:—

Contents 68; Not-Contents 38: Majority 30.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

And a Message sent to the Commons to acquaint them that the Lords had agreed to the said Address, and had filled up the Blank; the LORD STEWARD and the LORD CHAMBERLAIN of the Household to attend HER MAJESTY with the Address on the Part of this House; the LORD STEWARD to wait upon HER MAJESTY humbly to know what Time HER MAJESTY will please to appoint to be attended with the said Address

AUSTRALIAN NAVAL STATION.
QUESTION.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether Her Majesty's ship Fawn, which has recently sailed for Australia, has been sent there as an augmentation to the squadron at present on that station, or for the purpose of relieving another vessel ordered home; whether the attention of the Government has been called to the fact that France has within the last year reorganized her Military and Naval Establishments at New Caledonia, and has now made it her principal station in those seas; and whether it is intended to place our Naval Commanding Officers upon a more equal footing with the French by creating the Australian station into an Admiral's command?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the Fawn had been sent to relieve a vessel which had been ordered home, and not despatched by way of augmentation to our naval force in the Australian Colony.

With respect to the increase of the French establishment at New Caledonia, he had to inform the noble Lord that it was a mistake to suppose that France had an establishment at that station. They had, however, an Admiral in the Pacific, and a Governor in New Caledonia, under his command. We had a Commodore at the Australian station, and it was not the intention of the Government to convert that station into an Admiral's command.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS.

QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, if it is his intention to introduce any measure during the present Session to render the Registration of Voters more frequent?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, there was no intention on the part of the Government to introduce during the present Session any measure to render the Registration of Voters more frequent.

NEWSPAPER STAMP.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Newspaper Proprietors who may have in their possession any stamped sheets on the day when the proposed new regulations for the abolition of the impressed Stamp take effect will be allowed to use them, and to retain the privilege of sending them free by post?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that some arrangement would undoubtedly be made to prevent the Proprietors of Newspapers from being losers of the price of the impressed stamp; but he could not hold out the hope that, a precise day being fixed for the commencement of the new system, provision should at the same time be made with the view of allowing certain persons to retransmit newspapers by post as was done at present. He regretted to have to add that, in consequence of the indisposition of Sir Rowland Hill, it was found impossible to frame the regulations which it would be necessary to make in connection with the proposed alteration as rapidly as he had expected. He trusted, however, that no long period would elapse before he would be in a position to announce that those regulations had been framed.

RESTS FOR PORTERS.—QUESTION.

MR. SLANEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if provision can be made for rests for porters and others carrying heavy burdens on or near the great lines of public thoroughfare, in place and in addition to those removed?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was afraid he could give the hon. Gentleman no satisfactory answer to his question, as neither the Secretary of State nor the Commissioners of Police had any authority with respect to the point to which it related.

EATING-HOUSE LICENCES.—QUESTION.

MR. HARDY said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer when the second reading of the Eating House Licences Bill will be taken?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, not before next week certainly; but he would to-morrow announce the day. The Bill had been printed and circulated, so that all persons might know its contents.

DRAWBACK ON WINE DUTIES.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any arrangement has been made with the Wine Merchants regarding a Drawback of the Duty on Wine in Stock?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied; that the Wine merchants were now engaged in considering the subject. They had thought fit to call a general meeting of the trade, giving notice to all dealers throughout the country. They had informed him that they would not be able to hold the meeting before Tuesday next, and until that meeting had been held he should not be able to make a communication to the House.

CHINESE EXPEDITION.

QUESTIONS.

MR. BAILLIE said, he rose to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the China Vote will be taken to-morrow, and whether the Papers relating to the subject which have been promised will at once be laid on the Table of the House?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he proposed to take the Vote in question to-morrow, and to make a brief statement with reference to it. The papers to which the hon. Gentleman referred were not yet quite ready.

MR. HORSMAN said, he wished to inquire whether the Vote for the expenses of the China war will be the first Government business to-morrow evening?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that Vote would be taken the first thing to-morrow.

ELECTORAL RETURNS.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to point out that the Government had laid before the House a Return, a very complete Return, of the rating of the Boroughs and Counties; but he was sorry to say that in the Returns there was a column of the number of occupants between £10 and £50. What he wished to ask was, Whether this column included the Freeholders who occupied between those two amounts?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied, that the Returns referred to were merely an abstract of a larger Return, known as Mr. Locke King's Return, moved for last Session. It contained nothing new. In fact, the column referred to gave a Return, prepared with great labour by the Poor Law Board, and he believed it was an accurate and trustworthy Return. He spoke from memory, but he believed that it gave a Return of all holders, but it did not distinguish between males and females, and certainly it did not distinguish between cases of resident and non-resident occupiers, nor did it distinguish the cases of Freeholders who were occupiers of their own property. On the contrary, it included Freeholders and mere occupiers; and therefore a considerable deduction would have to be made from the total, in order that one might ascertain what would be the actual number of persons who would have the franchise under the Reform Bill, but he was not aware that in a limited time it would be possible to make a better Return than that on the Table.

THE INCOME TAX.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. CRAWFORD,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in case the discussion on the China Vote should not be protracted beyond a late hour he proposed to ask the House to take the proposal of the Government in reference to the Income Tax into consideration to-morrow in Committee of Ways and Means.

MR. WALPOLE said, that having understood the right hon. Gentleman to propose in his financial statement that three-quarters of the amount of the Income Tax would be raised in 1860, and that certain differences in the rate of Duty in the case of incomes below £100 and above £150 would be made, he wished to know whether he intends in his Resolutions on the subject, to introduce any alteration in the proposal which he originally submitted to the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that it was not intended to make any such alteration. In case of exemptions no mention was made of them in the preliminary Resolutions provision being made for them in the Bill which might be subsequently introduced. As to the levying three-quarters of the Income Tax in the manner to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, that was a course which might be taken, strictly speaking, in accordance with the Law as it stood.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL*:—Sir, I rise to move for leave to bring in a Bill for the consolidation and amendment of the laws relating to bankruptcy and insolvency; and I can say most unaffectedly that I have considerable apprehension in bringing this measure before the House—an alarm arising not so much from the inherent difficulty and importance of the subject, but principally from the fact that the House of Commons has again to listen to what promises to be the reform of those laws which they have from time to time been led to believe were effectively reformed by measures that had been repeatedly introduced and passed by the House. The evils complained of in the law of bankruptcy have been denounced over and over again. They were complained of even by Lord Eldon, although they were not reformed, and I believe it may be safely said that no country in Europe had so bad a law or one so justly complained of as the law of bankruptcy and insolvency in this country. The evils of the law grew to so great a height that in 1831 there was brought forward a complete measure for its radical alteration. In 1842, that attempt having proved to be wholly ineffectual, another alteration was made; and in 1849 Parliament was again told that a perfectly new system must be introduced; and accordingly a completely new code of law was passed on the subject. I am sorry to say that the evils which now exist are complained of even more loudly than those which previously existed, and accordingly we are bound to admit that the last state of this law is even worse than the first. The difficulty arising from this condition of things is that he who now addresses himself to the subject finds the whole ground encumbered with the remains of previous alterations of the law; he is not at liberty to sweep away that which is done with, and erect a new and simple edifice; he is obliged to adopt the building that exists, and construct entirely out of old materials. There are difficulties, undoubtedly, that meet one in the nature of the subject itself. In principle, nothing ought to be more simple than a law of bankruptcy. Bankruptcy is nothing in the world more than taking the whole of the debtor's property by one universal execution, or by one universal surrender—for the benefit of his creditors; and all that would be required would be a tribunal simply for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of the rights of those who are interested in the distribution, and some simple machinery for realizing the property and dividing it among the parties entitled. In theory, then, one would imagine that it was most easy to construct a tribunal and establish an institution that should devote itself to the task of realizing the property of the insolvent, and, with the advantage of an organized body, that this could be done at a very small and reasonable cost. The House will hardly believe that, as the result of the various alterations which have been made, such is the enormous number of official persons who have been introduced into the establishment of bankruptcy that at the present time the expenses of the administration of an estate in the Court of Bankruptcy amount to very nearly, if not quite, 33 per cent upon the property realized. It is hardly possible to bring home to the mind a correct idea of the enormous amount of error or impurity of management involved in that admitted result. For every £100 of a debtor's estate realized in bankruptcy the sum of £33 is deducted for the costs of collection and distribution. Now, in ordinary life 5 per cent for the collection of property is considered a very high rate of charge; but the unfortunate creditor whose debt amounts to £600—even if that be realized—has to submit to a deduction of £200 to satisfy the claims and provide for the maintenance of the parties appointed by the State to conduct this business, taken out of his own hands. I have a return recently made to me by the Bankruptcy Court, from which I find that on the whole sum realized the expenses are put down at £33 13s. 5d. per cent, and the same thing is plainly shown from a general Return published in a Parliamentary paper of Session 1857, when the expenses amounted to very nearly the same rate of £33 per cent. Now, this is unquestionably an evil which alone would be sufficient to demonstrate the utter impropriety of the existing system. I therefore come before you with great confidence to urge the necessity of an alteration; but I am admonished by the failure of those who have frequently essayed the same thing that I am now attempting to do—not to be too confident of the success of the measure which I am about to propose. That measure has been prepared with the utmost amount of care, knowledge, and labour which I could bestow upon it; but I earnestly hope you will receive it with a determination to take nothing upon trust, but maturely to consider all the details, so that by the application of legal minds, and the valuable information of men of mercantile pursuits brought to bear on the subject, we may have some confidence of arriving at a satisfactory result. I now proceed to describe the existing evils, and the mode by which a remedy should be applied to them. There is one part of the question with which, although not unwilling, I am at present afraid to meddle. I mean the subject of the entire abolition of imprisonment for debt. I would gladly have included that relief in the measure I shall ask leave to introduce, but I feared that it would be encountered with so much diversity of opinion as to render it expedient to omit it from the Bill. At the same time it might easily be made the subject of another measure, to accompany the one about to be brought in, if the House should think such a course desirable; and, if I see anything like the existence of a general desire to that effect, another measure will be introduced. But the first evil to which the present Bill addresses itself is the monstrous anomaly of there being in this country two different systems for the administration of insolvent

estates, namely, the system of bankruptcy and the system of insolvency. This state of things has originated, like many other anomalies in our law, not from any theory or preconceived design, but as the result of accident, and because our legislation has frequently been nothing in the world more than a series of expedients to meet daily wants and exigencies, not prepared or arranged in anything like a comprehensive system. Accordingly, you have had a bankruptcy law which possesses more of a criminal than a civil character. You made no provision whatever for the discharge from imprisonment of the insolvent debtor who is no trader, and for a long time your gaols were crowded with unhappy and wretched insolvents, for whom there were no means of deliverance from incarceration. At last there was introduced a Bill, not founded on any systematic revision of the law of insolvency, but suggested merely by feelings of compassion and charity, which provided, in some degree, for the delivery of insolvent debtors who were not traders. This arrangement continued, until you have now the machinery, by which, in certain cases, insolvent debtors are released, but only through the medium of imprisonment. This brings us to the vicious part in the administration of our law of insolvency—for the principle, unquestionably, ought to be that if the insolvent is willing to give up the whole of his property and submit himself to examination, and is found not to have been guilty of any fraud, such as obtaining goods on credit by any deceitful proceeding, he should be as much entitled to be discharged without imprisonment as is the trader. What you have done, however, is, that you have sent the insolvent to prison, and subjected him to the degradation of incarceration, and all this merely that you may wring from him a full discovery and surrender of his property for distribution among his creditors. Imprisonment as a punishment for incurring debt or becoming insolvent without fraud is inconsistent with the dictates of humanity. Treading in the path of all the distinguished men in the other House who have adorned the jurisprudence of this country, we therefore propose entirely to abolish the distinction between bankruptcy and insolvency, and to make one law applicable to both. The result of this will be that the creditors of the insolvent will have no motive or reason for sending him to prison; they will without difficulty be able to obtain a discovery of his estate and the possession of his property, together with all the advantages they now enjoy with respect to the trader, without the necessity of incarcerating him. On the other hand, I hope means will be found under this Bill by which, not only will our gaols be relieved from their insolvent inmates, but an end will be put to a spectacle frequently witnessed, to the general reproach of this country—namely, that of persons put into prison for debt remaining there and defying their creditors by persistently refusing to make a disclosure of their estate. I propose, in the first place, that any person shall be at liberty to present a petition for an adjudication of bankruptcy against himself. The course of legislation on this subject has been this: In the year 1849 provision was made that no debtor should obtain an adjudication of bankruptcy against himself who was not able to produce an estate sufficient to pay his creditors 5*s.* in the pound. That had the effect of diminishing the number of bankrupts, and of augmenting in the same proportion the number of insolvents. Persons who would have applied for an adjudication of bankruptcy were compelled to submit to imprisonment, and were then discharged by means of the Insolvent Debtors' Court. In 1854 this was partially remedied, and, instead of an estate to the extent of 5*s.* in the pound, the insolvent petitioning for an adjudication of bankruptcy against himself was required to show that his estate would yield the sum of £150. This, however, still debarred a great number of insolvents from recourse to the Court of Bankruptcy, and the number of applications to the Insolvent Court was augmented. I find that in consequence of that alteration in the law the petitions filed by debtors in the Insolvent Debtors' Court in 1858 amounted to 3410, of which number 2183 were the petitions of small traders. It is seen, therefore, that, owing to the difficulty of applying to the Court of Bankruptcy, traders are driven into the Insolvent Debtors' Court, and submit to imprisonment in order to obtain their release and discharge. Now, I propose that every insolvent willing to make a full disclosure and surrender of his property shall be adjudicated a bankrupt upon his own application, and shall not be put to the necessity of producing an estate of the value of any prescribed amount of money to entitle him to present his petition. On this particular subject the House is aware that there is one marked difference between the law of insolvency and the law of bankruptcy. The future property of the insolvent discharged by the Insolvent Debtors' Court still remains liable to his creditors. As far as regards the fraudulent debtor that is perfectly reasonable, but as respects the honest debtor it is a most cruel and wanton provision. The true principle of the law of insolvency is, that in the absence of fraud the faithful disclosure and surrender of his property entitle the debtor to his discharge. The man is emancipated, if he has acted fairly and honourably; he is sent out that he may begin the world again and have the benefit of his future industry and exertions. But if you send him out to have all his subsequent earnings or acquisitions of property loaded with the burden of his past liabilities, to what end or purpose do you discharge him? It will paralyse his future exertions, and deprive him of the opportunity of benefiting by his discharge. The advantage to the trader is found by experience to be comparatively trifling, and this is therefore a provision which, while it puts a stop to the exertions of the debtor, is attended with no corresponding result to the creditor. In conformity with the opinions of all those who have attended to this part of the subject, I propose that, in the absence of fraud, no bankrupt shall be obliged to make his future acquired property liable for debts contracted before his bankruptcy. I have had communications from a great variety of persons upon this subject, and many of them dwell upon a circumstance of great importance—that, as the law now stands, a discharged insolvent cannot even insure his life or make any provision for his wife and family;—for, if he does, a creditor, if he can show that the insolvent has any property not absolutely required for his wants, may—no matter what interval of time has elapsed from the insolvency—take it away from him. I think it would be better not to have any discharge at all than to deprive a man of his whole estate, and turn him upon the world probably only to be brought up again ten or fifteen years hence and stripped of all he may since have acquired. That being so, I will next describe the mode in which I have endeavoured to provide for the relief of the gaols. I have already stated that the insolvent is to be entitled to petition for an adjudication of bankruptcy against himself. If he is unable to bear the expense of that application, he is to be brought before the Court and allowed to petition in formâ pauperis. The House is probably aware that there is now a fund in the Insolvent Debtor's Court applicable partly to defray the expense of these pauper applications. To meet the case of persons who wilfully remain in prison and refuse to disclose their property, I provide that, after a man has been in prison fourteen days upon a committal for debt, which constitutes an act of bankruptcy, he shall, whether he will or not, be brought before the Court, be examined as to his property, and be adjudged a bankrupt, which will have the effect of vesting the whole of his estate in the assignee for the benefit of creditors, and shall then be discharged from prison under an order of protection. I think, therefore, that the operation of these three things—the power of the insolvent to apply for an adjudication against himself, the ability of the pauper insolvent to get a discharge without expense, and the power of compulsorily bringing before the Court an insolvent debtor who wishes to remain in gaol rather than disclose his property—will practically have the effect of abolishing imprisonment for debt, because even a creditor who desires to imprison his debtor from a malicious feeling will have no interest in doing so when the debtor will be able to procure his discharge in a very few days. In this way, Sir, the two systems will be entirely blended together, insolvency will be merged in bankruptcy, and there will be a common adjudication of bankruptcy affecting both traders and non-traders. Out of this, however, arises a material consideration, to which I specially invite the attention of the House. The non-trader cannot be subjected to the same law which now affects the trader, because the acts of bankruptcy which may be committed by a trader are many of them of a very technical and artificial nature; and a gentleman or a person in the highest station, and perfectly solvent, might by accident be involved in the commission of an act of bankruptcy without being at all aware of the consequences of that which he had inadvertently done. I therefore propose that those technical acts of bankruptcy, such as denying yourself to a creditor at your home, and others of the same kind, shall not be included in the law of bankruptcy, but that there shall be substituted for the list now in force a few plain and simple tests of insolvency. If the debtor absconds and leaves the realm, there can be no doubt as to what ought to be the consequence. If, being abroad, he remains abroad to defeat his creditors, there can be no dispute as to the manner in which he ought to be dealt with. If he make any fraudulent disposal of his property, or any part of his property, or any fraudulent preference, being insolvent, there can be little doubt that the same rule ought to apply to both trader and non-trader. If he cause himself to be committed to prison, or if he permit part of his property to be seized and sold under an execution, that is a tolerably clear proof of a state of insolvency. Further than this, if a judgment be recovered against any person, though he be not a trader, this Bill provides a mode of summoning the judgment debtor before the Court, when, if he is unable to show that he can within a reasonable time satisfy or give security for the satisfaction of the judgment, he is to be made bankrupt. These are the principal acts of bankruptcy which will remain in operation under this Bill. They are, I apprehend, unmistakable criteria of general insolvency, and there is, therefore, no reason why they should not apply alike to the cases of traders and non-traders. There are a number of minor details which I will not now describe; these are the principal points which deserve attention in breaking down the partition between bankruptcy and insolvency. The next great evil in the existing system is the mode in which our predecessors have provided for the administration of the law—a mode presenting the most singularly absurd blending and admixture of judicial and administrative functions that ever was seen. Nothing can be more necessary than to keep perfectly distinct and apart judicial and administrative duties, but you have vested the administration of the law of bankruptcy in Judges, who at one and the same time, and in one and the same manner, have to discharge purely judicial and purely ministerial functions. If you go into the Bankruptcy Court in London, you will find there five commissioners, who are all Judges and all administrators. You have five heads and five mouths, and you have, of course, every variety of rule, and principle, and mode of administration. If you enter the court you will probably find going on at the same time a meeting of creditors for the choice of assignees, over which the Judge presides, but in doing so has no judicial functions to discharge; an audit or dividend meeting, in which his duty is equally ministerial; and perhaps at the same time there is an examination of a bankrupt or of some creditor going on, over which he is contemporaneously and simultaneously supposed to preside, and probably at the same time he will be reading one of the journals of the day. I mention that not invidiously, nor with any intention of casting reproach upon the commissioners. I mention it rather as an illustration of the painful state of things in which the Judge has to preside over matters which do not require the exercise of the judicial mind, and may therefore without reproach, though probably not with very great decency, occupy himself in the manner that I have described. There is no necessity whatever for having five administrators of the law of bankruptcy in a single city. There is no necessity for this compound of judicial and ministerial duties. I have had a most accurate examination made of the mode in which the commissioners in London—of whom I speak with great respect—the fault is in the system, not with them—transact their business, and I find that the ordinary rule which has existed for a considerable time is, that each commissioner sits three times a week. On the average each sitting lasts three hours, but two-thirds of this time are occupied with ministerial or administrative business; matters requiring judicial intellect or the application of legal knowledge really do not occupy more than one hour out of the three. The result, therefore, is, that the five commissioners may be considered as spending in judicial duty, properly so called, only three hours each during the week, which makes a sum total of fifteen hours. Now, as a general rule, a Judge—I will take, for instance, the Master of the Rolls, any of the Vice-Chancellors, or any of the Judges of the common law courts—is occupied from ten in the morning until five in the afternoon. The ordinary practice of the Master of the Rolls or a Vice-Chancellor is to leave his court at half-past three or four o'clock, and sit in chambers for an hour, or sometimes more, according to the necessities of business. I propose, therefore, to sweep away the commissioners in London altogether, and, to repeat a phrase which, unfortunately, we have been too frequently obliged to use, to release them from their duty; but, after they are so released, to leave them in possession of the full amount of their existing emoluments. If any necessity shall arise requiring assistance on the part of these commissioners I shall expect them, during the time they continue in receipt of their salaries, to give that assistance and to act as auxiliaries in the administration of justice. Each of the five commissioners receives a clear salary of £2,000 a year. They have long been in the enjoyment of their position—they were all, I believe, appointed as long ago as 1832 or 1833, and they are all, therefore, advanced in years. I mention this, not with the view of anticipating an early termination of their emoluments—far be it from me to wish any such result—but the House will see that the continuance of their salaries will be of necessity but for a very short period of time. What I propose to substitute in place of the commissioners is one single Judge, as far as the principal court is concerned, to be put upon an equality in every respect with the Judges of the courts of equity and with the Judges in the courts of common law, and to receive a corresponding emolument. There will be no difficulty in finding numbers of men not only eminently qualified for the office, but able, any one of them, to discharge with the utmost ability the whole of the duties now performed by the five commissioners. The single Judge will sit, as the other Judges of the land sit, in foro contentioso, transacting in open court the judicial business properly so called. I propose to remedy one great evil that now exists. The appeal from the country commissioners is at present an appeal only to the Court of Appeal in Chancery. I propose to give an appeal directly to the single Judge sitting in bankruptcy, whose business will be purely judicial, the administration of ministerial duties now performed by the commissioners being transferred to the registrars. The House is aware that there are in the Bankruptcy Courts a number of officers called registrars, all of whom are barristers of considerable standing, and who, in fact, are now in the habit of sitting to a large extent in the room of the commissioners. I propose that all undisputed adjudications of bankruptcy, all meetings of creditors for the choice of assignees, all private examinations of witnesses or of bankrupts, all audit meetings, all dividend meetings, all examinations of accounts, shall be conducted by the registrars, who will then hold the same relation to the Judge as is now held by the masters of the courts of common law, or by the Judges' clerks in the case of the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors in Equity, but with an immediate power of reference, in case of dispute or controversy arising, to the Judge in chambers, who will be empowered at once to adjourn the matter, if it deserves further discussion, to himself, to be argued and decided in open court. I thus relieve the Judge from all that ministerial and administrative business which is now performed by the commissioners, and I obtain the means of removing, to a great extent, the inconvenience of which so much complaint is made. The administration of bankruptcy, as the House is aware, has been centralized in certain localities. Take, for example, the London district. If a creditor is obliged or desires to attend the Bankruptcy Court to vote in the choice of assignees or to examine the bankrupt, he is compelled, supposing he lives in Southampton or Yarmouth, to come up to London for that purpose; and the original misfortune arising to him in the bankruptcy is frequently made ten times more galling and bitter by the amount of inconvenience, expense, and embarrassment to himself personally that proceeds from the necessity of his following the Bankruptcy Court, and quitting his business, to come to a distant locality in order to assert his rights or meet any demand that may be made upon him. With the view of remedying this evil to a great degree, I propose that in the London district the registrars shall be sent to hold meetings, as well for the choice of assignees as for all other administrative or ministerial proceedings, to different localities, to meet the convenience and wishes of creditors. Here I must mention that in the London district there is, of course, an enormous amount of business, a considerable portion of which consists of very small bankruptcies—that is, of bankruptcies where the estate is almost nothing. I propose, therefore, that there shall be in the London district an auxiliary court to deal with these small estates. In the London district there is no power to transfer small bankruptcies to the County Courts. Hence it becomes necessary, to prevent the chief court being overwhelmed with business of that kind, to establish in the London district a tribunal somewhat similar to the County Courts in the country districts. I propose that the Insolvency Court in Portugal-street, under the denomination of an assistant court to the Court of Bankruptcy, shall be continued for the purpose of administering the estates of all bankrupts where the assets do not exceed £300. That being the system of administration in the London district—a system which I think will work satisfactorily and economically—I wish I could say that I had been enabled to propose an equally good arrangement for the country districts. The district courts of bankruptcy were established in 1842, previous to which we were in the habit of sending down fiats of bankruptcy to local commissioners appointed for the purpose—a very fruitful source of expense, of trouble, and I might almost say, of malversation, inasmuch as assets got into the hands of persons from whom they were never afterwards recovered. Accordingly, the District Courts were established in 1842; but I believe that if the County Court system had existed at that time there never would have been an establishment of district courts of bankruptcy. I painfully contrast, as far as our administration is concerned, our system of bankruptcy with the County Court system in Scotland. The Scotch have adhered to the ancient Saxon institution of Sheriffs' Courts, and they have a system of administration in bankruptcy which works extremely well, for its expense is represented as not exceeding 12 or 13 per cent, and it is carried out in the counties chiefly by the Sheriffs' Courts, that answer every purpose. I should be glad if I had it in my power to devise a plan for removing the whole of the District Courts of Bankruptcy, and vesting the administration entirely in the County Courts; but there are two things that altogether prevent the possibility of this being accomplished at present. I may say at once, that the bankruptcy law being a system of great nicety, requiring very considerable legal knowledge and practice, I could not with perfect confidence transfer its administration all at once to the Judges of the County Courts. A great number of these are gentlemen of high reputation, and deserving of esteem in their profession; but a number were also selected from the Judges of the Small Debts Courts, which existed at the time when the system was introduced, and I do not think they would constitute satisfactory inaugurators of a scheme requiring so much minute attention. Again, if I were at once to sweep away the district courts, I should propose to deal with the commissioners in the same liberal way as I propose to deal with the London commissioners, but it is impossible to do this with the means which are available. Accordingly, I introduce into the Bill a provision of this kind—that on the occurrence of any vacancy among the district commissioners, it shall be in the power of Her Majesty, by Order in Council, to make a new arrangement and distribution of the business, and to appropriate the district in such divisions as may be deemed convenient to the existing County Courts, and to parcel out accordingly the district among the County Courts, and to clothe the County Court Judges with all the jurisdiction possessed by the commissioner who has occasioned the vacancy. I think it possible that a mode may be found of exercising this power so as gradually to absorb the whole administration of bankruptcy into the County Courts, and to provide, not only a far more economical, but a much more convenient administration of the law of bankruptcy throughout the country. An enormous amount of evil is at present experienced from the immense area attached to any one district of bankruptcy. For instance, to the district of Bristol is attached nearly the whole of Wales; and when a debtor, a creditor, or any person amenable to the bankruptcy law is living at Pembroke, for example, he must come to Bristol in order to attend the court. It costs him one day to get there, and if the business, fortunately for him, comes on immediately, it costs him another day to get through it, and a third day for the purpose of going back again. The original loss of the creditor by reason of the failure of the debtor is probably not so much felt by him as the annoyance, trouble, expense, and inconvenience attendant on being dragged from home and carried to a place 120 miles distant. This makes it desirable that the jurisdiction should be transferred to the County Courts, and the transference may be effected in a manner rendering the gradual absorption of the district courts into the County Courts not difficult. These are the principal subjects on the head of the administration of the law and the constitution of the tribunals, to which I beg to call your attention; and I would only say on the subject of expense, that the constitution of the new court, when it comes into play in London, will be very much less than the constitution of the existing establishment in point of cost. I take the liberty of pointing out that one great defect in the existing law is this, that if you go into the Court of Bankruptcy at all, you cannot escape from that court until you administer the whole of the estate. This is a serious inconvenience. A creditor may wish to invoke the aid of the Bankruptcy law for a particular purpose; but he is unable to obtain that aid without winding up the whole estate, when once within the walls of the court, and having it completely administered there; that is to say, without sacrificing one entire third of the whole of the property. That is a great injury. Therefore I am anxious to provide that if creditors are compelled to resort to the Court of Bankruptcy for any particular purpose, they may at any time they please, provided a certain majority of the creditors consent thereto, suspend the proceedings, take the whole estate out of the Court of Bankruptcy, and commit it to any mode of private administration which they may consider more economical or expedient. There is another advantage which will attend the plan proposed to be established by this Bill; an honest debtor may desire to make a disclosure of his affairs to his creditors, with the view of making some arrangement and preventing the necessity of bankruptcy, but the very disclosure puts him in the power of some particular creditor or some individual who wishes to pursue, perhaps, a private end of his own, and who opposes an obstacle in the way of completing an effective arrangement, by prosecuting an adjudication of bankruptcy. I hope to provide a mode of relieving persons in this situation from the embarrassment I have referred to. According to the plan embodied in the Bill, immediately on adjudication of bankruptcy a meeting of creditors will be appointed, and at that meeting if a majority of the creditors present should deem it advisable not to go on with the bankruptcy, or to proceed with it only in a limited extent, they will have power of coming to an arrangement for the purpose, notice of this resolution being given to all the creditors; and then, if a majority of three-fourths in value should determine to suspend the prosecution of the adjudication of bankruptcy they may suspend it at once, and no further steps will be taken under it. Thus the honest debtor, without committing an act of bankruptcy, may petition for an adjudication, and make to the creditors a proposal of compromise or arrangement. If the creditors confide in him, and find his proposal convenient, suitable, and just, then three-fourths in point of value concurring together will have the power of making a conclusive and binding arrangement, without the possibility of being interfered with by an adverse individual. This power is given to the creditors to be exercised at any time, and is not limited to the first instance. In this way I propose to make the law of bankruptcy a part of the law of debtor and creditor, and to avoid the necessity for the great cost, inconvenience, and suffering which at present are the only terms on which parties can get the benefit they desire. We are all aware that a great stigma attaches to the name of bankrupt. Accordingly a most natural wish exists on the part of the honest man to avoid the reproach of bankruptcy. As I have already said, there is great difficulty in gratifying such a wish, because the moment he exposes his affairs he lays himself open to adverse proceedings. Now, upon examining the statistics of this subject, the House will be surprised to find that the contrast between the number of adjudications in bankruptcy and the number of trust deeds and deeds of arrangement is immense. In 1858, and for a series of antecedent years, the adjudications, as compared with trust deeds and deeds of arrangement, presented this remarkable contrast, that whereas in 1858 the number of adjudications was 660, the number of trust deeds and deeds of composition and arrangement are computed to have been more than 8,000. But why is it that in cases of insolvency creditors are content to put up with the imperfect relief of the trust deed, where they have no supervision by the law, no power of examining the debtor, no stringent authority for compelling the investigation of accounts? The answer is, partly the expense, partly the immense inconvenience, partly the stringent provisions of the bankrupt law, which are founded upon great inhumanity as well as great want of policy—all these things together conspire to induce the creditor to prefer the trust deed, imperfect as it is, to proceedings by adjudication in bankruptcy. But will it not be just still to allow the creditor to make his election, while at the same time you give him the whole benefit of the bankrupt law? I have endeavoured to accomplish that object. If a debtor is desirous of meeting his creditors, and of giving up all his property by deed of composition, arrangement, or assignment, he will be enabled to do so, and will have for a certain period of time a secure opportunity afforded him for that purpose—secure, I mean, against the intervention of a creditor who may destroy the whole plan by procuring an adverse adjudication in bankruptcy. But I give this privilege to the debtor only upon certain conditions, which are that the deed of arrangement and composition shall be brought into the Court of Bankruptcy and registered there; that he shall pay for that registration the sum, and only the sum, which he would have paid for an adjudication in bankruptcy; and that as soon as the deed is registered the debtor, the trustees and the creditors shall at once be placed in the same relative position as if the debtor had been adjudicated a bankrupt, and the trustees had been duly appointed his assignees. They shall have all the benefit of the bankrupt law. They may resort to it to the extent to which they may need its interposition, while, as to the debtor, there will be no reproach, no obloquy, no public proceedings, save so far as publicity may be requisite to the creditor. The creditors may resort to the Court of Bankruptcy to secure the examination of any person whose evidence they may require. In this way the whole law of bankruptcy will be at once incorporated with the law which regulates the relations of debtor and creditor and trustees; and the administration of the estate will go on, the creditor knowing that he may at any time invoke the interposition of the Court, and derive the same advantage as though there had been an actual adjudication in bankruptcy. The benefit to the creditor and trustee by this arrangement will be exceedingly great, because if a question arises involving matters of legal controversy, power is given to the creditors and parties interested to state a case for the opinion of the Judge in bankruptcy, and they will accordingly receive the aid of the Court, and get the matter decided by the Judge, thus deriving the same advantage from the tribunal as if they were actually and legitimately within its walls in the position of bankrupt, assignees, and creditor. The importance of this particular part of the Bill in regard to the cost of proceeding cannot well be over-estimated. At present, among the principal sources of the revenue of the Court is a most injurious and oppressive tax, levied in the shape of a percentage upon all the estates brought into the Court. Power was given by the Bill of 1849 to tax every estate administered in bankruptcy with a percentage varying from one-eighth of a pound up to £5 per cent. Any rate between these two termini which the commissioner may deem proper to inflict upon the estate, according to the exigencies of the case, he has the power of imposing. The result therefore is that every large estate has of necessity been driven out of the Court of Bankruptcy. If you could by any possibility avoid it, you would never go to the Court to administer an estate which produced assets of £100,000 or £200,000; and the small estates, again, though subjected to a smaller percentage, suffer from the system to such an extent that but little is left for the creditors. The revenue of the Court of Bankruptcy is in this position:—In 1858 the percentage levied by the official assignees in the manner I have described was £41,407 12s., but in 1859 it was only £29,922, showing an immense falling off in the business. The stamp duties, in like manner, in 1858 were £21,201, but in 1859 they yielded only £13,850. In fact the Court of Bankruptcy would itself have been bankrupt had it not been for a very fortunate provision made in 1831, in the appointment of official assignees, who at once applied themselves with great industry to recover and get in estates which had been lost sight of and neglected under the antecedent administration in bankruptcy, and who succeeded in recovering many hundred thousands of pounds. This money was invested in the Bankruptcy Court, and then, there being another provision that all the monies when received from the estates, and prior to the declaration of any dividend, should be paid into the Bank of England, there arose of course a large amount of floating balances, which the Accountant in Bankruptcy deals with in much the same way as corresponding balances are dealt with by the Accountant General in Chancery. He invests, from time to time, under the orders of the Court, all sums of money not absolutely needed; and in this way the Bankruptcy Court derives a revenue, which in 1858 amounted to £49,605. That fund, however, has been drawn upon in order to meet and supply the deficit arising from the failing revenues of the Court, and, accordingly, the interest of that fund in 1859 was only £46,170, showing a diminution of £3,500. These are the three principal supplies to meet the expenses of the court, which will be found set forth in a Parliamentary paper of the 14th February, 1860. The whole expenditure of this Court during 1859 amounted to £82,459. But in this sum are included compensations and retiring annuities to the amount of £20,200. These compensations are the penalty paid for errors made in the construction of the court in former times, which errors we were obliged to atone for by keeping up the salaries of persons previously engaged in the administration of bankruptcy, but displaced by the reforms subsequently introduced. These retiring annuities for the offices of Patentee of Bankrupts, the Clerk of the Hanaper, and the Lord Chancellor's officers in bankruptcy will be thrown into the funds of the court, and be no longer a charge on the suitors. Why should the present suitors pay for the errors of a former time? My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has most judiciously consented to transfer the sum of £20,200 on account of these retiring annuities to the Consolidated Fund. This will be a relief to the same amount to the funds of the Court of Bankruptcy; nor can the charge endure for a very long time; though I have certainly found that sinecurists live for an indefinite period. The relief thus given to the funds of the court will enable it to diminish considerably the charges on the suitors. There will be abundant funds for the ordinary wants of the court, and it will be enabled to remove all fees, except those on registration and adjudication. As to registration, in cases where the estate is under £1,000, the registration fee will be £5; if above £1,000 and under £3,000, it will be £10; if above £3,000, it will be £15. The average of these fees will be £10. I propose to abrogate at once all the percentage fees paid on the amount of estates, and to reduce all the fees paid to the court to the smallest possible amount. The expense of an application to the court will, in point of fact, be little, and that expense the creditors themselves will have the power of controlling and checking by their own inspection. This will be a great benefit to those who are now deterred from seeking the aid of the law by the expense of the proceedings. There is one charge for remuneration to the Bank of England for keeping the account of the court; it is £3,160 a year, and sometimes more than that; yet I find by the quarterly return of the balances of cash that the account of the court shows a balance of not less than £60,000 in the hands of the Bank. I think that holding that balance is of itself an abundant remuneration, and I therefore propose to discontinue this payment. These are a few of the changes that I hope will greatly relieve the suitors in the Court of Bankruptcy. I proceed now to state the mode of procedure to be adopted by the court, and to describe particularly the relative positions of the official assignee and the creditors' assignee. An adjudication will be made immediately the petition is presented, but in case of a contested adjudication, a period of not less than three days, and not exceeding seven, will be allowed to elapse; that interval, however, will not interfere with the measures to be taken for the preservation of the property of the estate. An official assignee will be appointed to the estate, who will be charged with that duty. At present there are persons employed in the court, such as accountants, auctioneers, and messengers, who each demand, and each receive fees, according to the ancient and cumbrous system. I propose to abolish the messengers altogether. What a messenger does is this—he hires a man for 3s. 6d. a day, who does the work, and he charges I know not how much for what his deputy does for 3s. 6d. I have here a return of the profits of the messengers of the court that really makes one's mouth water, considering what they do. The fees leave a very considerable income after defraying the expense of the deputies. One gentleman returns his profits in one year, for doing nothing, as £1,296; another, £1,361; another, still more fortunate, £1,767. I have taken the figures as they first meet my eye; others might be found still higher. This expense will be entirely done away with. The official assignee will have the charge and custody of the estate up to the appointment of the assignee under the adjudication. Many burdensome charges will be taken off the estate; it will be in the power of the creditors' assignee to go to the Judge in chambers and obtain the necessary authority to keep open the trade, carry on the business in which the bankrupt was engaged, and prevent the necessity of breaking up the establishment; he will keep things in the condition required for the payment of the creditors, till they shall have the power to speak for themselves. The Bill proceeds on the principle that the estate of the debtor belongs to the creditor. If, at the meeting of the creditors, they determine to go on with the bankruptcy, an assignee will be chosen. Then comes the question, what is the position of the official assignee relative to the creditors' assignee? There has been much controversy on the point, and I have been pressed to remove the official assignee. Now, the position in which they at present stand is that they are the only persons who can receive and give a discharge for money. This has been found very convenient in one respect, because it has, as I have already observed, tended to create that large and floating balance in the Bank of England—a balance which has enabled the Bankruptcy Court to hold its head above water. It has, however, been justly complained that the official assignee reduces the creditors' assignee to a mere cypher; that he usurps all his functions, and that the creditors are, as it were, through their appointed organ, displaced and removed from their proper position. Now, in order to obviate the objections to the continuance of that state of things which exists, I am about to make a proposal, which I trust the House will duly weigh, and which I have no doubt will form the subject of a great deal of discussion when the Bill goes into Committee, should it reach that stage. I propose, then, immediately on the selection of the creditors' assignee—supposing the creditors should determine to choose an assignee from among themselves, or apart from their own body—the official assignee shall be bound to render to him a full and particular account of all his receipts and payments, and to hand over the whole of the property of which he has taken possession. I propose, however, that immediately afterwards the official assignee shall stand in the position of auditor of the accounts of the creditors' assignee, and to impose the obligation on the creditors' assignee of paying all the moneys he may receive into the Bank of England. That I look upon as a wholesome and a necessary precaution; and there is one great benefit which will, I think, result from the change. At present, the official assignee is trusted in all things; but I am sorry to be obliged to say that experience shows us the folly of trusting any person whatsoever implicitly and without check; for during the comparatively short period of time that official assignees have discharged their present functions, defalcations have been discovered—I say discovered, because what the actual amount of those defalcations may be it is impossible to know—to the extent of £110,000 or £120,000. I further propose to introduce into the Court the great invention of printing, which has been so slow in finding its way into the administration of the law, that even at the present moment we still use instead of printed deeds, that cumbrous, inconvenient, and expensive parchment—for I will undertake to say that one-fourth of the existing litigation would be avoided if the mode of ascertaining the contents of deeds and their accuracy and of rendering one's self familiar with their contents, were made more easy by the course which I suggest. I propose, therefore, in conformity with that opinion, and with the mode of proceeding adopted by railway and other incorporated companies, that the creditors' assignee shall render periodical accounts of the whole of his receipts, the payments he has made, and all the other circumstances relating to the estate; that these accounts shall be audited and examined by the official assignee; that immediate recourse shall be had to the registrar or the Judge, if any question should happen to be raised thereon; that the accounts shall be vouched by the creditors' assignee; and that the official assignee shall be charged with the duty of seeing that all moneys that have come into the hands of the creditors' assignee have been faithfully paid into the Bank as soon as they have been received. I propose, moreover, that printed copies of those accounts when audited, in the form of a balance sheet of the bankrupt's estate, shall be sent through the post to every creditor, so that very shortly after the bankruptcy, printed accounts in the common form of those used by railway companies will be placed in the hands of each creditor, without calling upon him to travel outside his door, or to employ an attorney to ascertain how the estate is being administered. I ought to have stated that, in order the more expeditiously to effect this object, I have made provision that when the creditors are ascertained, a printed list of the names of those who have a claim to the amount of £10 shall be sent to each creditor. By these means I think the efficient discharge of his duties on the part of the creditors' assignee will be secured. He will be kept in check by the official assignee, and the creditors themselves will find in the antagonism which will exist between those functionaries, that due regard is paid to their interests. With respect to the emoluments of the official assignees, I may say I do not think it would be right that those gentlemen should be allowed to suffer materially by the change in the law which I am about to introduce. I propose, therefore, in conformity with the recommendations of the Commission over which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University presided in 1853, to give to each of these official assignees, independently of office expenses, an annual and certain salary of £800 a year, with power to the Judge to augment that salary according to the work done up to a maximum of £1,500 per annum; and I have no doubt that if the quantity of business which I anticipate should be transacted under the new system, the official assignee may safely reckon on receiving a liberal recompense for the amount of duty which he may be called upon to discharge. That being so, I trust some security will be afforded for the faithful rendering and administration of accounts in bankruptcy. I shall now proceed to state the proposal which I desire to make with regard to another power which I think it is expedient to confer upon the creditors in case it should appear to them that the estate in which they happen to be interested should be capable of being better administered and dealt with in a more simple and economic form. I propose in the first place that, in a case in which the assets are found not to exceed a sum of £1,000, a certain majority of the creditors may, if they think it right to do so, transfer the administration of the estate to the County Court. Probably, if I succeed in reducing the expenses in bankruptcy to the extent which I am sanguine enough to hope will be the case, this power will seldom be exercised; but I have nevertheless deemed it desirable to make provision for it in the present Bill. The County Courts have, I may observe, got an ample staff, including a treasurer, to perform all the functions which are discharged by the official assignee and the registrar in bankruptcy. The next point to which I beg leave to call the attention of the House is another great reform of the law, to which I trust it will give its assent. Hon. Members are well aware of the strange admixture which exists in bankruptcy of civil and criminal law. You have here got a criminal jurisdiction of a most singular character, because it is a jurisdiction which treats the bankrupt as a criminal without at the same time giving any definition of his offence. Nothing more, in fact, is given in these cases than a mere description of moral misconduct, extravagance, recklessness, and a general want of prudence. I find from the returns before the House that on the subject of the classification of certificates, the Commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy have exhibited this remarkable variety in their adjudications:—Commissioner Evans, out of 479 applications for certificates made in five years, only granted 17 first-class certificates, or one in 28; Commissioner Fonblanque, out of 453 applications in the same five years, granted 31 first-class certificates, or about one in 14; Commissioner Fane, out of 653 applications, granted no fewer than 161 first-class certificates, or one in less than four. How is it possible that there can be any kind of consistency or keeping in the administration of the law, or in the principles by which it should be regulated, when we see such a difference in the adjudication of these functionaries? In the other two courts I find first-class certificates given in about one case in every eight and one in every eleven. This is a most painful exhibition of the uncertainty attending the administration of justice. If we were to contrast the proceedings of the courts in the country with that of the Judges of Appeal in Bankruptcy we should find a still more painful extent of inconsistency and contradiction. The system is all the more injurious because it leads to a great amount of litigation and discussion on the application of the bankrupt. Hence those long examinations we frequently see in the daily papers; hence, also, those appeals from the courts of first instance to the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and the continual reversal of decisions given in the court below. This is a great blot on our institutions. If you please, make your criminal law with regard to any fraudulent contracting of debt as stringent, as severe, as is compatible with the object of the criminal law; but let there not be that which is neither law nor certain justice—a most painful, indefinite amount of discretion, realizing the old reproach, that the bankrupt's conduct is measured and determined according to the length of the Commissioner's foot. I propose to lay down rules, to be strictly applied by a court of criminal jurisdiction, to reserve to the Court of Bankruptcy in which the bankrupt is prosecuted the power of suspending his discharge, and to make the suspension of the discharge co-extensive with the punishment inflicted on him. These are the principal provisions of the Bill on the subject of certificates. In deference to the expressed opinions of others, I propose to embody clauses which will provide for the case of a debtor who commits an act of bankruptcy, giving his creditors, in case of his death, the same power of administering his estate in bankruptcy as if he had remained alive. I confess that I do not myself see any necessity for this change. At present, in consequence of the improved administration of the Court of Chancery, the estate of a deceased debtor may be administered there in the simplest and most expeditious way, at an amount of cost very little exceeding 5 per cent on the amount of his debts. I do not enter on other details of the Bill, having already made pretty large demands on the time and attention of the House. I trust that if the House shall agree to read it a second time the Bill will receive a searching investigation in committee, where I shall look for a very great improvement of its details, with a view, I trust, to the establishment of a simple, uniform, expeditious, and economical system—a system somewhat corresponding to our position as the greatest mercantile nation in the world. I hope the House will permit me to fix a day before the Easter recess for the second reading. I do not anticipate there will be much discussion on the second reading, but a great amount of laborious attention will have to be given to the details in the Committee, and it will be most desirable to have the Bill sent up to the other House by the beginning or middle of June. The House will observe that the winding-up of joint-stock companies has been omitted from this Bill. That is a subject of a very comprehensive nature, on which the Lord Chancellor has introduced a Bill which has passed the other House and come down here, and of which I propose to move the second reading one day next next week. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he sincerely congratulated the country and the House that this great question—this long-promised, long-desired, and much-needed measure, had at length been undertaken by the Government, which—should the Bill be found, as he declared with unfeigned sincerity, his belief that it would be found, entitled to public support and approbation—had the power to carry it through both Houses of Parliament. He also congratulated the House and the country that the Government had been assisted—he might say represented—on this occasion by his hon. and learned Friend, whose abilities and long experience well fitted him to undertake this great and important measure. It would be inconvenient at that stage to enter at any length into the consideration of a Bill that presented so much that was worthy of praise, and so little that was open to censure or even to criticism. He would advert, however, to one or two points for the purpose of directing the attention of his hon. and learned Friend to them, for he felt that at the proper time they would merit serious consideration in their minutest details. He heard with great satisfaction that it was intended, at whatever cost and sacrifice, entirely to put an end to the present Bankruptcy Courts. He did not know precisely what system would be adopted in the provinces; but in expressing his entire concurrence in the abolition of the existing Court of the metropolis, he would venture to detain the House for a moment, when he reminded them of the long and consistent opposition which an analogous measure experienced in former years; he alluded to the measure which abolished the Ecclesiastical Courts, and led to the institution of the Probate Court, and for which measure they were also indebted to his hon. and learned Friend. For four years in succession, during which that measure was in one form or another before that, or the other House of Parliament, many persons, including himself, earnestly warned the Government of the day against attempting to pass any measure for the establishment of a new court of justice for the administration of a separate branch of the law, without introducing a system of common law procedure. He did not know what was the framework of the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend in reference to the mode of conducting the business of the new Court; but he would venture to throw out a suggestion as to the expediency, not to say absolute necessity, of investing this new Court with powers of ex officio examination of witnesses in open court, and of trial by jury where necessary, and the other portions of the procedure in the common law Courts, which had been introduced into the Probate Court, so that the country might be satisfied the new tribunal would possess the jurisdiction both of a Court of Equity and of a Court of common law. Subject to these suggestions, he doubted not but the scheme of the Government would, with suitable machinery, greatly improve the state of the law in what was, in this commercial country, perhaps its most important branch. He collected, from the statement which they had heard, that the Bill likewise aimed at entirely abolishing the distinction between traders and non-traders, so that their liability to the Bankruptcy laws, as well as those affecting the general relation between debtors and creditors should be precisely the same. He trusted that one of the great results of the measure would be, that the estates of insolvents might be administered with satisfaction to their creditors, in many, perhaps in most cases, without a resort to the Court of Bankruptcy at all. But it should be remembered that serious difficulties beset the proposal for now bringing for the first time within the operation of the Bankruptcy laws all classes of persons who might be included under the category of non-traders. It was easy to deal in that manner with commercial men, who could not long absent themselves from their places of business, without, in substance, committing an act of bankruptcy. But unless great care was taken in applying the same rule to all classes of persons, rich and poor—he knew not whether Peers were made subject to the Bill—much practical mischief and injustice would be inflicted. Much caution would be required, for example, in the first step, by which they should declare bankrupt private gentlemen accustomed to a country life, and wholly unacquainted with commercial habits, and who, while travelling abroad—not for a week or a month, but for years together—might perhaps have left ample sums in the hands of their agents to meet their obligations, and yet not know what was going on at home in regard to their affairs. Unless caution were exercised, this provision, he feared, might introduce infinite mischief and injustice to an entire class of persons. He understood that his hon. and learned Friend, so far from wishing to abolish the office of official assignee, intended to bring that functionary prominently forward, as a person of great importance under this Bill; but he also intended, as he understood, to associate with the official assignee, in all cases of bankruptcy or of voluntary liquidation, a creditors' assignee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: After the proposed change, the estate of the bankrupt would be in the hands of the creditors' assignee.

SIR FITZROY KELLY: As he understood, after the adjudication in bankruptcy, there was to be an official assignee and a creditors' assignee; but it was to be in the power of a certain proportion in number and value of the creditors to withdraw the proceedings altogether from the Court of Bankruptcy, and to convert them into a process of voluntary liquidation.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: The official assignee would hold the bankrupt's estate until the creditors' assignee was appointed, but then he would give way to this latter person; remaining, however, for the purpose of receiving and auditing the accounts of the creditors' assignee.

SIR FITZROY KELLY: The question whether the creditors' assignee should take the place of the official assignee, or should act with him, was one on which great difference of opinion existed, and which would, no doubt, be open to careful consideration in Committee. He came now to the consideration of a more important question—how estates were to be managed in cases where there had been a bankruptcy, and subsequently the matter had assumed the form of voluntary liquidation; and also in cases where there had been no bankruptcy, but the creditors had agreed on a scheme of liquidation, and where the Bankruptcy Court should only be resorted to in case of necessity or to enforce the arrangement agreed on. He thought that the way in which such cases were to be dealt with was by far the most important point in a bill of this kind. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had alluded to the vast disproportion there existed between the number of bankruptcies as compared with voluntary liquidation. Upon this head he (Sir F. Kelly) would take leave to remark that no system of bankruptcy, no system of law between debtor and creditor could be complete unless it were founded on the maxim which lay at the bottom of the whole question—that when it was once clear that a debtor was insolvent his creditors should have legal omnipotence and should have the entire management and control over his estate. Whether in the case of an insolvent debtor the first step should be taken by the debtor, or by a creditor, or by the body of the creditors, it was essential that, without passing through any court, the debtor and the creditors should be brought together, and if they could agree on a scheme of liquidation that that scheme should be carried into practical effect, with no other reference to the Bankruptcy Court than for the purpose of giving effect to the resolutions and acts of the creditors. He should look with anxiety to see whether in such a case the Bill gave full power to the creditors to act for themselves. Again, it was a very essential question whether, in case the creditors should wish to effect a complete liquidation and winding up of the affairs of the bankrupt, without reference to the Court of Bankruptcy, they would be allowed to vest the estate of a debtor in assignees or trustees of their own nomination, without having thrust upon them, against their will and possibly against their interests, the services of an official assignee. With regard to the "dead clauses," he was happy to hear, on such high authority, that in the Court of Chancery estates of deceased persons could be wound up at an expense of only about 5 per cent; for if that were so there would be nothing to do but to adopt that course. He wished to say one word upon the commercial question. In every measure of bankruptcy, in every report of a Commission or a Committee for some years past, the very first difficulty stated to stand in the way of reform was the great charges now imposed upon bankrupts' estates, originally amounting to £40,000 a year, but now, he believed, reduced to about £20,000, and which he rejoiced to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer has now consented to charge upon the Consolidated Fund. These charges were on account of a number of officers who were in office twenty, thirty, and even thirty-five years back, and who had no more claim in justice on the estates of bankrupts of the present day than on those of any individual Member of that House; and, under these circumstances, one could not but wonder that such an abuse had so long existed. He thought it very creditable to the Government that they had determined to put an end to this most flagrant abuse. He believed it would be only the beginning of a system of economy at which every one who had the misfortune to be interested in the estate of a bankrupt or an insolvent would have reason to rejoice. He scarcely understood, even from the luminous statement of his hon. and learned

Friend, the connection between this Bill and the measure for the winding-up of joint-stock companies; but he could not refrain from expressing his opinion that the laws affecting the distribution of the estates of individuals and of companies ought to be made substantially alike. The latter was no doubt a question of great difficulty and complication, but unless the two Bills were prepared together there would be great danger of inconsistency between the two measures. Great inconsistencies were fatal blots in legislation. It was essential that both measures should be substantially the same, and that they should work together in entire harmony one with the other. These, however, were matters of detail which must be looked to in Committee. In conclusion, he begged leave to thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for the great attention which, in the midst of his numberless avocations, he had bestowed upon this subject, and to assure him that he should have his most hearty concurrence in his endeavours to render this measure worthy of the country and of the reputation of the learned and distinguished man who had introduced it into Parliament.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he rose to thank his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for the consummate ability, the unrivalled industry, and the great courage which he had evinced in the preparation of the Bill which he had just submitted to the House. The subject was so vast, and the legislation which had taken place on the subject was so intricate, that the administration of the law of bankruptcy in our jurisdiction had become a scandal to the nation. No Judge, scarcely any lawyer, could tell what the law was, or, such was the infinite variety of acts upon this subject, where to look. There had been three or four consolidations, or rather attempts at consolidation, of the bankruptcy laws, so that the most painstaking Judges were at a loss where to find the last subsisting enactment. As to the practical administration of the law, the hon. and learned Gentleman had not at all exceeded the actual facts in what he said about the Commissioners in Basinghall Street. How happened it that there was a large disparity between bankruptcies and composition deeds—between matters before the public court and private arrangements? It happened because the commercial men of the first commercial state in the world had no confidence whatever in the manner in which the law was administered. One Bankruptcy Commissioner sat in open court, another in a private room; one day a Commissioner gave his decision one way, the next another Commissioner decreed in a manner the very reverse of his brother functionary; witnesses were examined in private rooms, subjected to the most important examinations without the presence of a Commissioner, and submitted to all sorts of interrogatories; important matters were going on in Court whilst, as the Attorney General said, the Commissioner was sitting with a newspaper in his hand, and exhibiting the most sublime indifference. As to the question of expense, it did not seem to be at all considered that the estate was for the benefit of the creditors, but was looked upon as a carcase upon which vultures were to gorge themselves—official assignees, messengers, brokers, auctioneers, accountants. All who were engaged in commerce shunned the Bankruptcy Court. As to private arrangements, he reminded the House that there were dishonest and unjust creditors as well as dishonest and unjust traders. A trader who had struggled through misfortune, and had placed his estate before his creditors, who had been guilty of no dishonesty, might yet be forced into bankruptcy by some dishonest creditor who got hold of some bill of exchange, and who, by the terror of bankruptcy, sought to extort money from the debtor, his relatives, or the creditors, and thus to ruin an estate which, if privately administered equitably for the advantage of all, would have yielded a fair dividend to every creditor. He approved, therefore, of that portion of the Bill which facilitated voluntary arrangements without the interference of the Court. He also approved of the abolition of the distinction between trader and non-trader, and, to meet the difficulty suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir F. Kelly), he would venture to point out that a man was only to be adjudged bankrupt in case it should be shown to the satisfaction of the Judge that he was abroad for the purpose of absconding, or of avoiding payment of his debts. And what could be a greater disgrace than that a man should live abroad and defy his creditors in England to touch his estates? With reference to the application of the new law in the country districts, some defects in the Bill might be remedied in Committee. It seemed to him that the bankruptcy laws should not be subject to Commissioners sitting at Liverpool, Leeds, and Bristol; and this was a part of the measure to which the attention of the House should be directed. He believed, too, the County-Court Judges were not the persons to have this jurisdiction committed to their care.

MR. BOWYER said, he could not let the Motion pass without expressing a fear that the bankruptcy laws could not properly be applied to persons who were not traders. He thought when the matter came to be more fully considered, it would be seen that the principles and policy of the public laws upon which the bankruptcy laws were founded, and the stringent powers given to the Commissioners, were not applicable to persons who were non-traders. The great power which the Court of Bankruptcy possessed of dealing with entailed estates, estates under settlements and reversionary interests, would, he thought, be somewhat alarming to the landed nobility and gentry. In no country in the world was the law of bankruptcy applicable to persons who were not traders.

MR. MALINS said, he would congratulate the House and the country upon the fact that they were at length likely to scheme, to sweep away the distinction between the insolvent trader and non-trader. So far as the landed interest were concerned, he saw nothing in the measure that was calculated to give them alarm. The way to preserve their property was to conduct their affairs with prudence. If a man's expenditure exceeded his income, he must expect to get into difficulties; and whether he was gentle or simple, his property ought to become the property of his creditors, and the utmost facility should be given, as proposed by the Bill, for the creditors taking possession of that property. He should, therefore, give his strongest support to this part of the Bill. Indeed, he thought he should give his support to every part of it, for there was no part which did not meet with his cordial assent, and certainly none more than the proposal to sweep away all distinctions and classes of certificates, and to facilitate the obtaining a certificate or discharge under bankruptcy, in order as speedily as possible, which was the true policy of all laws, to restore the insolvent trader to the capacity of again trading and putting himself and family in a respectable position in the world. His hon. and learned Friend had stated that there would be an appeal from the country Commissioners to the Judge of the Court to be established in London; but he did not say whether there was to be any, and what, appeal from that Court itself. He apprehended, however, that provision would be made for that. [THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Yes, to the Court of Chancery.] He was glad to hear that. It was also proposed to preserve the Court in Portugal Street for the administration of small estates; but was his hon. and learned Friend aware that that Court at present existed without any right of appeal?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he proposed to give the right of appeal to the Chief Judge of the Court of Common Pleas.

MR. MALINS said, he was glad to hear that the hon. and learned Gentleman would likewise get rid of the anomaly which now enabled that Court to set all the tribunals in the country at defiance. He would give his cordial assistance in making this Bill a complete measure, and he hoped the Government would give every opportunity to his hon. and learned Friend in order that it might be passed this Session.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that his hon. and learned Colleague must feel gratified at the manner in which the important measure just explained to the House had been received on both sides. With regard to the double administration and double code applicable to trader and non-trader, he believed that the conclusion had long since been arrived at that they ought to be put an end to; but the question arose, how, in effecting that object, must they proceed with respect to acts of bankruptcy; and upon this point he conceived that the Attorney General, in determining boldly, had acted rightly. His hon. and learned Friend subjected the trader and non-trader to one tribunal. It was important that no unfounded alarm should find its way to the minds of country gentlemen and others, who were not connected with commerce; and he thought he might take upon himself to say that nothing would be found in the Bill to cause any just or reasonable apprehension amongst those classes on the ground that unwittingly, or by some unintentional omission, they might have their estates subjected to the administration of the new system of bankruptcy law. What was now proposed was, not that non-traders should be subjected to a new and unheard-of law; but that they should be brought under a single tribunal, which would administer the insolvent estates of all classes alike.

MR. BAZLEY said, he begged leave, on the part of the mercantile and manufacturing portion of the community, to thank the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for the very excellent measure he had proposed as an amendment of the existing bankruptcy law. He was glad to perceive that the Bill was founded on the great principle that the property of a bankrupt ceased to be his own, and belonged in reality to his creditors. He wished, however, to take that opportunity of urging on the hon. and learned Gentleman the expediency of devising some means for ensuring that the cash balances in the Bank of England should be as small as possible, and that assets should be divided among the creditors as soon as possible. As to the general provisions of the Bill, he hoped to see them speedily become the law of the land.

MR. MURRAY said, he would venture to suggest that the Bill should be made a model Bankruptcy Bill for all our Colonies. A firm in London often had a branch at Sydney, another at the Cape, and others perhaps in some distant parts; and, if it stopped, there was now an entire want of system in bringing the assets into one place, and dividing them fairly among the creditors. The local creditors harassed the parties and frequently got paid, so that by the time the London creditors transmitted their powers of attorney the assets were gone. He would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to extend the machinery of his Bill, so that creditors in England might derive equal benefit from bankrupts' property in the Colonies. This was the case in India under the Indian Act; and, if the assistance of the colonial legislatures could be procured, such an extension of bankruptcy jurisdiction would be most valuable. With regard to the unsatisfactory character of the present system, he believed that the Attorney General had understated the case. In administering the law there was the most marked difference between the practice of the Commissioners in granting certificates, and the anomalies which thus arose were much to be regretted.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he readily admitted that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had brought the subject under the consideration of the House with his usual clearness and ability. But it appeared to him that very serious objections existed to the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend that the distinction between bankruptcy and insolvency should be completely abolished. That distinction was founded on the very nature of the two cases. A trader, without the smallest fault upon his part was liable to be ruined at any moment by some unexpected commercial disaster; and the law therefore very properly provided that after he had surrendered all his property he should start again in life a perfectly free man, and should be entitled to all the future rewards of his industry. But the insolvent, or the non-trader, almost necessarily incurred his debts in consequence of his own thoughtlessness and extravagance; and he (Mr. Bouverie) believed the country would not endure that such a man should escape from every liability against his after-accruing property. That was certainly a question of great difficulty and importance; and he hoped that the House would not, without the most careful consideration, assent to the change proposed in the Bill. There was another point to which he would for a moment direct their attention. His hon. and learned Friend proposed to pay all the compensations under that measure out of the Consolidated Fund. But that would only be a return to the practice against which every modern Chancellor of the Exchequer had protested of adding interminably to the charges upon that fund. Besides there was at present a large sum, which yielded about £40,000 a year, upon which the suitors had no claims, and he thought that was a suitable fund out of which to pay the compensations, rather than adding them to the public burdens. He admitted some portions of the measure would be great improvements; but the House must not suppose that this or any change in the bankruptcy law would produce general satisfaction. Creditors lost so much money by bankruptcies that, under arrangements, there must be a great amount of dissatisfaction.

Mr. HADFIELD said, he very much doubted whether the time had not come when imprisonment for debt ought to be abolished altogether. He wished that greater facilities had been given by the Bill to private arrangements. But the main features of the measure would, he believed, be generally approved by the commercial community.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, expressed his thanks to the House for the favourable reception which it had accorded to the proposal which he had made, and his readiness to take into his consideration any suggestions which might be offered to him with a view to rendering it as perfect as possible. He admitted, in alluding to the observations which had been made as to a conflict of jurisdiction being likely to arise between the mother country and the Colonies, that the question was one which required further notice, and thought it was matter for regret that in China, where commercial transactions on so large a scale were carried on, the community there should be allowed to continue destitute of a law of bankruptcy and insolvency, and be in consequence obliged to avail themselves of the facilities afforded by the French and American tribunals. In conclusion he had only to express a hope that, considering the amount of discussion the subject would require, the House would permit him to fix the second reading of the Bill for that day fortnight.

CUSTOMS ACTS—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read: House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the chair.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER begged to propose an amended Resolution, reducing the duty on hops from the 1st of January, 1861 (not under treaty):—

"That on and after the 1st of January, 1861, in lieu of the Duty of Customs now chargeable on the article undermentioned on importation into Great Britain and Ireland, the following Duty shall be charged, viz.:—Hops, until the 1st of January, 1862, the cwt., 20s.; hops, on and after the 1st January, 1862, the cwt., 15s."

MR. DODSON said, he had given notice of an Amendment to leave out the words "Hops, on and after the 1st of January, 1862, the cwt., 15s.," and add the words "from and after which date the duty shall absolutely cease and determine," with the view of establishing perfectly free trade in hops; but on reflection, and after consultation with friends on whose judgment he relied he thought it desirable not to pledge the House to any prospective abolition of another source of revenue. With the permission of the Committee, therefore, he proposed to modify his Amendment, so as to leave the question to Parliament to determine, whether there should be any and what duty on hops on and after the 1st of January, 1862. The Excise duty on hops was peculiar and oppressive to the producer, and he wished to remind the House that this duty and the Customs' duty on hops were inseparably connected, and that they must stand or fall together. The Excise duty on hops was levied, not on the hops used in the manufacture of beer, but on the hops actually produced. In some seasons the production exceeded the consumption. The consequence was that the producer paid frequently out of his own pocket duty on hops that were not consumed. He could give numerous objections to those duties, but he would refer those who wished to obtain a good knowledge of the question to a pamphlet written by Mr. G. P. Bacon, Secretary to the Society for Promoting the Repeal of the Duty on Hops. The Excise duty was peculiar, because the consumption of hops was strictly limited by the operation of the malt duty; but owing to the uncertain nature of the crop, the amount of hops produced was uncontrollable. The only element under control was the extension or reduction of the acreage; but even that was most inefficient. In 1852, 46,000 acres yielded five times as large a crop as 54,000 acres in 1854. The result was that by no fault or improvidence on the part of the producer more hops were produced than were required for the consumption of the year, and as the Excise duty was levied, not on the manufactured article, not on the hops which found their way into the brewer's vat, but on the raw material at the source of supply, the producer had to pay out of his own pocket a duty on the quantity in excess. He contended that this was contrary to all the doctrines of political economy. The average Excise duty paid upon each acre of land in England during a period of twenty-two years was £16 16s. 3d. In 1855, when there was a large crop, the average in Sussex was between £14 and £15 per acre, and yet that land was not let for more than 10s. per acre; consequently, the Excise exacted a duty amounting to between twenty-eight and thirty times the rent of the land. Indeed he could go on preferring indictment upon indictment against the tax. Every element which went to make up a bad tax, was, in short, most ingeniously combined in the hop duty. It was said that the duty upon hops did not affect the consumer, but only the producer. That, however, was not the case. There was expended in this country £2,000,000 annually in the production of hops, and if they established free trade in hops, which was the object he had ultimately in view, and that amount was increased by half a million or a million, would not the consumers of beer, barley-growers, and maltsters be proportionately benefited? It would be equivalent to a reduction of the malt duty, and would give a stimulus to the growth of barley. He had a high authority for saying that the price of hops did affect the consumer of beer, the barley-grower, and the maltster. In 1854 the crop of hops fell short, owing to a blight, and the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, who then held that office, moved a Resolution to suspend half the Customs' duty on foreign hops for a year, expressly on the ground that if that course was not adopted the consumer would suffer by the high price of hops. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman was carried by a majority of three to one, and in the succeeding year the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Radnor (Sir G. C. Lewis), who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, confirmed the views which his predecessor in office had expressed. In opposition to the assertion of some hon. Members, he had the authority of Mr. Pressley, the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, for saying that the hop duty was a very elastic tax if judiciously and liberally reduced. In his evidence before the Committee, that Gentleman showed that in 1829 the duties on beer, malt, and hops brought £7,112,416 to the Exchequer, of which more than £3,000,000 were obtained from the beer duty alone. In 1857, the duty on beer having been abolished in the interval, the revenue from malt and hops alone yielded £6,402,984, or within half a million of the amount produced before the £3,000,000 of beer duty were swept away. Different Chancellors of the Exchequer had considered this subject, and had defended the duty solely upon the ground of the state of revenue at the time. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire had, indeed, gone so far as to describe the levying and collection of the hop duty as an enormous system of fiscal blundering, and not a word had been said in favour of the tax except by the right hon. Gentleman the present Home Secretary, who defended it on the ground that it was easy of collection. That might be a recommendation of a good tax, but it was no defence for a bad one, because the easiest system would be to resort at once to confiscation. The repeal of the duty would be attended with a great saving; the persons who collected it were not connected with the permanent Excise, but were employed upon that duty alone; there would, if the hop duty were abolished, be no further necessity for their services. The only reasons which he could assign for the maintenance of the duty so long were that it was a tax which was not supposed much to affect the consumer, and that the hop-growers were a small and weak interest, to whom Chancellors' of the Exchequer were not obliged to defer. If the hop-growers had brought their interest to bear upon the House with the same force with which the paper-makers, glass-blowers, and other bodies had presented their claims to consideration, he was satisfied that the hop duties would long ago have been swept from the statute-book. He, however, hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not look simply to the pressure which the hop-growers put upon him, but would consider the justice of their case. The duty was full of injustice and inequality, and therefore demanded his attention. He did not propose to embarrass the financial arrangements of the year by asking for the immediate abolition of the duty, nor ask to pledge the House prospectively to the abolition of another source of revenue. His moderate proposition was, that the right hon. Gentleman should take the duty for one year only, leaving it to a future Session—and probably a future Parliament—to determine in 1861 whether any or what duties should be levied on hops; and he hoped that by economy and retrenchment, together with the increased receipts from other sources of income, they would be enabled to dispense with this impost at the end of the year.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "in lieu of"

SIR BROOKE BRIDGES said, he rose to second the Amendment. It had been said the hop-growers were divided in their opinions regarding the objectionable character of these duties, but he could assure the House that there was a perfect unanimity among the growers, who formed a large portion of his own constituency. Their views were precisely similar to those of the constituents of the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the Committee. No one could deny that beer was the best beverage that could be had for both poor and rich, and, therefore, those who were producers of hops, malt, or any other article used in the manufacture of beer, were entitled to the consideration of the House. He contended that if, with due consideration for the interests of the revenue, any relief could be given, the hop-growers were entitled to receive it, and he hoped that the House would consent to the modest proposition now made. All the hop-growers asked for the present was that no duty should be fixed to continue upon hops, either Customs' or Excise duty, after the period mentioned in the Amendment, but that it should be left open to future consideration whether it would be desirable, after that time, to continue any duty at all.

VISCOUNT HOLMESDALE said, he wished to request the attention of the Committee while he pointed out one mode in which the existing Excise duty inflicted excessive hardships upon the hop-planters. It sent into the market at the same time a large quantity of hops; the merchants knew that the whole must be sold in order to enable the farmers to pay the duty; they took advantage of that fact and reduced their prices. Hops had recently been entered for exportation for the sake of the drawback allowed by the Excise, taken into the middle of the Channel, and there thrown overboard, the drawback being more than the price which the hops would have brought in the London market. With the exception of the duty on chicory, the hop duty was the only impost levied on the raw and unmanufactured produce of the soil, and what the growers wanted was that they should be relieved from the old-fashioned trammels of protection, and that the Customs' and Excise duties should be swept away together. It might be that in Kent hops would still pay the cost of production; but he believed that the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if carried into effect, would put an end to the cultivation of hops in those districts where, as in Sussex, hops of an inferior quality only were grown, and he would ask the Committee to think twice before they adopted a course which would create an enormous amount of misery among the population of that county.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, that many of his own constituents were engaged in the hop trade, and he did not agree that all the misfortunes of the hop-growers sprung, as the noble Lord seemed to think, from their customers. It was by the latter who purchased the hops that the duty was paid; and as they had large stocks on hand at the present time, it was most important to them that the reduction of the duties should be deferred until they had got rid of their existing stocks. There was generally great dissension amongst the various classes of hop-growers; and it was singular now to find that there was perfect unanimity. This, however, he presumed, had been brought about by the proposition that the English hop-grower was to pay 14s. per cwt., whilst the foreigner paid only 15s. He would support the proposition of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Dodson), but he did not see why hon. Gentlemen should not endeavour to obtain a fair differential duty, and it did seem extraordinary that the hon. Member for East Sussex should be so anxious to get rid of the 6s. differential duty which would exist between the proposed duties of 14s. and 20s. Why did they not propose to add the words "on and after the 1st of January, 1862, 20s. per cwt.," instead of 15s. He knew that by treating these matters as abstract questions they might arrive at any conclusion they liked, for such questions were very abstruse. They could not, however, be sure that in 1862 all these duties would be swept away altogether, and it was better not to leave the matter to chance. As to the propriety and justice of a differential duty of 6s., the hop-planter and the hop-merchant were in the same position. The proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that the duty should be paid on the 1st of January in each year; and if afterwards the hops sold badly there might be a loss not only of the cost of production but of the duty also. This duty was in addition to £26 an acre for cultivation, and other very heavy charges; whilst, on the other hand, the foreigner received the best consideration. The foreigner produced his hops at about half the expense which the Englishman paid. He was not going to use a protection argument, because of course that was quite wrong, but he wished to bring before the Committee the gross unfairness which would be perpetrated under the proposed system. Of course it would be said, if the foreigner could produce at a cheaper rate our own growers should not cultivate the article, whatever might be the effect on the labourer or the owner of woodland or anybody else from their ceasing to do so, and therefore he did not put that point forward, but he did say, "do not give that protection to the foreigner which you refused to your own people." The foreigner paid the duty only when he chose to bring the hops in, and beyond that he could bond them if he pleased, in this country, and pay the duty upon taking them out of bond when he sold them, while the Englishman was to be forced to pay the duty on the 1st of January. What he claimed from the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, that the Englishman should be placed upon the same footing as the foreigner. By obliging him to pay the Excise duty on his hops before they were sold, he would be deprived of the use of the money advanced for the duty, and therefore entitled to demand that a countervailing duty, representing his loss in that respect, should be placed on foreign hops. He had no doubt he should be told that these advantages to the foreigner were strictly in accordance with the principles of free trade; but as those principles were applied to his constituents they did not like them. They had heard so much about free trade that he almost began to fancy that it was an advantage to have a burden imposed upon you from which the foreigner was exempt. He repeated, he regretted that the hon. Member for East Sussex did not insist that the Customs' duty should remain 20s. against the British Excise duty of 14s.

MR. DEEDES said, he thought the Committee would be of opinion that the hon. and learned Member (Mr. John Locke) in the latter part of his speech, had very much answered the accusation which he had made against the Mover of the Amendment and his noble Friend. He had that night taunted the hop-growers with never having been in their present state of mind. He had told them that it was very desirable to maintain the Customs duty at 20s., instead of reducing it to 14s., and he had alluded to the difficulties which the foreign and home-grower would experience by the proposed Resolutions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But the hon. Gentleman had entirely forgotten the circumstances in which the English hop-growers had hitherto been placed. The Committee had not now to deal with the question whether the hops of East Kent were better than those of West Kent, but with a new system which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was about to introduce with regard to the sale of hops. Now, he believed that that system would put the hop-growers and also the hop-merchants, whose interests were identical to a great extent, in a very different position from what they were in before, and it was that difference of position which had led them to consider what was the best course to follow. If the hop-grower saw that such advantages were to be given to the foreign grower he might fairly ask himself this question: "What is likely to be my future position? Shall I be better off by sweeping away every duty of every description, or allowing the differential duty now proposed to continue." He believed that the hop-growers had taken a wise course in resolving not to embarrass the Chancellor of the Exchequer by asking him to come to a determination now, but at a future time to endeavour to bring things into such a state that they should be relieved from all duty, and have the whole world thrown open to them. What would be the consequence? Naturally, at first, that those persons who could only grow an inferior quality of hops must go altogether out of the market, and employ their capital in other pursuits, in case the foreigner was able to send in a better article here. But that would be better for them than to go on from day to day and hour to hour without knowing what their position was likely to be in reference to the article they produced. He had always objected to the system of credit. He thought that system one of the most unwise and impolitic that was ever proposed by a producer or sanctioned by a Chancellor of the Exchequer. His language had always been this—"Whatever the duty which may be put upon you by the Legislature there ought to be a fixed time when you should be called upon to pay; that you should then pay it; and that under no circumstances should there be a remission." He was of opinion, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done well in naming a day when all the duty should be paid in future. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman contemplated deferring that period from the 1st of January to the 1st of March, or two months later. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Only for one year]. He (Mr. Deedes) thought that it should be so as a general rule, and, if it were, it would not embarrass the right hon. Gentleman the least in the world, because it would bring the whole amount into his financial year, and would be only just towards the growers, as relieving them from the pressure of the buyers. The system of bonding had been offered to the foreign hop-grower and denied to the home producer. Now, when it had been stated in that House that the home-grower would be satisfied if he could bond his hops and pay the duty upon them when he found a market, the reply had always been that it would involve too large an outlay for warehouses, and that the system could not be adopted. He (Mr. Deedes) did not believe that there was any great difficulty in the matter, but that means might be found of bonding home-grown hops, the expense of which might be met by the bonders when he took them out, and without expense to the public. In this way equality would be established between the home and the foreign producer. On the part of the hop-growers of the district with which he was connected, he could state that they were ready and willing to stand the chance of perfect and entire free trade, to stand or fall by it whatever the result; and he found it difficult to imagine how a Government that was conducted upon the principle of free trade could say with positiveness, "we will not entertain this proposition." In point of fact the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman went no further than this, because it simply asked that after a certain time the subject should be disposed of by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hop-growers were fairly entitled to that consideration, and he hoped that those who felt an interest in the matter would give it that consideration, and that future Chancellors of the Exchequer would adopt that course towards the hop-growers.

VISCOUNT PEVENSEY said, that the question then at issue was, whether there should be free trade in hops as proposed by the hon. Member for Sussex, or a fixed protective duty as proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The House had had a Free-trade Budget and a Free-trade Treaty, both introduced under the right hon. Gentleman's auspices; and certainly the right hon. Gentleman had assumed a novel and somewhat curious attitude in not agreeing to an Amendment which was based upon those free-trade principles with which his name had been so long and so justly connected. Not only had he now come forward as the champion of a fixed protective duty—not only were the relative positions of the right hon. Gentleman and the British farmer reversed—not only was he the partizan of Protection whilst the British farmer was clamorous for free trade, but the right hon. Gentleman extended his Protectionist sympathies to the producer beyond the Channel, and proposed that when the foreign producer came here to compete with his English rival it should be upon conditions that were most advantageous to him and most disadvantageous to the English producer. He (Viscount Pevensey) wished to see the duties of Excise and Customs, so far as hops were concerned, altogether abolished; at the same time he was quite aware of the vast amount of competition which the home-grower would have to meet from the influx of foreign hops. It was impossible to forget what took place as the result of former reductions of the hop duty, first from £8 11s., then to £4 11s., and then to 45s. But in 1854, when the Customs duty was reduced to 20s. by Order in Council, the importation of foreign hops which followed caused a depreciation in the price of the home-grown article to the extent of from 40 to 50 per cent. With regard to the operation of the Excise duties, he would, by a few details, show most unmistakeably the extreme severity with which they pressed upon home-grown hops in low-priced districts. He would quote the case of the county which he had the honour of representing. The present quotation of the market value of Sussex hops ruled between 60s. and 80s. He would take first the maximum market value with the maximum cost of production, and then the minimum value of the produce with its lowest computation of the cost of cultivation. If the maximum cost of cultivation was put at £24 per acre, and the produce of that acre at 9 cwt., with the duty at 19s., or £8 11s. on the entire acre, the total cost of production, before the planter went into the market, would be about £32 11s. If the maximum market price was 80s., his produce would fetch under the present prices £35 10s., that is to say, a remunerative price of £3. But how stood the planter who only obtained 60s.? His cost of production would be £20, according to the evidence taken before the Committee in 1857; with the same average produce per acre and the same duty of £8 11s. he would pay £28 11s. in all; while with the sale of his hops at 60s. he would obtain £20, that is to say, he would sell at a dead loss of £8 per acre. If the tax was just in itself, it would be fairly argued that the agriculturist should turn his attention to other more profitable sources of income; but the fact was, that the tax itself was contrary to every condition of our present fiscal system, inasmuch as it taxed production, and did not affect in the remotest degree the interests of the consumer; and the justice of the plea of the planter consisted in the fact that if the Excise duties were removed, being in themselves unjust as well as severe, he would compete without fear, not only with the foreigner but with his own more favoured high-priced countrymen. He (Viscount Pevensey) would appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on another ground. The right hon. Gentleman, when advocating the repeal of the Paper Duty, spoke eloquently in favour of fostering and encouraging agricultural labour. How does the right hon. Gentleman put those doctrines into operation if he advocates the continuance of the Excise impost? From the year 1855 to 1859 the amount of acreage of hop-land under cultivation has fallen from 57,757 acres to 45,665. Perhaps the Committee will hear with surprise that this decrease of acreage within five years is almost equal to the entire amount of acreage now under cultivation in the whole county of Sussex and in the Weald of Kent. But what does the decrease of 12,000 acres represent in point of agricultural labour, which the right hon. Gentleman is so desirous of encouraging? Why, it represents the throwing out of a seasonable employment, at the lowest computation, 25,000 people. And what class is it that is thus driven from employment? They who compose it are not the able-bodied—they are not a class who could turn their attention to other employments; but they are the poorest of the poor—the weak and the aged—the woman and the child, who look to the pittance they gain in the hop-picking season as an important item in their slender means of livelihood. He (Viscount Pevensey) trusted the right hon. Gentleman in his zeal for the welfare of the agricultural population would think this point worthy of his consideration. He would not enter more fully into questions affecting the Excise duties, as they would be more conveniently discussed at a future period, but would assure the Committee, that if the Excise duty and other shackles which cramped the industry and enterprize of the English producer were abolished, he believed that our hop-growers would be able to come into the market and compete on fair terms with the foreigner. Under these circumstances, and considering the precarious and expensive nature of the crop, he hoped the House would not refuse to deal fairly and justly with the Excise duty when it came substantially before them, and still less, in the first instance, that they would not reverse so many decisions which they had arrived at in favour of the general principles of free trade, but would, by a large majority, express their concurrence in an Amendment which was founded on that free-trade principle which had been adopted as the basis of our modern commercial legislation.

MR. AYRTON said, he would vote against the Amendment. It was not a fair or legitimate way of raising the question involved. They were discussing the Customs duty on foreign hops, and that should be decided by the House first. The hon. Gentlemen opposite strongly opposed the income tax, which was the only means that enabled the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce any duties; they ought not to require the Legislature to make a gap in the revenue without suggesting a mode of filling it up. If the Amendment did not ask for the repeal of the duty on hops, it was a very idle one.

MR. DODSON explained. He had merely proposed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should take the duty for one year, and then leave it to the future.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the hon. Mover of the Amendment was mistaken in supposing that the reason the hop duty was maintained was because Chancellors of the Exchequer found it convenient. On the contrary, if the measure in this matter was to be the comfort of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the hop duty was one of the most troublesome with which he had to deal. Every one who had held the office would bear witness to the perseverance and pertinacity with which the hop-growers pursued their object—the repeal of the duty. The noble Lord opposite (Viscount Pevensey) had referred to former decisions of the House of Commons, and seemed to think the Amendment a re-affirmation of the principles of free trade. If he understood the proposition it really amounted to this—that because they were about to admit foreign produce on terms approaching equality, therefore, no Excise duty could be levied on the corresponding British commodity without violating the principle of free trade. If that doctrine were true it would be entirely fatal to the malt duty, which produced six millions, and to the spirit duties, which produced nine millions a year. The principle of free trade was one which was fully applicable when the duty was not for fiscal purposes, but not for the purpose of putting a fictitious price upon articles produced at home. Now with regard to the hop duty it was a remarkable thing that this House had never thought fit to pass a vote for the abolition of the duty. It had been resolutely asked for, and demands had been made for the repeal of the duty, and they had been energetically supported, but these demands had never been conceded by the House. No doubt there were objections to the duty, first, because it was an Excise duty, and those duties were not desirable; and next, it was an unequal duty, and bore unequally on the produce of one district as compared with the produce of another; but if it were compared with Excise duties generally, he could not say that it was more obnoxious than others, and it was less exceptionable to the course of trade than any other Excise duty. He thought no Gentleman would undertake to assert that the Excise law as applied to hops caused a decrease in the production of the article. It was also a mistake that the duty on hops cost a large amount in the collection, for the fact was that the charge in that respect was insignificant. It was, moreover, alleged that hopes were subjected to an undue burden with respect to tithes. That might be a reason for the Amendment of the law of tithe, but he must decline to furnish a receipt for tithes in reference to a charge on the public exchequer. The inequality of the duty, as bearing on the produce of one district as compared with that of another, was, he might add, to a great extent remedied by levying the tax upon the acre. It was, however, contended that the duty deprived the grower of his capital, and he admitted that the long period during which the hop-grower had hitherto been allowed to postpone the payment of the tax, afforded a stimulus in the production of hops to those who never ought to have been hop-growers; but when the duty came to be levied on the produce, at the time when in the ordinary course of business he was enabled to sell his hops, he could not conceive how the grower could under these circumstances be deprived of his capital. An hon. Member (Mr. Deedes) had argued that it was desirable the duty should be levied on the 1st day of March instead of the first day of January, but that was not the question under discussion, although he was not prepared to say that the 1st of January was the latest day which could be fixed for the purpose. He might also observe that great complaints were made that the effect of the proposal of the Government would be to give the foreigner an advantage which the English producer did not enjoy, and the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. John Locke) had contended that the proposed allowance of 6s. was a proof that to allow a smaller sum would be an injustice to the latter. He was of opinion, however, that the allowance of 6s. might be justified on the principle that when a considerable alteration in our fiscal laws was effected, bearing materially on different interests, it was as well to introduce that alteration in a manner as lenient as possible. Much stress had also been laid on the privilege of bonding which the foreigner would possess; but did any hon. Gentleman imagine that the producer in this country would pay an additional 1s. duty to avail himself of that privilege? [Mr. Dobson: Yes, I believe it.] It would be very strange if he were to do so, because that additional 1s. would represent something like 18 per cent. If, however, it could be shown that the foreigner who paid 15s., possessed an advantage over the English producer who paid only 14s., he was quite ready to admit that that was an inequality which ought not to exist; but he must candidly state that no deputation had waited on him to represent that the duty of 1s. over and above that which was to be imposed on the English planter did not afford full compensation for any advantages which the system of bonding might confer on the former. Again, it was alleged that the abolition of the hop duty was a proposal which ought to be supported, on the ground that beer would thereby be cheapened. Now, while he was prepared to admit that beer was a good sound national beverage, yet he must decline to accede to the abolition of the hop duty on the ground that the price of beer would be lessened. He might add that he felt quite assured no measure which the House had adopted or was likely to adopt could tend to impair the general fondness of the English people for that article. That, however, was not the question before the House, and he for one objected to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman behind him on the ground that it tended to affect the position of the House with respect to the revenue derivable from hops in a coming year. The question of the repeal of that duty was one, he might add, which was always open. The hon. Gentleman would be at perfect liberty to move for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the hop duties next year. The question was always open. What did he intend? To place these duties in an exceptional and peculiar position. The hon. Gentleman did not intend to give a pledge, but half a pledge, to repeal these duties. Was that a pledge which the House would give? He was quite at liberty to propose the reduction or abolition of any tax; let him by all means do so, and propose a substitute. A large portion of our revenue was made terminable next year. The House chose to make it so in order to strengthen its own constitutional control over the taxes, and upon grounds which were special and distinct. Did those grounds apply to the hop duty? Did the income tax and the hop duty stand on the same footing? The income tax was a special and powerful resource which had never yet been declared by the House of Commons to be a part of the permanent revenue. That question had been adjourned from time to time, and no Parliament or Minister had yet thought fit to face it. The income tax had always been granted from year to year, or for a very short term of years. It was totally different with the hop duty, which had existed for forty or fifty years, without any change at all, part of the permanent revenue of the country. The war addition to the tea and sugar duties was carefully defined for a period after the war, to create an expectation that when that period came Parliament and the Government would endeavour to remove it. No such consideration applied to the hop duty; there was no reason why it should be placed on a temporary footing any more than the duty on fire and marine insurances, the repeal or reduction of which was desired, and, he admitted, ought to be desired by the country. Were those duties, then, to be all made terminable next year? That would be a most imprudent course. Hon. Gentlemen opposite objected most resolutely to the financial proposals of the present year as throwing too heavy a burden on the finance of 1861; he trusted, therefore, they would feel the force of the appeal he now made to them, that they should not make a grievous and needless addition to the great mass of taxation that was already terminable. Such a course would shake public confidence, and even public credit. It was impossible for the Government to acquiesce in the proposal of the hon. Gentleman. It was in vain to say that it did not interfere with the financial arrangements of the year. The Government would not be parties to storing up needless embarrassments which were not required by any consideration of the public interests. Even if the hon. Gentleman were to succeed in the vote he proposed, that would not decide the main question, which was that of the Excise; and it would be the duty of the Government to persevere in resisting any vote whatever which might tend to establish this dangerous principle, so incompatible with the sound and solid administration of finance, that the Parliament of one year, on grounds alleged in a case like this, should decide what should be done nearly two years hence. He thought he had shown every disposition to accede to the wishes of Gentlemen connected with the planting and growth of hops. He had already made a reduction of 30 per cent on the duty, thereby sacrificing a revenue of £100,000, and given the English producer a differential duty of 6s. Any further possible accommodation he was prepared to give; but to abandon this duty for the service of the present year was impossible. For these reasons he felt bound to oppose the Motion of his hon. Friend in the form in which it was now put, and continue that opposition to it, whatever form it might subsequently assume.

MR. HARDY said, that it might be supposed from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that there was nothing done by the Motion relative to hops this year, and he told them it was an unprecedented proceeding to attempt to interfere with what was to be done in the matter of hops in the year 1862. Why did the right hon. Gentleman himself interfere? If he had been satisfied to take a Vote for this year alone, they would have contented themselves with a general Motion on the subject; but the right hon. Gentleman had dealt in the most remarkable way with the duty. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given no reason for the change he proposed in 1862, nor why a duty upon hops, which was, in fact, a tax on the raw produce of the ground, should be levied at all; nor, if it was to be levied, why the method he proposed should be adopted. The right hon. Gentleman was not asked to pledge himself to any course in 1862, but merely to leave it an open question. He (Mr. Hardy) had studied this question but recently, but he felt that it would be for the benefit of both the hop-grower and the hop-merchant, that there should be no duty whatever. But even this was not asked for at present, the hop-growers wanted only to have a fair field left open for the future. It was a very objectionable feature of the present duty that the same amount was paid upon low as upon high-priced hops. Was that a state of things that should be countenanced? There was scarcely any duty of a more fluctuating character than that upon hops. In 1839 it was £379,000, in 1840 it fell to £62,000, in 1841 it rose to £266,000, in 1846 it was £443,000, in 1849 it fell again to £145,000, in 1852 rose to £447,000; but in 1854 it fell to £86,000, and in 1855 rose again to the enormous amount of £728,000, while in 1856 it fell again as much as £300,000,—namely, to £480,000. These figures showed it was not a duty that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could at all calculate upon, and was not, therefore, to be viewed as a tax which it was desirable to keep as a permanent tax, for no fixed amount could ever be relied upon. It was a duty that pressed so heavily upon hop-growers that they had actually been known to take their hops out into the Channel, and to throw them overboard, merely for the purpose of getting the drawback upon them. From the manner, too, in which the duty was at present levied it was rendered one of an extremely objectionable character, for it actually made a good harvest of hops a disadvantageous thing to the grower. This had already been stated by a previous speaker; but as an incident confirming the fact he might add that in one of the hop districts when such a circumstance had occurred the clergyman of the parish had stated that it was impossible to have a thanksgiving because the crops were so abundant. Thus the gifts of Providence were by our laws turned into a curse, and careful and expensive culture ruinously burdened. The peculiarities attending this tax rendered it one of so burdensome a character to the farmer that the greater the crop the worse it was for him; for the production exceeding the consumption the farmer paid duty upon that which he could not sell, and therefore in many cases preferred allowing his hops to be blown away to becoming chargeable to the duty. By affirming the Amendment the Committee would be conferring an immense benefit upon the hop-growers, and doing nothing disadvantageous to the country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that so far from wishing to pledge the House to any course, he merely wished to leave this matter in the same position as any other duty, save that on tea and sugar, which was wholly exceptional. His own Resolution had contemplated merely the present financial year and its necessities, but it was at the request of the hop-growers themselves that he had proposed to legislate for 1862. The effect of the Amendment, if carried, would be to leave this, a question of taxation, in a state of doubt and uncertainty.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 138, Noes 104: Majority 34.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved, "That in lieu of the Duties now payable upon Ships with their tackle, apparel, and furniture, there shall be charged upon all Ships foreign built of wood, and upon all Ships built of wood in Her Majesty's Possessions abroad, on the Registration thereof as British Ships at any port or place in Great Britain and Ireland, the Duties of Customs following, that is to say—For every Ton of the gross Registered Tonnage of such Ships, without any deduction in respect of engine-room or otherwise, 1s."

CUSTOMS ACTS—REPORT.

Order read, for further Consideration of Postponed Resolution [13 reported 6th March]; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Resolution be now taken into further consideration."

MR. BALL said, he would appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to press the consideration of this subject at so late an hour (half-past 11).

MR. C. W. PACKE said, he would support this appeal.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that there was so much business before the House, and the Easter vacation would occur so shortly, that he was afraid he could not accede to this request.

SIR FITZROY KELLY, who had given notice of an Amendment, rose to address the House, amidst cries of "Adjourn, adjourn."

MR. DEEDES also made an appeal in favour of the postponement of the subject, observing that many Members interested in the subject had left the House with the understanding that it would not be brought forward at so late a period.

MR. LYGON moved the Adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 93: Majority 35.

Question again proposed, "That the said Resolution be now taken into further Consideration."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed that there were two Amendments on the business paper. The one, relating to raising the duty on foreign malt from 25s. to 26s., he apprehended could not, in point of form, be moved on the present occasion, and the other, which raised the question of the prohibition to the importation of foreign malt. It would be convenient to know whether either of these Motions was really intended to be debated, because the Customs Bill, after the sense of the House should have been taken upon some points connected with the paper duty, which followed pretty much in the train of the recent Vote of the House, would be in a condition to go forward, and there would be nothing else to delay it.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he had learnt from Mr. Speaker that he could not now move the Amendment of which he had given notice, to fix the duty on foreign malt at 26s. instead of 25s.

SIR BROOKE BRIDGES moved the Adjournment of the House, observing that this was an important question, especially to the agricultural interest. The Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to recollect that it had been stated that many Gentlemen had left the House not expecting the subject to come on.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that there were two questions involved. The Government had made an engagement not to lay upon the article imported any additional duty greater than the average of the duty to which the maltster was subjected by the Excise regulations here. They could not estimate this at higher than 25s. a quarter, and therefore, although the difference between 25s. and 26s. was small, it would be a breach of faith if they accepted the 26s. Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman. But if it were intended to raise a debate on the whole question of the admission of the foreign malt, as a question of principle, that debate might be taken as well in Committee, and then much time would be saved, for the Customs Bill might pass through the other stages first.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the question was a very important one to graziers and to growers of barley, as well as to the manufacturers of malt, and he therefore gave notice that, when the Report of the Committee on Customs was brought up, he should move to recommit the Resolution concerning malt.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

Motion and Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

Further Consideration of Resolution deferred till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, March 16, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Consolidated Fund (£4,500,000.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

THE LORD STEWARD acquainted the House, That HER MAJESTY had appointed To-morrow, at One o'Clock, to be attended with the Address of both Houses on; and a Message was sent to the Commons to inform them thereof; and that the Lords had appointed the LORD STEWARD and the LORD CHAMBERLAIN of the Household to attend HER MAJESTY and therewith on the part of this House; and to desire the Commons to appoint a proportionate Number of its Members to go with them.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Message from the Commons, that they had appointed Mr. BYNG, Mr. BAINES, The Viscount CASTLEROSE, and The Lord PROBY to go with the Lords (mentioned in the Message of this Day) to wait upon HER MAJESTY with the Address.

DIVORCES (IRELAND).

PETITIONS.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW presented a Petition from Inhabitants of Dublin praying that the Law relating to Divorce may be so Amended as to allow Irish Suitors to sue for a Divorce in the English Courts. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce any measure on this important subject.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE presented a Petition to the same effect from Rowan Francis Cashel, of Demarara, County Tipperary. The petitioner stated that he did not possess the means of prosecuting a Divorce Bill in their Lordships' House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that "justice to Ireland" required that the prayer of these petitions should be granted, although the larger portion of the population being Roman Catholics believed in the indissolubility of marriage, and so could not resort to the divorce clauses of the Act. But they might avail themselves of judicial separation, and the Protestant portion of the people were entitled to the full benefit of the new jurisdiction. He had himself introduced into the Bill of last year a clause enabling persons in Ireland to avail themselves of the provisions of that measure. That proposition had received very general support from the Irish Peers, but in the other House of Parliament it had raised a storm of opposition which rendered it impossible to carry such a proposition. He would support any Bill to extend the Act to Ireland, but could not undertake to re-open the subject on the part of the Government, and bring in a Bill for that purpose.

NAPLES.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH wished to put a question to the noble Duke the First Lord of the Admiralty. Very alarming reports were in circulation relative to the state of affairs in Naples. Those reports might be extremely exaggerated; but undoubtedly it was quite impossible that the state of things represented to be existing there could long continue. Among other things, the public were told that there was a considerable number of Her Majesty's ships in the Bay of Naples. Assuming these statements to be true, he wished to ask the noble Duke, Whether any special instructions had been given to the officers in command of those ships as to what their conduct should be in the event of individuals being driven by a sense of personal danger to claim their protection?

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, there could be no doubt that the state of affairs in Naples was lamentable. No special instructions, however, had been given to the officers of British ships which were stationed there for the protection of British residents and of British property. The rule with regard to reception on board Her Majesty's ships of persons in personal danger was not that protection would be afforded to persons flying from justice or desiring to escape the sentence of a court of law; but it had always, he believed, been held that the British flag did afford protection to any refugee flying for safety of life in any country, on account of his political opinions, either from the tyranny of Monarchs or the violence of a mob. Beyond that, officers receiving refugees on board their ships would, of course, not allow them while they were on board their ships to hold communication with their partizans on shore, but would simply give them that hospitality which humanity demanded and justified.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he was perfectly satisfied with the assurance of the noble Duke as he understood it—that the action of British officers should be confined to the performance of the duties of common humanity.

LORD REDESDALE: Surely what the noble Duke has said requires explanation. Does he mean to say that if a man is flying from high treason, he is to be protected on board a British ship, supposing he should be lucky enough to escape thither? Should we recognize such a doctrine, if a person charged with high treason were to take refuge on board a French ship of war lying in one of our harbours? Let us take care, my Lords, that we do not lay down doctrines because we are strong and Naples is weak. Let us take care that, whatever principles we lay down as to Naples, we should be able to assert and to enforce against all the world, and to maintain as to French harbours as well as Neapolitan.

VOL. CLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY would remind his noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty that a British officer might be placed in a very awkward position if he was called upon to judge as to the particular nature of the prosecution from which an individual might be trying to escape. A man might be escaping from political prosecution, or from a prosecution instituted in an ordinary court of justice by the constituted authorities. How was the British officer to know what was the case? A man came alongside a British ship in a boat with a pitiful story, and it would often be impossible for the commanding officer to know whether the individual was flying from such a prosecution as that to which the noble Duke alluded, or from one of quite another kind. He was certain we should not permit such a doctrine to be carried out in our ports.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: I laid down no principle; I confined myself entirely to what had been the practice of former years, and I took the precaution of looking back to the records of the Admiralty. If there is a revolution, and refugees of one party or the other come on board, they have been often received, though the officers, anxious to relieve themselves from responsibility, take the earliest opportunity of sending them away to a place of safety. That has been the practice as to political offenders. It has been followed repeatedly and in many instances. I limited myself entirely to what had been the practice. I did not pronounce any opinion as to what I thought ought to be the course pursued. As to whether a refugee is flying from political persecution or ordinary justice, our officers must judge for themselves in each case, consulting Her Majesty's Ambassador or Consul on the spot, on whose advice they will act.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I believe that no one doubts that this practice of giving hospitality to political refugees ought to be limited to periods of civil convulsion and revolutionary violence, and is not applicable to ordinary times, even although there may be some degree of disturbance. And I have not yet heard that there is any serious difference between the Government of Naples and the great mass of the people. I may disapprove of the system of Government pursued, but that is a question purely between the Government and its own subjects, and there is nothing at present which indicates a state of things in which alone British naval officers have a right to interpose. I hope, therefore, that the Government are prepared to lay this limitation on the principles they have laid down—that the interference of British officers ought to be limited to times of civil convulsion and revolutionary violence, and that they ought not to interpose under ordinary circumstances.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I understood the noble Duke to say that no special instructions had been issued to officers in command of ships. My Lords, I think that is quite right. It is impossible to foresee the circumstances that may arise, or to define beforehand in what cases protection should be given. It was one of the most difficult questions that a Government or an officer can have to decide. Undoubtedly there are some cases in which the very prospect of a refuge from the consequences of an unsuccessful attempt would have a tendency to encourage civil commotions. On the other hand, there may be cases of persecution and cruelty, in which common humanity may make it impossible to refuse shelter. It is difficult to define beforehand these cases; it is a matter for the exercise of a sound discretion; and looking at the past conduct of British officers, I think they have shown that they are well able to exercise such a discretion. I, for one, am content to leave the matter on the footing in which it at present stands, and hope nothing will be done to increase the difficulty of the position in which our officers are placed.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I rise to ask a question of the Government with regard to the papers laid upon the table yesterday, which respect the proposed annexation of Savoy and Nice to France; and especially with regard to the two remarkable despatches of Count Cavour, on the 3rd of March, and Earl Cowley, on the 9th of March last. In his despatch of March 3rd, Count Cavour states that he had received an assurance from the French Government of the most formal character that they would not proceed further with the annexation of Savoy, except under three conditions. The first was that no territorial changes should be effected contrary to the wishes of the people; next, that due regard should be had to the interests of Switzerland; and, lastly, that there should be a preliminary consultation of the great Powers. In the same despatch Count Cavour proceeded to give himself a deliberate assurance that the Government of His Majesty the King of Sardinia would never consent, even with a view to the greatest advantages, to cede or exchange any part of the territory of Savoy without consulting the wishes of the inhabitants; and he also went on to repeat the same assurance with regard to the other two conditions. A similar assurance on the part of the French Government was given by M. Thouvenel to Lord Cowley, as appears in the despatch of Lord Cowley of March 9th. Here, then, there was a double engagement on the part of France and Sardinia, both Powers pledging themselves equally, on the one hand not to infringe by violence, nor on the other hand by collusion, the treaties of 1815. Now, this morning, my Lords, I read in a telegram what appears to be a direct contradiction on the part of both these Powers to the assurances thus given. It states that the Government of Sardinia has consented to a demand from France, the effect of which appears to be to do away with and violate all these conditions, as regards alike the promise to ascertain the wishes of the people, and to consult the views of the great Powers, on the question of annexation; for it contains these words, "The treaty will be followed by a vote of the municipalities" (not the people generally) "of the two contracting Powers, and there will be afterwards communicated to the Great Powers the nature of the new territorial arrangements." Thus two out of the conditions are abandoned; and the third, as to the regard to be paid to the interests of Switzerland, is equally thrown on one side; for we are told that by this new arrangement Sardinia cedes to France Savoy up to the Alps; so that the whole of the passes of the Alps will be in possession of France, who will also obtain the districts of Chablais and Faucigny. My Lords, I make now no comment upon this. The effect of it is too plain. But if anything further were required, it is furnished by the fact, also stated in the telegram, that the Swiss Minister at Paris has handed to M. de Thouvenel a protest against the annexation proposed on the part of France. My Lords, I ask whether the Government are in possession of any information which can at all qualify or throw light upon this most startling, and, I will add, flagrant discrepancy between words and acts—between promises and performances? My Lords, I have the more reason for asking the question because, in the despatch of the 9th of March, I find that M. de Thouvenel tells Earl Cowley that he is about to draw up a circular despatch to be sent to the representatives of France at the Courts of the Great Powers parties to the Treaty of 1815, explaining the views of the Imperial Government. Now, that despatch will have probably been received—M. de Thouvenel expected it would be sent off on the Tuesday or Wednesday following. I ask whether it is in the hands of the Government?—if so, whether it throws any information on the subject?—and whether (as the Correspondence already produced would be incomplete without it) the Government will without any further delay lay it upon the table of the House?

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE asked their Lordships whether they believed that the question asked by the noble Earl was really one which ought to be addressed to Her Majesty's Government? What was the question put? He had no hesitation in saying, that if the noble Earl were a member of the Sardinian Parliament, it would be hardly fair for him to put such a question to Count Cavour. How it could have been put to Her Majesty's Government, was to him inexplicable; and the more so after the mistakes which had been made in this and the other House of Parliament in the early part of the Session in reference to telegraphic communications. The noble Earl asked him whether he could explain the discrepancies that existed between the two despatches referred to, and the telegraphic communication that appeared in the newspapers that morning. He had, once for all, to repudiate, on the part of the Government, all responsibility for those newspaper telegrams. How was it possible for him, or for any other Member of the Government or of that House, to argue upon the authenticity or correctness of telegrams that appeared in the newspapers? It would be impossible to conduct the diplomatic measures of the Government, if an attempt were made to visit the Government with the responsibility of those pieces of intelligence, and to require them to explain such discrepancies as those alluded to. That there was a great and flagrant discrepancy between the two despatches and the telegram in question, there was no doubt; but the Government knew no more about the telegrams than any other Member of the House; and it was, therefore, perfectly impossible for him to explain those discrepancies. The noble Earl asked him further—and he admitted that that was a more reasonable question—whether he thought that the circular despatch of M. Thouvenel could be laid on the table? That despatch had only been received within the last twenty-four hours—it was a despatch of considerable consequence, as might be anticipated from the mode in which it was announced. No time had as yet been afforded to Her Majesty's Government for the full consideration of it. And it was, therefore, premature to ask them to lay it upon the table. He was sure that the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) and every Member of that House would admit that there was no disposition on the part of Her Majesty's Government to withhold from the Legislature and the public any communications that could properly be laid before them. He did not recollect, during his experience, any instance in which, with such rapidity and alacrity, the despatches had been laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament; even, he was inclined to admit—sometimes with danger to the due course of negotiations. There were despatches before their Lordships which had arrived within the last ten days. He sympathized with the interest which noble Lords took in the subject. At the same time he urged them to exercise the utmost discretion in putting questions as rapidly as they had, and at any rate to refrain from asking the Government to explain discrepancies which existed between Statesmen abroad, and telegrams which came to this country, and which were not authentic, until proved to be so by subsequent despatches.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, the answer of the noble Duke was perfectly fair. The despatch referred to had only arrived a short time ago; and no noble Lord on that side of the House of any experience would wish to extract anything from the Government that would be mischievous to the public service. But, on the other hand, while he gave to the Government entire liberty to refuse to answer any question which they thought ought not to be answered, he thought that the noble Duke ought to give the noble Lords on his side of the House the liberty of putting any question to them on all points on which they desired information. His noble Friend having seen telegraphic despatches of great importance in the public prints of that morning, naturally asked whether the Government had received any information on the subject; as it was likely that the Government might have received similar telegrams from our Ministers abroad. Although the noble Duke was quite justified in refusing to answer the question, under such circumstances as he had stated, he thought that the noble Duke was rather hard upon his noble Friend in saying that he had no right to ask him such a question.

THE POLICE IN IRELAND. QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked, Whether it was intended to send any portion of Irish constables to the camp at the Curragh, as a part of the military force there assembled, or to any dépôt or military school of instruction in England. Since he last addressed their Lordships on this subject, one of the Judges of Assize in Ireland had noticed the inefficiency of the police, and attributed it, as he did, to their assuming too military a character.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that he would say, as he had said before, that he agreed with the noble Marquess that it was not desirable that the constabulary force of Ireland should assume too military a character, although he believed it was right they should be organized on a different footing from the police of this country. In reply to the first part of his noble Friend's question, he had to state that there was no intention of sending the constabulary force of Ireland to the camp at the Curragh, or any other place, with a view to military exercise. In regard to the second portion of the noble Marquess's question, the facts were these:—The arms with which the constabulary had been provided were very old, having seen at least twenty years' service; they were inefficient, and of the old smooth-bore principle. It was intended to provide them with new arms; and, of course, they ought to be of the best kind. Those would be the Enfield a view that they should know them it was intended to send and sixteen head constables to order to be instructed in the new rifles. They would afterwards be conveyed the instruction force. There was, however, if investing them with a more

ROCHESTER.—QUESTION.

DUNGANNON asked Her Government, Whether, in the present vacancy in the See of Rochester, it was in contemplation to divide any portion of the present diocese, so as to establish a Bishopric at St. Alban's; or, whether it was intended to transfer the See and Title of the Bishopric of Rochester to St. Alban's, and to throw the Town of Rochester and its dependencies into the Diocese of Canterbury? He took the opportunity of putting the question at that time as a fair opportunity now existed of making a most desirable alteration.

LORD EBURY said, that in the absence of his noble Friend the Earl of Verulam, the Lord Lieutenant of Herts, and before the noble Duke answered the question, he wished to remind their Lordships of what had been done in this matter. A Commission was appointed in 1835 which took into consideration the boundaries of the dioceses in England and Wales, and, in their report upon the best mode in which these dioceses might be remodelled, they recommended that, after the avoidance of the See of Winchester, a portion of that diocese should be transferred to the diocese of London. In 1858 another Commission was appointed, to consider the special circumstances of the four metropolitan sees, London, Winchester, Canterbury, and Rochester. The Commissioners pointed out that the area of the see of Rochester was as large as that of Winchester, although the population was not so great, and that the benefices were still more numerous. They also stated that when, on the avoidance of the see of Winchester, a portion of that diocese was transferred to London, the diocese of Rochester would have a larger area and a much larger number of benefices than Winchester. The Commissioners added that these four metropolitan sees contained 5,000,000 souls, 1,900 beneficed clergymen, and a more than ordinary number of curates. One of their recommendations was that a new diocese should be formed out of that portion of the diocese of Rochester, which lay north of the Thames, and it was proposed that the town of St. Alban's should be the seat of the bishopric with the abbey for the cathedral church. The difficulties to be overcome in forming three new dioceses were three—a cathedral, an episcopal residence, and an income for the Bishop. Recently some of the inhabitants of the proposed new bishopric went to the Government and endeavoured to meet these difficulties. The county of Hertford offered to restore the abbey of St. Alban's as a cath-dral for the new bishop, and they also suggested how the two remaining wants of an episcopal residence and income should be supplied. The clergy of the Church of England very much needed additional overlookers and more pastoral encouragement, and this want prevented that union and organization which were at present so much wanted in the ministration of the affairs of the Church. The noble Viscount at the head of the Government stated to the deputation that he should prefer to see the question taken up as a whole, instead of being treated in detail. He hoped the matter would not be allowed to drop through, and taking advantage of the present favourable opportunity the Government had only to appoint Commissioners again to consider this matter, and then the details might easily be arranged.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, his noble Friend proposed the appointment of a Commission to inquire into this case, but the probability was that before any Commission could report, the see of Rochester would be filled up. He would not enter into the general question raised by his noble Friend as to the necessity of increased ecclesiastical supervision in the dioceses referred to, nor as to the extension of the episcopate throughout England. No doubt the population had greatly out-grown the spiritual provision in many of the dioceses, and he agreed with him in thinking that increased episcopal supervision, both of the clergy and the people, was necessary. His noble Friend behind him had kindly undertaken to answer the question put by the noble Viscount, for he stated to the House the answer that a deputation had received from his noble Friend at the head of the Government—namely, that the case was one requiring serious consideration, but that it ought not to be taken up as an isolated question, and that he recognized the propriety of dealing with the whole subject of the extension of the episcopate on a more extensive scale. In the meantime he (the Duke of Newcastle) was authorized to state that any clergyman who might be recommended to the see of Rochester would hold the see subject to such arrangements as the Government and Parliament might hereafter make.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH thought the answer of the noble Duke far from satisfactory. They usually found that when Her Majesty's Government were asked to take up a great question of this kind the answer was that the subject was too wide and must be dealt with in detail, and when they asked the Government to go into detail and take up a particular case that they thought might be so dealt with the answer was that it could not be taken up in detail, but as a whole. This was an unsatisfactory mode of proceeding, and he thought would create dissatisfaction out of doors. How was it possible to deal with the great subject before them as a whole? The difficulties which were to be overcome existed in particular cases, and à fortiori difficulties would be found besetting the question as a whole. He believed he was correct in saying that the funds in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were forestalled by reason of the great amount of parochial destitution existing throughout the country, which rendered it almost impossible to provide an adequate fund to be applied to the endowment of new sees; but the Ecclesiastical Commissioners might render a proportion of aid to such funds as might be provided by the liberality and Christian feeling of the people. He was informed only the other day of the munificent amount of the offers now in the ecclesiastical office, of funds in aid of the endowment of parishes. There was an amount of liberality existing in the country which, if it could be drawn forth, would be amply sufficient to provide the necessary endowments. All that he asked was that facilities should be placed within the reach of such persons for carrying out their intentions. By the course they were following they were putting a damper upon the Christian liberality of the country. In the case of this particular diocese there had long been a strong desire that it should be divided, and if encouragement were given he had no doubt funds would be forthcoming. He hoped the Government would give their attention to the matter, and act in accordance with the importance of the subject.

LORD REDESDALE wished to know from the noble Duke whether they were to understand that some steps would be immediately taken with a view to the increase of the episcopate. He believed it would conduce to the real economy of the revenues of the Church if additional bishops were appointed in many places; for by such means the true action of the Church might be put into more effective working. Was there, he would ask, any serious intention to take steps by which the episcopate might be increased?

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he was not then in a position to answer the question of the noble Lord.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, there was a great necessity for the provision of increased ecclesiastical superintendence in many parts of the country.

COMMITTEE.—REPORT.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD REDESDALE wished to know what was the precise object of this Bill. It was entitled "An Act to defray one moiety of the expense of the annual revision of the valuation of rateable property in Ireland out of the Consolidated Fund." He wished to know why these expenses, which in all other parts of the country were defrayed by local charges, should in Ireland be paid out of the public revenues.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he confessed he had felt some reluctance to take charge of an Irish Bill; but he had done so in this instance, not expecting that any opposition would be made to it. The valuation of Ireland, which was one of the most important and useful works of its kind in Europe, had been accomplished entirely at the expense of local proprietors. But the annual revision of the valuation was used for many public purposes, as the limitation of the franchise, the decisions of lawsuits, and others. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had thought it a fair case that one half of the expenses of this annual revision should be borne by the public; and the Bill had passed the House of Commons without a dissentient voice. It appeared also that the Valuation-office in Ireland had been hitherto treated as a temporary institution only, and the clerks employed in it consequently did not share in the privileges of other public servants. By this Bill they were placed regularly upon the Civil Service establishment.

LORD MONTEAGLE heartily concurred in the principle of the Bill, and thought desirable if such a valuation had been made for England also.

ALE thought, from what opposite had said, that it was if this subject were for England. His only bill was, that it was one of the things in which Ireland did things done for her that

THE MARQUESS OF BATH was understood to remind the noble Lord that the comparison he had made was hardly fair, when they considered the different circumstances of the two countries.

Bill reported, without Amendment; and to be read 3^d on Monday next.

SALE OF GAS.—PETITION.

LORD REDESDALE presented a petition from Gas Meter Manufacturers of Great Britain in meeting assembled, complaining of the delay in carrying out the provisions of the Act for regulating measures used in the Sale of Gas. He said that by the Act of last Session models of gas-meters were to have been deposited in the office of Exchequer for the purpose of having accurate meters distributed throughout the country. Six months had transpired, however, since the passing of the Act, and no models had been deposited. The time was approaching when it would be necessary by law to have duly certified meters, and the gas companies began to be in doubt as to what would be done. The Act required that an instrument, called a gas-holder, should be prepared with balances and other things for the proper measurement of gas. This instrument was well known as a standard by which gas-meters were tested. The Astronomer Royal, however, under whose management the scientific details were placed, was induced for some reason or the other to adopt another instrument, which he at first proposed to call a "transferrer," by which the gas-holder might be tested. But this instrument was quite unfit for the testing of the meters themselves. The consequence was that no models were as yet deposited in the Exchequer; and at present there was no means of supplying the deficiency. The question seemed to him (Lord Redesdale) to involve very considerable difficulties; but he thought on the whole that the Act would be found to work when some of its provisions were modified according to the experience of its practical working. But he hoped the Government would consider the course they meant to pursue, because within twelve months no legal sale of gas could take place except by means of a stamped meter, and it was necessary that some immediate steps should be taken.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE observed, that the Board of Trade and the Exchequer were jointly commissioned with the exection of this measure. They had consulted the Astronomer Royal, who made certain objections to a gas-measurer. The Treasury then consulted the Board of Trade as to whether the Act would require any Amendment, but the opinion of the Board of Trade was that no Amendments would be necessary. Communications were still going on, but he had reason to hope that arrangements would soon be made to meet the inconvenience of which the petitioners complained.

LORD MONTEAGLE feared that unless the Act was amended the expectation of its framers would be disappointed.

LORD REDESDALE said, he understood that the measurement of gas had been carried on for a long time at Berlin, and he believed at Paris, but certainly throughout Prussia, and there was no reason why it should not be accomplished in this country. The regulation of weights and measures had always been considered an Imperial question; and he had no doubt that the Act would work well when its defects came to be discovered by its practical application.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE. EXPLANATION.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, on moving the adjournment of the House, said, that he wished to give an explanation of something which was supposed to have fallen from him on a previous evening. He had received a communication from an hon. Gentleman who represented a very large commercial constituency in the other House of Parliament, from which it appeared that certain words that fell from him last night were supposed to be to this effect—that those hon. Members who generally belong to the Conservative party, and who are opposed to the present Government, but who gave their support to the financial scheme of the Government on the late occasion, were influenced not so much by their opinions as by the extreme pressure put on them individually by their constituents. That was not the meaning he intended to convey. He should deeply regret if any words that fell from him should be supposed to convey that meaning. All he meant to say was, that the votes of these hon. Members were not given wholly irrespective of the opinions and the interests of the great industrial and commercial communities which they represented in Parliament, and that he might fairly claim on behalf of the Government their votes as indicative of the opinions of the great commercial centres in this country as to the financial scheme of the Government; but he did not mean to imply that against their own opinions they had been forced by the pressure of their constituents to vote for a measure which individually they disapproved of. So far from feeling that the value of these votes was depreciated by the explanation that had been given him by the hon. Gentleman, the Government attached much more value to them, regarding them as an independent support received from hon. Members who were generally opposed to them.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, March 16, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILL.—1° Professional Oaths Abolition.

2° Court of Chancery; Endowed Schools (No. 3).

3° Prisons (Scotland) Acts Continuance; Marriage (England and Ireland).

MR. NEWDEGATE AND MR. COBDEN— PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

MR. BRIGHT: The House will, perhaps, permit me, before the regular business comes on, to occupy its attention for a few minutes, by referring to a matter of a personal nature—not personal, however, to myself, but to my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), who is now absent, and on whose behalf I wish to say a few words. The matter arises out of a statement made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) in a speech which he delivered to the House during the discussion on the Budget. In that speech—I quote from a slip which I have received from my hon. Friend, and to which he has called my attention—the hon. Gentleman is reported to have said that Mr. Cobden professed to be a Free-trader and Democrat, and yet when he went to Russia he wrote in favour of the despotic Government of that country, and that he was now—

“On such close terms of intimacy with the Emperor of the French that he had declared that, notwithstanding the restrictions on the liberty of the press, notwithstanding the Chambers were what he (Mr. Newdegate) was afraid the House of Commons would become—a mere registry for the decrees of the Emperor of the French, that he could not understand that the people of France had anything to complain of.”

Therefore, said the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire, it would be little wondered at that Mr. Cobden should feel little interest in the people of this country, or in what he trusted would still continue to be an independent House of Commons. I understood from the hon. Gentleman that this statement was made by him on the authority of an anonymous letter printed in a paper published in Manchester, which notoriously has long been most unfriendly to my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale. My hon. Friend has written me a letter in which he refers to this, and states that—

“The entire purport of the statement is utterly devoid of foundation; I never expressed the sentiment attributed to me, or anything like it, or the opposite of it, for I never uttered an opinion upon the subject to which it refers. The whole allegation is as pure a fiction as if the speaker had accused me of picking M. Guizot’s pocket of his watch. Pray speak to Mr. Newdegate on the subject, and ask him to retract the statement as publicly as it was uttered; and pray tell him that I am lost in astonishment at his having been capable of propagating, without due inquiry, such a calumny on an absent Member of the House.”

I have given notice to the hon. Gentleman of my intention to make this statement, and I must say I am satisfied that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would not utter a calumny of this sort, but that this statement is probably a misconception to which we are all of us liable when preparing a matter to fulminate against our opponents. I think, however, after what has been stated, that the hon. Gentleman will at once express his regret at having been misled into making a statement so unfounded. I ask him to retract what he has stated, in order that there may be no misunderstanding on a matter of this character; because, from the position in which my hon. Friend now stands, it is most important that nothing of this kind should be published that is not strictly accurate; and this misrepresentation, however unintentional, should be retracted as publicly as it was made.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, I fully acknowledge that the hon. Member for Birmingham has only done his duty by undertaking to call me to account for any statement I may have made with respect to Mr. Cobden in his absence, of which he and Mr. Cobden think that the latter has a right to complain, as unfounded or unfair. He has only obeyed the claims of friendship in so doing, and I honour him for it. The Reports of what I said and to which the hon. Member refers are to a considerable degree inaccurate. I find attributed to me in the leading organ of communication the following words which convey, though not exactly, still the general tenor of my meaning. Speaking of the hon. Member for Rochdale, I am supposed to have said—

“Perhaps he might say that Mr. Cobden was so intimate nowadays with the Emperor of the French that it would be dangerous to put any cause of dissension between them. In former times Mr. Cobden had been struck with the same democratic devotion for the Emperor of Russia, witness the pamphlet which he had written on his return from Russia. So complete was the admiration felt by Mr. Cobden, the advocate of democratic doctrines—so entirely was he épris with the Emperor of France and his system, notwithstanding the restrictions on the liberty of the press, notwithstanding the Chambers were what he feared that House was on the point of becoming—mere registry offices for the decrees of the Emperor, that in Manchester, where, if anywhere, he was well spoken of, he had been represented in the newspapers as unable to understand what the French people had to complain of.”

Now, that Report is in some degree inaccurate, because I did not make this statement on my own authority, but stated that reports were current to the effect, which I indicated. I was speaking with a letter in my hand which had been sent me as extracted from The Manchester Guardian, and which was published in that paper on the 21st of February. With the permission of the House, as it is most painful to any man to be accused of misrepresenting a Member of the House, in his absence, I will read a portion of that letter. The letter appeared in The Manchester Guardian of the 21st of February. It is stated to have been from “Our Private Correspondent in London,” and it says—

“I am sorry to hear reports in very general circulation by no means complimentary to the soundness of Mr. Cobden’s judgment upon the internal affairs of France, or creditable to him as the citizen of a free country. In these reports, which are founded upon the statements of an M.P. who has just returned from Paris, where he has made good use of extensive opportunities of social observation, Mr. Cobden is represented as ‘Napoleonized’ to a higher degree than we can easily suppose a lover of free institutions could have been by ever so frank an acceptance of free-trading principles on the part of the Emperor.

The Member for Rochdale is described as freely avowing his inability to discover what France had to complain of in the present régime, and as ignoring, in the most unaccountable manner, the importance of such elements in national happiness as free thought, free speech, free inquiry, and free institutions. Nay, so painfully, as I hear, have some of the Constitutionalists, now chafing in enforced silence under the iron hand of Imperial despotism, felt Mr. Cobden's utter want of sympathy with their position, that they declare their expectation that from his visit to Nice he will bring back to England nothing but assurances of the eagerness of the Nizzards for annexation to France. I dare say that much of this may be the exaggerations of irritated and not very scrupulous partisans, but I am afraid Mr. Cobden has laid himself open to the imputations of having manifested a zeal for free trade in the inverse ratio to his zeal for every other form of freedom."

Now, Sir, I fully admit to the hon. Member for Birmingham, that if I had not ground for believing that there was some truth in these reports thus circulated in Manchester, it would have been exceedingly culpable on my part to have made any statement on the sole authority of this letter, which is anonymous; but the hon. Member for Birmingham must remember that few Members of this House have had more reason or more opportunities for close observation of the hon. Member for Rochdale, during the last eighteen years, than I have had, and I can assure the hon. Member that few have availed themselves of these opportunities more constantly. There is very little which that hon. Member has said, very little that he has written which has escaped my attention. ["Order!"]—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman must confine himself to an explanation of the statement he made.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Forgive me, Sir, I was explaining the reason for my having adverted to that letter, which I admit to the House, had the substance of it been contrary to the opinions I myself entertain, would have been unjustifiable. I am vindicating my conduct, being called on to do so, by a Member of this House. I am vindicating my honour as a Member of this House. I have, as I said before, observed the career of the hon. Member for Rochdale for a very considerable period; I have observed in him a tendency to favour institutions very different from what I understand by the term "free Institutions," and this induced me to believe that there might be some ground for the assertions in the letter I have read. Let me first clear the ground by explaining what I mean by free institutions. The House will, I am sure, excuse me if I trespass on its time for a few moments in a matter of this nature. I mean by free institutions, such institutions as this country has the happiness to possess—institutions, embodying, as I believe ours do, a far greater amount of social, and personal, and political freedom than any institutions in the world. I mean by free institutions, the constitution of England, which is the great type of free institutions, as contradistinguished from the despotic democracy of America, as contradistinguished from the democratic despotism of France, as contradistinguished from the despotism of Austria, as contradistinguished from the autocracy of Russia. Now that is what I mean by free institutions; and it is to these institutions that I am of opinion that the career of the hon. Member for Rochdale does not show that he is firmly attached. I find that early in 1854 the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Birmingham were present at a meeting at the Albion Hotel. It was a meeting of the League, and Mr. Cobden there declared that the origin of his first appearance in public life was his having written a pamphlet, I believe in 1835, but which was published in 1836, on the subject of Russia, entitled Russia Cure for Russophobia, to which pamphlet I referred on the occasion to which this explanation relates. That was the substance of those observations, with which I will not again trouble the House in detail. Mr. Cobden applauded the institutions of Russia, and declared that he thought the encouragement given to the trading classes ought to be most satisfactory, because persons of a certain capital were exempted from corporal punishment. He went on to declare that he thought it for the interest of Europe that Russia should become possessed of Constantinople. Further, he declared that he had moved a Resolution in a debating society—a Literary Society in Manchester—to that effect, and that there this proposition was decidedly affirmed by that society. Well, Sir, there was a declaration in the pamphlet to which I referred. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen will excuse me, for I am called to account for a statement which might appear to be a calumny.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS: I rise to Order. I put it to the House whether the hon. Member is to go on in this strain. I understood that the hon. Gentleman had risen to explain a statement which he had made on a former occasion, and which is denied to be a fact. It is competent to the hon. Gentleman to persevere in what he has stated, or to retract it; but not to go on with a new statement which has nothing whatever to do with the original statement.

MR. NEWDEGATE: If I make a statement of this kind in this House I have ever observed one rule, that I will either retract that statement in the House, or will confirm it in the House when called upon. And now, Sir, with your permission, detaining the House the fewest possible moments, I will show that in 1854 not only did the hon. Gentleman the Member for Rochdale avow his authorship of that pamphlet, but he proceeded to say at that meeting, at which the hon. Member for Birmingham was present, that in accordance with his long entertained opinions he would take means to prevent the prosecution of the Russian war, and I will give the House a description of the means he suggested. ["Oh!"] These are Mr. Cobden's words. He said, "If we are to have a war, let there be no accumulating of debt, and no taxes in the shape of Customs or Excise duties. Increase the income tax 20 per cent or more if necessary, and lower the amount down to £50 rather than revert to the old system of indirect taxes." And the hon. Member for Birmingham, who followed him, said he "sincerely hoped with Mr. Cobden, that if this war, which he called insane, should break out, the income tax would be doubled, and that it would be brought down to almost so low a rate as to catch every man who could make a speech from a platform, or who was in favour of it." Therefore the hon. Member for Birmingham [Order, order!]

MR. SPEAKER said, what had been said by the hon. Member for Birmingham on that occasion was not relevant to the explanation now proposed to be made by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I will not further advert to it. I would beg the House to remember that at the close of the year 1852 ["Oh, oh!"], soon after the death of the late Duke of Wellington, the hon. Member for Rochdale wrote and in 1853 published a series of letters in which he manifested anger at the universal regret felt by the people of this country at that which they considered a national loss, and reprobated the conduct of certain clergymen, who had preached sermons on the occasion with reference to the career of that great man, who had been an honour to this country, and one of her greatest defenders. Mr. Cobden was offended, that the memory of the late Duke of Wellington had been, to use his own words, "so generally selected for pulpit manifestations," and expressed a doubt as to whether such manifestations were calculated to enhance the influence of the ministers of the Gospel, or to promote the interests of Christianity. He went on to say that the wars concluded in 1815 were unjustifiable, and he condemned that great commander because the war was undertaken in opposition to the principles of the first French Revolution. And, Sir, here is the point with regard to the institutions of this country. He went further in his letter. ["Question."] I am coming to the point. He praised the institutions of France, and compared them with the institutions of this country, and to the disparagement of our institutions; and this is my justification. Perhaps the House will permit me to read the words. This is no hasty statement. This is a public document, widely circulated by the hon. Member for Rochdale himself. He says—

"When told that the present Emperor possesses absolute and irresponsible power, I answer by citing three things which he could not, if he would, accomplish: he could not endow with lands and tithes one religion, as the exclusively paid religion of the State, although he selected for the privilege the Roman Catholic Church, which comprises more than nine-tenths of the French people; he could not create an hereditary peerage with estates entailed by a law of primogeniture; and he could not impose a tax on successions, which would apply to personal property only, and leave the real estate free. Public opinion in France is an insuperable obstacle to any of these measures becoming law; because they outrage that spirit of equality which is the sacred and inviolable principle of 1789. Now, if Louis Napoleon were to declare his determination to carry these three measures, which are all in full force in England, as part of his Imperial régime, his throne would not be worth twenty-four hours' purchase; and nobody knows this better than he and they who surround him."

Now I have quoted this extract as a sample of the contents of these letters to show the general tenor of these letters, which is to impugn our own institutions and exalt those of France, expressing admiration for the tendency and effects of the first French Revolution, because it was a social revolution and overturned the rights of property, and condemning the Revolution of 1688, upon which our institutions are founded, because it left the rights of property untouched—because it was a religious and a political, but not a social revolution. The tenor of these letters is throughout in disparagement of the institutions of England, and in exaltation of the principles of the first French Revolution.

I thank the House for having allowed me to vindicate myself from the imputation of having uttered an unfounded calumny, and I think I have said enough to justify the opinion to which I gave expression in the statement which has been called in question. Sir, a man who is for ever endeavouring to prevent this House from taking means to defend the free institutions under which we live cannot, I think, be considered as justly valuing free institutions. A man who for a long course of years has systematically vilified our institutions, cannot be classed among the best friends of those institutions. A man who during a long series of years holds up the institutions of despotic States in comparison with, and to the disparagement of the institutions under which we live, cannot be considered as a true friend to our institutions, but must be held, at best, indifferent to the continuance of free institutions, the benefits of which he may, nevertheless, have no objection to enjoy.

MR. BRIGHT: I asked the hon. Member for North Warwickshire whether he was prepared to maintain the accuracy of what he had stated, or was disposed to retract it. I cannot exactly ascertain from what he has stated that any retractation was made. But perhaps the House will allow me to say on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale, that he utterly denies it from beginning to end. There is not a word of truth in the statement; and, as he must be the best judge of it, I think it has been the general custom of Members of this House to accept an express statement of another Member; and, as the hon. Member for North Warwickshire admits that the only foundation for his statement is an anonymous letter in a newspaper known to be hostile to my hon. Friend, I leave the House to judge between the hon. Member for Rochdale and the hon. Member for North Warwickshire.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Excuse me for one moment; I did not retract my statement; I did not found my statement entirely on an anonymous letter, but I broadly stated to the House the grounds of the opinion I entertain and had expressed.

LIGHTNING CONDUCTORS.

QUESTION.

MR. FREELAND said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether his attention has been called to a Despatch from our Minister at Brussels, dated the 24th of February last, stating that on the preceding Sunday a violent thunderstorm, accompanied by an unprecedentedly heavy fall of snow, had overspread Belgium; that twelve churches had been simultaneously struck by lightning, and that three of them had been totally destroyed and the others much injured; whether he has seen a paragraph in The Times of August 17, 1857, stating that the Flag Tower of Windsor Castle had been struck by lightning, and that about four tons of the parapet had been displaced; and whether any provision has been or is to be made for securing the Public Buildings of this Country which are under the control of the Board of Public Works against such injuries or destruction by lightning as have occurred at Windsor Castle and in Belgium?

MR. COWPER said, his attention had been called by the hon. Gentleman's question to a very remarkable meteorological fact of a violent thunderstorm, accompanied by a heavy fall of snow, so that twelve churches had been simultaneously struck by lightning; but he had not thought that this very portentous event would justify this country from departing from the ordinary custom by which those buildings only which were much above the ordinary level were protected by lightning conductors. Buildings at a great elevation, such as the Palace in which they were now assembled, should be protected; but the expense would be very considerable of fitting copper conductors to all our public buildings. With regard to the statement in The Times, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, it was true that the Flag Tower of Windsor Castle had been struck by lightning, but he was happy to state that the accident had been repaired for the sum of thirty shillings.

MEDICAL OFFICERS IN INDIA.

QUESTION.

MR. BAZLEY said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Medical Officers of Her Majesty's Indian Army have had all the privileges conceded to them which the Royal Warrant of the 1st day of October, 1858, entitles them to receive?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Sir, the Warrant of 1858 cannot apply in all respects to the Medical Officers of the Indian army, inasmuch as the pay and pensions of the Queen's Service differ from those of the Indian Service; but the rank and position of the Indian Medical Officers and those of the Medical Officers in the Queen's Service in India are on a footing of perfect equality.

THE OYSTER FISHERY.

QUESTION.

MR. CAVE said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade a question respecting certain Papers which have been moved for relative to the Oyster Fishery. Some doubt having arisen as to the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, what was wished was, that he should remove that doubt by repeating the purport of his reply.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he had been asked whether there were any Papers that could be laid on the Table relating to the French Convention and the Oyster Fishery; and his reply was, that there were no Papers of a character to be usefully laid on the Table. He had also stated that there had been no recent remonstrance from France with reference to the Oyster Convention, and no increased stringency on the part of England in carrying out the provisions of the Treaty.

FORESHORES (SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

MR. FINLAY said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether he has received a Memorial from certain Proprietors and Road Trustees of the county of Argyll, complaining of the claims made by the Crown to the Foreshores of Scotland and to the property of the solum or ground of the Seashores up to high-water mark; whether he has in consequence communicated with the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and with what result; and whether the claim by the Crown to the property of the whole Foreshores of Scotland is made in accordance with the advice and opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: In answer to his hon. Friend he had to state that he had received a memorial from certain proprietors and road trustees of the county of Argyll, complaining of the claims made by the Crown to the foreshores of Scotland, and to the property of the solum, or ground of the seashores up to high water mark, and he had seen a deputation that waited upon him for the purpose of discussing the matter, although it was not directly in his Department, but in that of the Woods and Forests. He had made inquiry into the particular matters involved in the question, and he found the practice for some years had been to grant licences to take gravel and stone from below high-water mark; those licences were entirely at the pleasure of the Crown, and at a merely nominal rent. With regard to the general question as the claims of the Crown to the foreshores, he was not aware that there was any particular opinion or opinions given by the Law Officers of the Crown in Scotland as to the taking of sand or gravel from the seashore; but the general rights of the Crown as to the foreshores had been the subject of an opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in Scotland, and the Woods and Forests had substantially acted on that opinion.

Mr. Basley

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, he would beg to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether, as under the provisions of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Bill the only persons to be qualified to vote in the Election of Members of Parliament are—1, Proprietors of lands or houses worth £5 a year; 2, Tenants of lands and houses held under the same landlord, and rented at £10 a year, provided they reside in the county for six months in each year; it is intended to disfranchise the following descriptions of existing voters:—1, The old freeholders; 2, Joint life-renters; 3, Life-rent tenants who have sublet their farms; 4, Tenants not resident in the county; 5, Tenants of lands who live in houses belonging to separate proprietors; 6, Tenants of minerals, quarries, fisheries, &c. which have no houses attached to them; 7, Joint proprietors or tenants, where there are more than two on the same property; and, whether new voters may under this Bill be registered upon such qualifications as entitle persons to vote under the existing Acts?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thought the questions of his hon. Friend would have been put on Monday next, when the Bill would come on for a second reading. Most of the questions in his (the Lord Advocate's) opinion might have been answered by a study of the Bill itself, and he would recommend his hon. Friend to adopt that course. The only explanation he thought it necessary to make was in regard to the tenancy franchise. It was not intended that the residency clause should apply to any of the old tenancy franchises under the Reform Act. They were all arranged by reference to the valuation roll, and if there was any ambiguity in regard to residence it would be put right. It was not intended that the residence clause should apply to the old franchises, but only to the new franchises.

MALT DUTY.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. PACKE,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated that the question of the Malt Duty was no doubt very interesting to those concerned; but it was not one of special importance with regard to any contemplated change of the Law, and therefore the position in which he stood was this, that it would be most inconvenient to the public service to keep the Customs Bill waiting for the Malt Resolutions to be decided, and it would be almost impossible for him to give adequate time for debating the question if it came on at a late period of the Session. Therefore, unless he could get rid of the question to-night by an early vote, he proposed to drop it altogether from the present Bill, and to bring on the question at some convenient period after Easter, when there would be an opportunity for full consideration.

On Motion that the House at rising adjourn till Monday,

CORONERS' INQUESTS IN KENT.

QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, if his attention has been called to the fact, that the body of a man, of the name of Thomas Edward Kean, recently found dead in the woods near Seal, in Kent, was interred without any inquest being held upon it; and what steps have been taken in consequence? He was satisfied that not only the local authorities, but the Home Office had not done their duty on this occasion. It appeared that, in 1858, this unfortunate man became insane, and was placed in Colney Hatch Asylum, whence he was afterwards sent out sane. He returned home, and resumed his ordinary occupation, but towards the close of the year he suddenly disappeared, and no more was heard of him till his wife received a letter from the superintendent of the police in Kent, stating that the body of a man which, from its appearance, must be her husband, had been found in the woods, and had been buried, as it was supposed he had died from cold. He asked the question on this ground, that this man was a Member of a benefit society, to which he hoped many of the Members of the House belonged—the Ancient Order of Foresters—and the rules of that Society required that before relief in case of death was given, the death, and the cause of death, should be set forth. Now, the burying of the body without a coroner's inquest rendered this information impossible. Inquiries had since been instituted, and it appeared that this poor man had gone into a public-house in the neighbourhood of the place where the body was found, and had some bread and cheese, and having no money to pay for them, though he had a ring on his finger, the humane landlord ordered him to pull off his boots to pay for his refreshment, and in that state he appeared to have wandered into the woods. It was quite clear that in this case an inquest ought to have been held, and that, in neglecting it, the law had been violated.

MR. MILD MAY said, this was one of a class of cases which unfortunately often occurred in Kent in consequence of the disputes between the coroner and the magistrates, who refused to allow the expenses for holding inquests, unless necessity was clearly shown to exist. In some counties a compromise took place by which the coroner received his fees when notice to hold an inquest was given to him by the police constable; because as the police constable had no pecuniary interest in inquests it was presumed that he would not give unnecessary notices. Of course the coroner could hold an inquest without such notice, but it was at the risk of not receiving his fees if it should turn out that the inquest was unnecessary. But this system was not introduced into Kent. The system worked extremely ill, and some change of the law was imperiously required.

MR. CLIVE thought he could show the House that the Home Office had not neglected its duty in this case. As it had no power of compulsion in those unfortunate disputes which so often existed between coroners and magistrates, all the Home Office could do was to bring a Bill into Parliament, which should have the effect of settling these disputes. That they had done, the Bill being now before a Select Committee. With respect to the present case the Home Office had written to the coroner to know why an inquest had not been held. In reply, he received a statement that the man had appeared as a stranger at Seal, and was last seen in a place where, having no money, he had left his boots in pledge; that he appeared subsequently to have divested himself of his coat and trousers; that there were no marks of violence on him; and that it was supposed he had died in a fit. This, of course, was a gratuitous supposition; but the real reason appeared to come out in the latter portion of the letter, in which the coroner stated that he was placed in a very delicate position, because the magistrates of Kent required him to send in along with his bill of charges a statement of what criminal act or criminal neglect had appeared to render the inquest necessary, and the magistrates thereon decided whether this was sufficient to justify an inquest, without which his fees were not paid. If that rule were adopted he could not say that it was a fair one.

MR. DEEDES said, as some blame had been cast on the magistrates of Kent in these statements, he trusted the House would allow him to say one word in their defence. There was not the slightest ground for supposing that in a case of this kind any difficulties would be thrown by the magistrates in the way of holding an inquest. It was true the magistrates had laid down a rule that the Coroner's bill of fees should be accompanied with a short statement of the reasons which induced him to think that an inquest was necessary; but it was also true that the magistrates invariably allowed the expenses of the coroner in going to the place where a death had occurred, and making those preliminary inquiries that were necessary to satisfy him that an inquest ought to be held. He had no doubt in the world that if the Coroner had done this in the present instance, no objection would have been made to it; but he was inclined to believe that the coroner had not made these preliminary inquiries.

Mr. Clive

THE NAWAUB OF THE CARNATIC.

QUESTION.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he desired to ask the Secretary of State for India, if he will consent to lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of a Despatch from the Governor General of India, dated the 14th day of November, 1855, and Copies of Letters from the Government of Madras, respectively dated the 12th day of October, the 20th day of November, and the 4th day of December, 1855, reporting the death of His Highness the Nawaub of the Carnatic, on the 7th day of October, 1855; and Copy of a Despatch from the Court of Directors of the East India Company replying to these communications, announcing that the dignity of the Nabobs of the Carnatic had expired, and that the treaties which secured the rights and title of the family of the Nabob were at an end? The hon. Gentleman proceeded to say he had an allegation to bring forward, and it was this, that the provisions of the treaty entered into sixty years ago, and scrupulously carried out for fifty-six years, had at length been wantonly violated. The late Nawaub of the Carnatic, having died in 1855, his uncle made application to be permitted to attend the funeral as his recognized successor. To that request a distinct refusal was given, and at the same time a significant intimation was made to him that the Government would take the means to prevent any one from assuming the title and rank of Nawaub. A day or two afterwards a written application was made to know if the Government of Madras intended to allow the provisions of the treaties of 1792 and 1801 to be carried out, and to acknowledge the uncle of the Nawaub. To that application an answer was returned, that the Government were resolved not to acknowledge the uncle; but they said they would send all the facts to England by the next mail, although they never informed the Nawaub what recommendations they intended to make. After a year's delay an answer arrived, the purport of which was that the treaty was personal to the late Nawaub, and that he being dead, the treaties were at an end, but that they might have an allowance of £10,000 a year from the Government. Now he did not hesitate to pronounce that decision arbitrary and tyrannical in the extreme. Who was the dethroned Prince? Why, he was the son of the very sovereign with whom the treaties were made, and who died in 1819. The Governor General had decided on holding the title in abeyance, which he supposed was the diplomatic term for robbery, because the treaties were purely personal, and because the late Nawaub was allowed to hold the throne purely as a matter of grace. Now, a reference to the treaties themselves showed that they were not merely personal, and therefore he had no hesitation in pronouncing the whole transaction as most discreditable to those engaged in it.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON protested against an attack being thus made upon servants of the State without notice, and on a mere Motion for papers. There was no public man whose acts would bear inspection better than Lord Dalhousie; but for the present he should content himself with denying that there were any treaties in existence which entitled the uncle and heir of the late Nawaub of the Carnatic to succeed to his predecessor as an hereditary dignity.

THE INDIA HOUSE MUSEUM. QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Natural History portion of the India House Museum had been offered to the British Museum? He stated that the portion of the India House Museum to which his question related was—at all events the great bulk of it—presented by himself to the East India Company, and was the produce of his own gun. The hon. and gallant Member also asked whether telegraphic communication had been established between Alexandria and Calcutta, and whether a communication had been received from the latter place in six days?

THE TRADE OF CENTRAL ASIA. QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he wished to inquire of the Secretary of State for India, respecting the means of extending our trade with Central Asia? He believed it was very desirable that a trade should be opened with that portion of the world across the Himalayas. Russia was greatly extending her commerce in that quarter, and he had no doubt that on fair terms we should be able to compete successfully with her in that market.

THE INDIAN ARMY.—QUESTION.

MR. A. MILLS said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether there is any objection on the part of the Government to lay upon the Table of the House the Minutes in Council in Calcutta of the 2nd and 7th of January last, by Lient. General Sir James Outram and Sir Bartle Frere, on the question of the Amalgamation of Her Majesty's Indian Forces with the British Army. In the year 1859 the Indian Army Commission had presented a Report, but no step appeared to have as yet been taken. But he did not blame the Government for the delay which had taken place in the matter, because the principal question with which they had to deal was one of considerable difficulty, and one which had given rise to a remarkable conflict of opinion among the witnesses who had been examined by the Commissioners. He should add, however, that it was extremely desirable the Government should decide as speedily as possible one way or the other, in favour either of a local army, or of an enlargement of the line in India.

MR. W. EGERTON said, he had to put a question to the Secretary of State for India relative to the trade with Central Asia. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the road which was begun by Lord Dalhousie, from India to Central Asia, through Simla, is yet completed.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that in answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Smollett), whether he had any objection to produce certain despatches relative to the claim to the dignity of Nawaub of the Carnatic, he had to state that he was prepared to lay before the House not only the despatches mentioned, but all the papers connected with the subject. He thought he had a right to complain of the extraordinary and, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would forgive him for adding, the unfair course which he had pursued upon that occasion. The hon. Gentleman had merely given notice that he would ask whether there would be any objection on the part of the Government to produce certain documents; and upon that notice he had founded an attack on the Government of Madras and on the Government of India, but more especially on the administration of Lord Dalhousie. The natural result was that he (Sir Charles Wood) was not prepared at that moment to answer the charges put forward by the hon. Gentleman. He could then only express his belief that Lord Dalhousie could not have been guilty of such conduct as the hon. Gentleman had imputed to him; and upon due notice he would be ready to enter into a detailed consideration of that subject.

In reply to the Question of his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Sykes), he had to inform his hon. and gallant Friend and the House that he understood the Natural History portion of the British Museum was about to be removed; and as it was in contemplation to make it the best natural collection that could be formed, and thinking that the excellence of a museum of that kind depended on its being made as complete as possible, he conceived he was contributing to the accomplishment of a most desirable object when he offered to its managers such portions of the Indian Museum—which, after all, was but an imperfect one—as they might require.

In reply to the second Question of his hon. and gallant Friend, he had to state that he believed the telegraphic communication was complete between Calcutta and Alexandria; but that there seemed to be a break in the line in some point in Europe, and probably either at this side of Alexandria or at Malta. He had not himself received a telegraphic communication from Calcutta within the space of six days; but a communication from Calcutta had that day been received in the City dated the 10th of March, and which had not therefore occupied more than that time in the transmission.

The next Question he had to answer was that which had been put by his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart), with respect to our trade with Central Asia. That was a matter, no doubt, of great importance, and it had not escaped the attention of the authorities either in India or in this country. He had that morning had a conversation with Sir John Lawrence, who had lately filled the position of one of our Indian administrators with such distinguished ability, not only in war but also in peace, and he had been informed by him that every possible effort had been made of late to open a communication between India and Central Asia, from which such large quantities of wool were to be obtained. He found that the value of the wool exported from the port of Kurrachee, which amounted in the year 1853-54 to £180,000, had risen to £393,000 in the year 1857-58. Some years ago a Chinese Commissioner was sent into Thibet, and an English Commissioner was sent from India, in order that they might meet and take joint measures for facilitating the trade of that region; but the proposed meeting of the two Commissioners had never taken place; one of them had been murdered; and no further steps had been taken in the matter. He was happy, however, to be able to state that instructions had been given to Lord Elgin to enter into negotiations with the Chinese Government for the friendly settlement of that subject.

In answer to a Question which had been put to him in reference to the progress made in the construction of the road to Central Asia through Simla, he had to state that he was not then prepared to afford any precise information upon that point, and in reply to the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. A. Mills) he wished to observe that before any question connected with the organization of the Indian army was brought before the House it would be his duty to produce not only the papers to which the hon. Gentleman referred, but also a variety of other documents bearing upon the subject.

SANDHURST MILITARY COLLEGE.

THE TURKISH MEDALS.

QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK SMITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Government have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of any Correspondence on the project referred to in the Report of the Council of Military Education for the extension of the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, so as to admit of all candidates for the Cavalry, Guards, and Line, who have passed the usual examinations for Commissions, receiving at that institution a course of professional instruction and training previous to joining the Army?

COLONEL KNOX said, that he wished to ask if the Government have taken into consideration the question of the competitive examination with respect to the Staff appointments? It seemed to him that the double examination which those Officers had to undergo was altogether unnecessary.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that in the regulations issued a short time back by the Commander-in-Chief an exception was made respecting staff examinations, and it was provided that officers should be appointed to the staff without examination when they had proved themselves qualified for that post by previous service. As to the papers which were asked for by the hon.

Member for Chatham (Sir F. Smith), it was true that the subject of first admissions into the army was one the importance of which could not well be over-estimated, and that plans had been proposed by which all officers entering the army would be compelled to pass through the school at Sandhurst. In their published Report all these plans had been given, for the Military Council did not stint the House in information. Whether, however, the correspondence which had passed between the heads of Departments in the discussion of this question should be published was another matter. He believed that the compulsory entrance at Sandhurst was brought forward at a Cabinet meeting held in November, 1858; and it was clear that if the House wanted to know the grounds of the decision then arrived at by the Government, they ought equally to know the arguments which influenced that decision, which would be nothing more nor less than making the discussions of a Cabinet Council public. In the same way he did not think that the correspondence between the Secretary of State, the Council of Military Education, and the Commander-in-Chief ought to become Parliamentary documents. If the first impressions which were formed and expressed by the heads of Departments on any subject, and which were often afterwards modified or changed altogether, were to be given to the world, the consequence would be that no man would offer an opinion, or that, if he did offer one, it would be in the form of a private letter which could not be published. A full power of consultation must be given in all such cases without the restriction which would be imposed by the chance of future publicity. A new proposal had recently been made by the Council of Education, which obviated many of the objections taken to their former proposals; but the adoption of the plan would be very expensive, as new buildings must then be provided at Sandhurst for the accommodation of officers. He was willing to admit that the present system, by which some officers were admitted direct, and others through Sandhurst, was open to many objections, for at present a positive advantage was enjoyed by the former, whose examination was much less severe than that undergone by officers at Sandhurst. For the reasons he had stated, he thought it would be seen that there would be a great objection to grant the correspondence which had been asked for.

Before sitting down, the House would perhaps allow him to reply to a question which had been recently put to him respecting the Turkish medals. On a former occasion he had stated that these medals had arrived and would be distributed immediately. That, however, was a mistake. The medals had not arrived; and news had been received that the Pomona, the vessel in which they were deposited, had foundered and all the medals had gone to the bottom. The Government had telegraphed for information, and had inquired whether it would be possible to recover the cargo; but the answer was that it was quite impossible. Great disappointment would no doubt be felt on this point, but he felt bound to let the House know how the matter stood.

ENGLISH POOR LAW.—REMOVAL OF IRISH PAUPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. LANIGAN said, he wished to call the attention of Her Majesty's Ministers to the treatment of the destitute Irish by Poor Law Officials in England, with a view of checking the abuses which exist, and of assimilating the English Poor Law to that of Ireland, by which Boards of Guardians are compelled to grant relief to all who seek it (irrespective of the country to which they belong), there being no evidence required to establish their claims except the fact of their destitute condition. The hon. Member said it was extremely cruel that honest, hard-working Irish labourers should toil in this country all their lives, without asking relief of any sort, until the blood was dried up in their veins, and the marrow taken out of their bones—and then, when poverty and sickness overtook them, they should be looked upon by their English employers only as so much worn-out machinery, fit only to be cast away. It was shocking to see the steam-vessels which left Ireland laden with cattle and sheep return laden with living skeletons—Irish labourers, who having become chargeable to the parish were torn away from their homes sick and helpless, and hurried on board; whence, after enduring exposure on the decks for days and nights, they were landed on the quays in utter destitution. When they arrived they generally found all their friends gone, owing to their long absence in England, and their paternal homes demolished. The hon. Gentleman quoted some remarks of Lord Palmerston on this subject, where the noble Lord said that wherever they saw a man going up a steeple, carrying a hod of bricks upon his shoulder as heavy as himself, and which he could not carry upon level ground, they might be sure he was an Irishman; and that wherever there was shown a contempt for danger in the discharge of an occupation, he was sure also to be an Irishman. He had been chairman, and was now a member, of three boards of guardians in Ireland, but he never saw such practices. Whenever any poor person applied for admission to a workhouse in Ireland, he was never asked whether he was a Scotchman or an Englishman, and the only question asked was as to his destitute condition. The hon. Gentleman then related the case of an Irish woman, who thirty-eight years ago came to London, being then 20 years of age. For seven years she was a general servant, and then she married, and had nine children—two of whom, daughters, aged respectively 15 and 19, were now alive. She had supported her family by her own industry, and without parochial relief; and a short time ago, being afflicted with a bad leg, she was compelled to become an inmate of St. Pancras workhouse. The surgeon told her that she ought to have her leg cut off. The woman objected to that operation being performed, and her case being reported an incurable one, and as she was likely to become permanently chargeable to the union, she was sent back to Ireland, much, however, against her will, and in spite of the protestations of the two daughters, who offered to support their mother, and to pay the expenses incurred on her account while in the infirmary. These were the statements of the woman herself, and if they were true they cast a slur upon the name of England, and rendered it no longer worthy to be called the land of freedom. [Laughter.] The man who laughed at or defended such a cruel system had a heart as cold, callous, and cruel as he who dealt in human flesh in Africa. The first law of removal was a penal one, passed in the reign of Charles II. It was directed against a certain class of people, who roved the country like gipsies, and settled and built cottages on the land. The present Removal Acts were the 4th and 5th William IV. and the 9th and 10th Vict. The magistrates had the power of removing Irish paupers from this country; they carried out the penal clauses of the Act of Victoria, but ignored the more humane provisions of the Act of

William IV., which compelled the parish removing a pauper to give twenty-one days' notice to the authorities of the parish to which he was to be removed. He did not blame the present Government for the existing state of things more than its predecessors; every Government since the days of Charles II. had connived at this oppressive law of removal. He called upon the Government in the spirit of the noble Lord who pronounced the favourable opinion he had quoted regarding Irish labour, to introduce some Bill upon the subject of Irish poor removal, and he called upon the Free Traders of the House, with whom he entered the lobby, for the benefit of the people of England, to urge the Government to pass such a law. If the Government would not do so, let the Free-traders of the House show that the sympathy they always expressed for the poor working classes of the country was a genuine emotion, and not a morbid sentimentality, and insist upon the Government either passing such a Bill, or resigning their places—not, certainly, to the Conservative Gentlemen on the other side—but to an hon. Member, whom he did not then see in his place, and his party, by whom alone the poor working classes of the country could ever expect to have justice done them.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that the whole treatment of the Irish paupers in this country was connected with the law of settlement. There were many instances which had come to his knowledge of the cruel manner in which that law operated upon the unfortunate Irish pauper, and he hoped that if the Government did not come forward with the assurance that the whole subject would be taken into consideration, some Irish Member would bring in a measure calculated to remedy the evil. He feared, however, that if the hon. Member for Cashel brought forward such a Bill, those among whom he sat, and to whom he had so pathetically appealed, would do as they had done before—vote against it.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, the question raised by the hon. Member was a very large one, involving as it did the whole law of settlement in England and the want of it in Ireland. No doubt there was a great want of a proper law of settlement in both countries; but the question had puzzled every man who had dealt with it, and it could not be conveniently discussed upon the Motion for Adjournment. With regard to the particular case to which the hon. Member referred, some one had been kind enough to send him a Tipperary paper, in which the woman's statement was published. That statement, however, was quite unauthentic, and was made by a woman who could neither read nor write, and who affixed her mark, and it was not taken on oath. As soon as he received the Tipperary paper, he instructed a poor-law inspector to make inquiries of the parochial authorities with regard to the case. He (Mr. Villiers) did not in the least deny that great hardships were connected with the law as it existed, and he should be glad to see them removed. Yet he was in a situation to tell the hon. Member that not one single act of illegality had been committed in the present case. The medical officer reported the woman permanently disabled, and, being chargeable to the parish, she was removed. Some of the facts stated by the woman were totally incorrect. Her daughters, so far from offering to support her, threatened that if she were removed they would throw themselves upon the parish. After it was determined to remove her, three weeks were allowed to elapse to see whether she would leave herself, or whether any person would take charge of her. His predecessor in the office he had the honour to hold (Mr. Baines), instituted an inquiry upon the subject of removal, and proposed several judicious alterations for the purpose of mitigating the hardships of the law; but when he introduced a Bill to give them effect he was met by such a storm of remonstrance from the Irish Members, that it was impossible to make any advance in legislation upon the question. His right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), also introduced a Bill on the subject, but was obliged to withdraw it in consequence of the opposition it received, particularly from Irish Members. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wilts (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) also attempted to deal with the matter, but he, like his predecessors, was obliged to withdraw, not having received the support of the Irish Members. The main reason therefore why legislation had not taken place on the subject was the want of union among Irish Members. If a measure founded upon the propositions which had been approved by his right hon. predecessor were brought forward, it should receive the support of his Department.

MR. H. A. HERBERT, as himself a member of an Irish Board of Guardians, knew many well-authenticated cases of the grossest hardship, and cases in which the poor-law authorities on this side of the water, in their anxiety to get rid of Irish paupers, had certainly gone beyond the law. He had known persons, who, having been twenty or thirty years in this country, had lost all their relatives in Ireland, and had forgotten even the names of the streets in the town where they were born, sent over and thrown upon the quays of Cork, or perhaps those of Dublin or Belfast, in a state of positive destitution. As there was no law of settlement in Ireland, these poor people could not be forwarded to their own parishes. It was not, as his right hon. Friend thought, in consequence of any Irish opposition that the former efforts to remedy the evil had failed in that House; but it was because the matter had been mixed up in the enormously difficult question of the English law of settlement. If the right hon. Gentleman would turn his mind to the whole subject, it would not be very difficult to frame a Bill to provide for it. At present, in England, an industrial residence of five years in any parish entitled a poor person to relief there, and rendered him irremovable. If this rule were extended from the parish to the union, many of the hard cases which he had alluded to would be obviated, because, as the law now stood, these poor persons were often driven from one parish to the other, without perhaps going out of the union during that period of time, so that, after many years' residence in the neighbourhood, they lost the advantage of a settlement. The suggestion he made was, that five years' residence in the union should bestow the settlement.

MR. MAGUIRE begged leave to support his right hon. Friend in relieving Irish Members from the charge of unwillingness to do justice to the poor of their own country. He had a perfect knowledge of the history of the several Bills which from time to time had been brought before the House by successive Presidents of the Poor Law Board. The object of one of the first Bills was to do a wise and humane act—to abolish the law of settlement and removal in England. A more wise and more humane proposition could not, in his opinion, emanate from any Government. But while that proposition was made for England, the law as regarded Ireland was to be held in force as before, and the Irish poor were to be prevented from enjoying the great boon offered to this country. The Irish Members naturally took exception to this defect, and did their best to have the claims of Ireland recognized. When, however, they found that they could not succeed, they very reasonably refused to allow a Bill to pass which, being so partial, was, therefore, unjust to their poor country-people. A Committee was appointed to consider the subject, and it sat for two years. It made several wise and humane recommendations; among which was one for the diminution from five to three years of the period during which, by industrial residence, a poor person became exempted from removal. A Bill was brought in subsequently, founded ostensibly upon the recommendations and the report of the Committee; but the Bill fell so miserably short of the unanimous recommendations of the Committee—a Committee representing English, Irish, and Scotch Members—that there was certainly a strong sense of indignation on the part of many Irish Members. Nevertheless, with all its shortcomings, they were not prepared to reject the Bill. There came, however, a storm of indignation, not indeed from Irish Members, but from alarmed English parishes. Petitions from almost every parish in England were presented to the House—every board of guardians in London, Liverpool, and Manchester, was in a state of alarm. Deputations were incessantly filling the lobbies, representing the exaggerated apprehensions of the ratepayers of England. It was owing to this opposition that the Bill had to be abandoned. Now, he would mention one instance of the manner in which the jealousy and apprehension of the Irish pauper worked upon English property. It appeared in evidence before a Committee, which sat for a short time last year, that there was a certain parish in London, having in it a large number of Irish labourers, and in which there were only two descriptions of employment for such labour—one market-gardening, and the other brick-making. As a matter of course, these occupations depended entirely upon the state of the weather. When the weather was bad, there was no employment, and as the Irish labourer was absolutely necessary to the parish for carrying on those particular branches of industry, he had in the intervals of employment to live upon the rates. Would this be the case if the law of removal were done away with? Unquestionably not. If the law of removal and settlement were abolished, and a poor man were permitted to go wherever there was a demand for his labour, they would not have the thousands and tens of thousands at present depending upon the rates of individual parishes. The apprehension of the parish to which he had referred, was that in a short time the unemployed labour would positively eat up the property and industry of the parish. He therefore urged that the question was one which English, Scotch, and Irish Members alike should look at, not in any narrow spirit, not as a subject to be judged of from a mere geographical point of view, but as one which affected the interest of the empire at large. He held that inasmuch as Irish labour was absolutely necessary to the prosperity and the advancement of England, it was for the benefit of English ratepayers that there should be perfect freedom for those whose only capital was their labour, to go wherever they could find a demand for it. He once brought twenty cases of what he conceived to be gross hardship before the House; but, as in the instance of his hon. Friend that night, every single one of them, however plausible, however fair it seemed to be, however minute were the particulars, was disproved by the evidence of those who had the best interest in disproving it. The relieving officers proved themselves to be most humane, the magistrates demonstrated their own judicial perfection, the boards of guardians made it evident that they themselves had acted with the greatest deliberation and the utmost sympathy—and all concurred in representing that the pauper alone was a liar and a schemer. He should give one piece of advice to his hon. Friend—never, under any possible circumstances to bring before the House any individual case, supported alone by the testimony of a poor person; for it would immediately bring down twenty, fifty, or one hundred statements, to prove that the pauper was a person unworthy of credence. There was evidence of a different kind brought before the Committee of the House. The passage from London to Cork occupied sometimes three, sometimes four, and even five days; and it was proved that poor decrepit paupers, male and female, were put on the deck of the vessel, and left there unsheltered, to bear the inclemency of the weather and the fury of the waves. Cases had come before the board of guardians, of which he was a member, of very great hardship. Week after week poor women, who had forgotten the places of their birth, were, with their children, and who spoke only the English tongue, brought before them; and such was the feeling of commiseration inspired by their sad story, that almost every member, out of his own pocket, contributed something to send them back to the place where they could find employment, because there were no means of giving them employment in Ireland. He recommended his hon. Friend not to take the insidious advice tendered to him by the right hon. Gentleman. Let the Bill be a Government measure; let them bring in a Bill founded upon Mr. Baines's recommendations, and the Irish Members would give it every chance of success.

PROPOSED REDUCTIONS IN THE CUSTOM HOUSE, &c.

WINE LICENCES TO EATING-HOUSES.
QUESTION.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he would transfer the attention of the House from one form of official cruelty to another. He rose to call the attention of the House to the reduction proposed to be effected during the present financial year in the establishments of the Custom-house and Inland Revenue, and said that he was not going to pretend that such great financial measures as those with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to deal could be carried out without being accompanied as a matter of necessity by considerable reductions in the establishments. If, for instance, there was to be no more silk to weigh and no more freights to lock up, the number of lockers and weighers must necessarily be considerably reduced. But still he could not view, without some degree of apprehension, reductions to such an extent as £50,000 per annum in one establishment and £36,000 in another. Such reductions, he thought, could scarcely be effected without operating with extreme hardship on the officials affected by them; and if this were not the case, if they were to receive compensation, the compensation paid would necessarily form an item so large that if it fell on the Consolidated Fund it would considerably diminish the advantages which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to derive from that source. However great the public benefit conferred by any measure, it ought never to be accompanied by a large amount of private calamity—of injury for life to a large number of very worthy and excellent men, and destroying generally that confidence in the public service which always attracted to it the best class of public officials. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might perhaps reply that the officials thus deprived of employment would soon be absorbed in the population. That term "absorbed in the population" was extremely vague in its character. He recollected an instance of "absorption" of this kind, the narration of which might perhaps give the House some notion of what really was meant by persons being "absorbed in the population." Once upon a time a large hotel proprietor enjoyed a flourishing business, and was on the high road to fortune. But a railway came in close proximity to the line of road on which the hotel stood, and took away all the traffic. Of course the hotel became worthless, its business was gone. Upon asking what had become of the proprietor, it was replied, "Oh, he was absorbed in the population." The man had become an ostler. He hoped his right hon. Friend would be able to assure him that, as far as possible, he would promote the necessary reductions with due regard, not only to the large body of persons mechanically employed, and who were perhaps young enough to turn their attention to other employments, but also to those old and deserving public servants who had spent their whole lives in becoming familiar with the duties of their office, who if now turned out would be unable to attach themselves to other pursuits, and having no resources would be exposed to extreme penury. Perhaps his right hon. Friend would inform the House how he proposed to carry out these large reductions, and that he would be guided by the principles of humanity and generosity, as well as by economical considerations.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER owned that he was very much embarrassed as to the manner in which he should answer the really very singular inquiry of his hon. Friend (Mr. M. Milnes). He was asked to give an assurance that in regulating certain reductions in the public establishments he would be guided by the principles of humanity and generosity. Well, in regard to the principles of humanity, he was not aware it could be justly alleged that where reductions were carried out in the public establishments of this country there had been displayed any want of humanity in the arrangements. He was bound to say, comparing the proceedings of the State and Government of England with those of any other country, they were influenced by principles of humanity, equity, and consideration for private interests to an extent of which there was no other example on the face of the earth. As to generosity—he knew not what had excited the apprehension of his hon. Friend, and induced him to make this appeal for an assurance that these parties should be treated with generosity. Generosity was a great and noble virtue in individuals, but he confessed he had great distrust of generosity on the part of States, on the part of the House of Commons, on the part of Members of Parliament in behalf of public officers when spending public money. As to the practical part of the question it stood thus. When the Government first formed the intention of submitting to Parliament proposals which would render practicable a very considerable reduction of the public establishments, he had immediately communicated with the chiefs of both Departments, directing them to suspend their applications to the Treasury for new appointments, particularly in the more expensive class of officers. He had applied to his right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Board of Customs to know how he acted with respect to these coming or possible reductions. He said it would be impossible to give any estimate in detail which should affect the general estimates of the Department, because they could not take place before the passing of the law; the Department would require to be in perfect possession of all the measures before they could possibly consider in detail the arrangements of the establishment that would be consequent on these measures. Fully occupied with the measures themselves, he was not aware that any progress had been made up to this time in the Customs department with these arrangements, although no doubt some preliminary steps might have been taken. But he must say he had the most perfect confidence in the justice, equity, and consideration which his right hon. Friend at the head of the Customs would show in adjusting and determining these reductions with a view to the interests of the public service and the claims of individuals. The head of the Board of Customs was primarily responsible in this matter. The Chairman of that Board had to submit his plans to the Treasury, whose conduct the House of Commons had in turn to take under its review.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

The hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. Edwin James) had given notice of his intention to ask whether in the Bill introduced by him for the granting of wine licences, it is intended to exclude houses licensed for the sale of beer, under the provisions of the Acts regulating the sale of beer, from the right of obtaining licences for the sale of refreshments; and, if so licensed, then from the right of obtaining a licence for the sale of wines under the provisions of his Bill? His hon. Friend had lost his opportunity, but he would nevertheless answer his Question. He had no authority more than any other person to construe the language of a Bill, even though he might have framed it; but he would describe the intention of the Bill in simple terms; and this was the more requisite, inasmuch as the popular analysis of the Bill of the Government which had appeared in some of the newspapers did not rightly convey the effect of some of the enactments. The measure had two principal objects. The first related to refreshment houses universally and as a class, and was intended to remedy an evil much and justly complained of—namely, that those houses were entirely exempt from the supervision of the police. The provisions of the Bill would therefore compel all keepers of such houses—with the exception of certain small houses in country places—to take out a licence at a low rate. The holding of that licence would subject them to the supervision of the police, under certain penalties and restraints which he thought adequate for the purpose in view. The second principal object of the measure had reference, not to refreshment houses universally, but to such of them as might be properly called eating-houses. The Bill attempted both to define what was the true character of an eating-house and to provide the means of justly carrying out that definition in practice. Eating-houses, as thus defined, would entitle the keepers of them to apply for licences to sell foreign wines. The hon. and learned Member would have asked whether the Bill dealt with beer-houses. His answer was, that the measure was not intended in any manner to touch what were known as beer-houses—that was to say, drinking-houses kept open for the sale of beer, and licensed under the Beer Acts. With regard to whether a licence for the sale of beer would ipso facto constitute a disqualification for holding a licence to sell wine, that was a point on which the House would have to exercise its own judgment; but undoubtedly it was not meant by the framers of the Bill that in the case of an eating-house a licence to sell beer should of itself disqualify the keeper for a licence to sell wine.

ISLAND OF ST. PIERRE.
QUESTION.

MR. HALIBURTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if his attention has been called to the fact of the French Government having erected Fortifications on the Island of St. Pierre. The matter was one of very great importance, and one which had much excited the public mind in the Lower Province of Canada. It was well known that in former years the people of almost every European country resorted to the coast of Labrador and Newfoundland for the purpose of fishing; but by degrees the use of these fisheries had become confined to the English, American, and French fishermen. The English fishermen from Newfoundland and the coast of Labrador having greater facilities, were, of course, the largest participants in that valuable fishery. The Americans having within three leagues of the coast the right of fishing, and having the easement of curing their fish on both uninhabited shores of the island, had their peculiar catch, but they did not interfere with us. The French had two small islands, the principal of which was St. Pierre, and they became the centre of a very large fishery, which had grown up in an extraordinary manner in the last few years. In addition to the absolute ownership of these two Islands, the French claimed the use of the shores of Newfoundland, which were uninhabited, for the purpose of curing their fish. In time this occupancy began to be stretched into a right of territory, and, according to that new phrase of the Emperor, "the logic of facts," their power was about being made much greater. On the breaking out of every war for the last century and a half we have had to take proceedings to drive away the Frenchmen from this coast, and on every peace their rights had been restored to them. The last occasion on which this cession took place was in 1814, and in this way they held the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. The rulers of France, with that foresight that had eminently distinguished them, had granted a very large bounty on the catch of fish—a bounty, he believed, equivalent to the value of the fish; and, under these circumstances, they had fostered and brought up that fishery to that degree that they had between 30,000 and 40,000 sailors engaged in that business. It was the great nursery of their seamen. Such were the facilities and advantages which they derived from these bounties, that they undersold the Nova Scotian in the Halifax market, and sent up to Quebec and there undersold their own resident countrymen. The constant resort of these 30,000 or 40,000 French fishermen to these regions had inspired them with an idea of their own strength and power; and using these advantages sometimes without discretion, great conflicts had occurred between them and the people of Newfoundland. Indeed, they had carried their pretensions to the length of giving notice to the inhabitants of St. George's Bay, about 2,000 in number, that if they did not move out of their habitations, they should have them pulled down about their ears. In short, the people on that part of the coast of Newfoundland were now under warning. The French law required the boats engaged in the fishing trade to be of a certain build and to carry a certain number of men—because the object of the Government was not so much to stimulate employment in fishing as to create sailors. That was a matter of much greater importance to the Emperor than a treaty stipulation with England about coal. These proceedings had naturally been viewed as serious grievances by the British subjects settled near the Straits of Belle Isle and that portion of Newfoundland. A good deal of bad blood had also been excited, and it was astonishing that there had not been many conflicts ending in a very fatal manner. The French claimed the soil of a portion of the country, and an easement in other parts, and they demanded exclusive privileges; but that part of this subject which he would now put out of view, as it was still under the consideration of Commissioners appointed by both countries: he meant the aggressions on Newfoundland and the claim to exclusive privileges even over the rivers running into Labrador. The fortifications of the French on the island of St. Pierre had been raised contrary to express stipulations by treaty. The two barren islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon were of great importance, for they were situate in the larger outlet of the Straits of Belleisle and commanded the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and were within forty hours of the coast of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. It was a nest which in the event of a war we should have, as the very first thing, to destroy, and as the French had no right to fortify the place it was very important that it should not, in the event of a war, be the cause of greater expense in money and life than if it had remained according to the terms of the treaty. He had not himself been on the island of St. Pierre, but he was informed that, independent of the fortifications which the French had put on it, they had made it a naval station, and they had large steamers which lay there under pretence of receiving mails from the Cunard steamers for Halifax; whilst nine miles below were the mouths of the mines from which they got their coal, and they were forming large depôts at this place, and in the event of a war, rapidly as intelligence could now be conveyed by telegraph, the whole commerce of that portion of the world could be swept away by privateers. The 6th article of the Treaty of Paris, under which these islands were given up to France, declared, in terms which could not be mistaken, that they were "to serve as a shelter for the French fishery," and His most Christian Majesty undertook "not to fortify the said islands, nor to erect buildings upon them, but merely to hold them for the convenience of the fishery, and to keep in them a guard of fifty men only for purposes of police." He was personally aware that a coal station existed at the place; and he was informed that a large body of armed men, who were called "marines," and who might therefore excuse their presence on the ground that they were neither soldiers nor sailors, were kept on the island. In the event of hostilities these men, as had once before been the case, might take possession of Newfoundland, and, though they would probably not be able to keep it in their hands, they would undoubtedly occasion a great deal of mischief. The hon. Member concluded by asking the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether his attention had been called to the erection of these fortifications on the island of St. Pierre; and whether, if any correspondence had taken place on the subject, it would be consistent with the interests of the public service to produce it for the information of the House?

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.
QUESTION.

MR. KINGLAKE: Before the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign

Mr. Haliburton

Affairs answers the Question which has just been put, I shall take the liberty of asking the question of which I have given notice—namely, Whether there is an objection to lay upon the Table of the House his Answer to Lord Bloomfield's Despatch of the 3rd day of March, respecting the proposed annexation of Savoy and N. France. I do not desire to read Lord Bloomfield's despatch, but to point the attention of the House to the attitude which Prussia has taken in the present European crisis, as indicated in that communication. Baron Schleinitz, the Prime Minister of Prussia, stated to Lord Bloomfield that all Germany there was but one opinion as to the character of this intended annexation; that for a time his Prussian Majesty had trusted the statement made by the Emperor in his Milan proclamation, but that he now saw the time for maintaining silence had passed. The despatch concludes by saying that the Baron had declared the policy of Prussia to be decidedly opposed to this annexation, and had given his opinion that France must now be called on to refrain from taking any further step until a conference of the Powers shall be held. I confess I read that despatch with great pleasure, and I may be permitted to say that it indicates an intention on the part of Prussia to take a step as nearly as possible identical with that which I ventured to indicate by the Notice which I gave last week. I cannot but regard this as an overture of great importance, and one which I trust may be looked back upon in later times as the commencement of the pacification of Europe. Not only is the despatch itself significant, but the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs must be aware that its production and publication is also a matter of deep importance. That despatch is dated the 3rd of March; some of the papers contained in the volume of correspondence delivered to this House date down to as late a period as the 9th inst., but they do not include the answer which the noble Lord must have given to the despatch in question. I have, therefore, to ask whether it will be convenient for the noble Lord to lay that answer on the table of the House; and I trust when we see it we shall be able to say that it was a reply worthy in every way of the spirit in which this overture on the part of Prussia has been made. I have not given notice of an intention to ask the noble Lord for any general information with respect to this leading question of the annexation of Savoy and Nice, because I felt sure that without notice from any Member of Parliament he would know that any information which he might be able to give this House would be received with grateful satisfaction. On Tuesday last the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government gave us a right very strongly to hope—and I think, considering the relation between the two countries, a right also to expect—that the proposed annexation would not take place without France consulting—and seriously consulting the other Powers of Europe. I trust the noble Lord may now be able to say the expectation he then held out has not been falsified; that the rumours of the last two days are inconsistent with the truth; and that it is not the fact, in spite of all which he has said, that the Emperor of the French is proceeding to this annexation without consulting the great Powers of Europe, and that he is on the point of including in his annexation to France the districts of Chablais, Faucigny, and Genevois, contrary to the express promise which he has made, and the proof of which is to be found in the Correspondence that has been delivered to the House. I trust the information which the noble Lord may give us will be of such a character as in some degree to remove the anxiety which is at present felt.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Perhaps before the noble Lord answers the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgewater he will allow me to say that the information of what is taking place in Europe is seriously true; and to ask him whether, in addition to this despatch of Lord Bloomfield, which certainly contains intelligence of a very remarkable character, he is also aware of the danger which threatens the independence and neutrality of Switzerland. I am very loth again to trespass on the attention of the House with regard to this subject, but I feel that we have arrived at a period when it is absolutely necessary we should give utterance to some expression of opinion on this question. More than that, I believe I state the opinion not only of every Gentleman in this House, but of every man of feeling in the country, when I say that we ought to declare the sentiment by which we are all animated—that not only has an outrage been inflicted on the public mind of Europe, but that it is particularly directed against the Government of this country. We have been over and over again told there was no danger that the Emperor of the French would proceed to the extremities which he now threatens; over and over again in these despatches we find assurances that without consulting the Powers of Europe nothing whatever would be done. Now, I myself am in receipt of a telegram from Annecy, which states that these provinces Chablais and Faucigny have been so worked upon and harassed, and that the people from one end of the country to the other are so divided, that the municipalities of each district are perfectly ready to vote in favour of annexation to France—and why? Because all kinds of terrorism have been used, such as were employed in the time of the first French Revolution to excite the population—poor, innocent, primitive people, as every person knows they are, who really do not understand duplicity and art,—and to lead them to believe that if they annex themselves to France no danger will result, but that otherwise the most serious consequences will ensue. The despatch to which my hon. Friend has called attention is one of the greatest importance. He did not read any passage from it, but, if the House will allow me, I will just touch upon one expression, because it shows that the Cabinet of Prussia has taken up a dignified attitude, which I hope, and, indeed, have every reason to believe her Majesty's Government are desirous of emulating. Lord Bloomfield says in his despatch that "Baron Schleinitz appears to have stated to the French Minister that in Germany there was but one opinion of determined opposition to the project. Baron Schleinitz seems also to have observed to the French Minister that during the war the present Prussian Government had been the means of restraining the violent feeling which had been excited in Germany by the war in Italy, and had made themselves very unpopular by so doing; but that it must not be considered now, with regard to the question of Savoy, that if they remained silent at the present moment their silence meant indifference, for they should view that absorption with the greatest distrust. The noble Viscount at the head of the Government told us the other night that the war in Italy was part of the Emperor's policy for freeing that country, but it appears from this extract that the opinion in Germany about it was not so favourable. But if Prussia views this absorption with great distrust, surely this country is entitled to view it in the same light; and not only this country, but every country, is bound to give a firm and determined opposition to this policy of annexation, which, as Lord Derby well observed last night, is now commenced on the feeble pretext of danger to France from the proximity of a kingdom of 9,000,000 inhabitants,—a pretext which may be used very soon as an argument for annexing the Rhine provinces of Prussia and Belgium. Is the House aware of what is now going on on the frontiers of Belgium? There are newspapers published in the towns on the frontier—one in particular, the Journal de Mons—which advocate openly the annexation of Belgium to France, telling the people that if they could do away with the douaniers great facilities for trade and great commercial advantages would follow. This is an underhand, ungenerous policy, in which every power in Europe is directly interested, and which they ought to endeavour to curb with a vigorous and powerful hand. I cannot refrain from making some allusion to the conduct of Sardinia in this matter. The noble Viscount the other night paid a very flowing compliment to M. de Cavour, and he is a man whom I believe almost everybody believes to be a disinterested statesman and generous patriot; but on reading his despatch, no one who has watched his conduct can deny that his wish has been, not only to deceive Her Majesty's Government, but also to play a mock dignified part, which is quite unworthy of the influence he might have exercised at this moment. His expressions are really very curious. As everybody knows, he has disclaimed any engagement or any disposition to part with Savoy. In his despatch to Chevalier Nigra, his Minister at Paris, he says,

"The Government of His Majesty would never consent, even with a view to the greatest advantages, to cede or exchange any portion of the territory which has formed for so many ages the glorious appanage of the House of Savoy."

Fine words, indeed, and if he had acted up to them, he would have had all Europe with him; but then he goes on to say,

"The King's Government cannot refrain from taking into consideration the changes which the events that have taken place in Italy have caused with respect to the people of Savoy and Nice."

The same thing he said to Sir James Hudson.

"Count Cavour came to me," writes Sir James Hudson, "and repeated to me what he had stated before, that Sardinia was under no engagement to cede, sell, or exchange Savoy, or any other part of the King's dominions."

But Count Cavour ends with this remarkable expression, "The question is one for Savoy, not for the rest of the kingdom," though he had not long before written that Savoy was "the most glorious appanage of the House of Savoy." I say this is not a Sardinian question, it is not a French question, it is a European question. The question is not now whether Savoy shall be incorporated with the French dominions, with whose people and whose institutions she is unacquainted; it is not whether the King of Piedmont can yield up the appanage of the House of Savoy, the inheritance of his ancestors, which has been consecrated by so many generations of honourable exploits—but it is whether, after the King of Sardinia has enjoyed ever since 1815 all the advantages which the re-annexation of Savoy conferred on him—and it must be recollected that at that period the Sardinian Monarch received from the European Powers 10,000,000 francs to fortify the country against France—Europe will allow him to cede that territory to France by a private arrangement depending on the disposition of Italy. I say such a policy is unworthy of the Government of il Re galantuomo. "Perish Savoy," said the hon. Member for Birmingham the other evening. It has perished. I hope the hon. Gentleman is satisfied. We shall have "Perish Switzerland" next, and "Perish all the liberties of Europe." The hon. Member laid it down that, after all, the map of Europe, as regarded the limitation of the States of Europe, was not worth a moment's consideration; and he turned round to me and my hon. Friend here, and asked us, "Is what you want to settle the map of Europe?" My answer is, that we do not want to settle the map of Europe, but we do not want to unsettle it. We do not want to recommend the Government to pursue a course opposed to the interests of this country; but we want to check and curb a policy on the part of France, which is daily tending to outrage public opinion, and to violate the received and acknowledged interests of Europe. When my hon. Friend and I took up this question some time ago, we were told that we exaggerated its importance to England and Europe, and that beyond a formal protest, England had nothing to do with it. Time has shown the gravity of the question. When we are told that we are advocating the interests of Savoy and Switzerland to the detriment of other more important interests, our answer is that we would scorn to advocate interests which are opposed to the general interests of mankind; and that, in advocating the cause of Savoy and Switzerland, we are, in fact, advocating the cause of Europe; and that if you allow this state of things to continue, most grave consequences will ensue to Europe. I want Her Majesty's Government to protest, in a manly, straightforward way against the conduct of France. That protest will ring far beyond the walls of this House. You will rally Prussia, Germany, nay, the whole of Europe round you; and you may, perhaps, save millions of treasure and thousands of lives by such a course. I ask this House to protest against the conduct of France. I protest against it here, and I appeal to Europe in vindication of a system which the hon. Member for Birmingham has condemned, but which has worked well for very nearly half a century. I denounce that policy in the face of this House, and I warn you that this union of Savoy with France not only affects the future interests of Savoy and Switzerland, but it is the first step, the first act of conspiracy, against the liberties of every European State.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that before the noble Lord, the Foreign Secretary, replied, he wished to call his attention to the memorial of certain British subjects, Protestants, resident in Spain, complaining of the law of Spain, which did not allow them to have a place of worship of their own, or to send their children to any but a Spanish school. The law of Spain declared that no foreigner should "profess" any other but the Roman Catholic religion in Spain; and there were some doubts as to what was the exact meaning of the word "profess." What the memorialists desired was, that the noble Lord should intercede—not "intervene"—to procure an arrangement by which they would be able to send their children to a school of their own, and also to have Divine service celebrated in a private house in any place where there was no Consul or representative of Her Majesty.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I will first answer the Question which has been put to me by the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for Launceston (Mr. Haliburton), with respect to the fortification of the Island of St. Pierre. There is no doubt that fortifications are forbidden by the Treaty of 1763, and also by that of 1783. To the latter treaty, which was concluded at a period when this country could not hold her head so high as she did in 1763, there were appended certain declarations, but I am not aware whether they apply to this subject. In the year 1856 the attention of the Foreign Office was called to this question; the facts were submitted to the law officers of the Crown, and they were asked whether the buildings existing or constructed at St. Pierre, were any infringement of our treaties with France. Their reply was, that they did not think that anything had been done which amounted to such an infringement. I have not had time to look particularly into the case; but I understand, from the Gentleman who was then Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that the question was last year again referred to the law officers of the Crown, who were of the same opinion as their predecessors. We have not lately heard anything tending to show that any new buildings have been erected, or that anything has been done different from what had been done in the year 1856.

In reply to the Question of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside), I have to say that we are continually appealing to the Government of Spain with a view of obtaining permission for British residents to celebrate Divine worship in their own houses, and their freedom from some very intolerant provisions of the Spanish law. The penal law of Spain declares that a person who shall celebrate Divine worship in any other than the Roman Catholic form shall be liable to banishment; there are various other provisions with respect to any number of persons more than thirty meeting for any purpose of political or religious discussion, which are of a very penal nature, and it seems to be an established practice, or perhaps the established law of Spain, that these laws shall be enforced by the clergy, who are empowered to call upon the civil officers to execute them whenever they are infringed. There was a case some time ago in which a newly-born child, of Protestant parents, which had been baptized by the medical man, who was a Roman Catholic, died and was buried in the Protestant cemetery. According to the Spanish law that child was a Roman Catholic; and the Spanish clergyman called upon the alcalde of the place to have the child disinterred and reburied in the yard of the Roman Catholic church. Mr. Buchanan exerted himself very strenuously, and at last the Spanish Government gave way, and prevented the priest from carrying his intentions into effect. Another case occurred recently, in which an attempt was made to prevent some persons holding a meeting for public worship. It is not that Mr. Buchanan is at all indifferent to, or neglectful of, the question; but that any attempt to change the law of Spain would be quite hopeless. The law is very bigoted, the Government is very bigoted, and the people are more bigoted than either the law or the Government; and therefore there is but little chance of effecting any change in the law. The Government and the civil authorities have, however, no objection, upon the representations of foreign Ministers, to permit in certain cases the celebration of religious worship in private houses; and probably, if the number of children required it, a similar indulgence would be granted with regard to their education.

My hon. Friend, the Member for Bridgewater, has asked for the production of the answer to the despatch from Lord Bloomfield of the 3rd of March, with respect to Savoy. That despatch contained an account by Lord Bloomfield of a conversation between Baron Schleinitz, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Prussia, and the French Minister; and, therefore, as containing no representation to the British Government, did not call for an answer from me. We have, however, been in continual intercourse with the Government of Prussia, and I have more than once had conversations with Count Bernstorff, the Prussian Minister in this country; and I am able to state that the Government of Prussia and ourselves are entirely agreed on the view which we take of the proposed annexation of Savoy. I do not know that I could in March say, or that it was needful to say, more than I said both in July of last year and in January of the present. We have, as is shown by the papers, expressed at Berlin and Vienna, and at St. Petersburg, our objections to the annexation of Savoy, leaving them to take what part they should think right upon this question of European interest. I cannot say that I have heard from Vienna any satisfactory account as to any steps that the Government of Austria will take upon this subject. There are reasons which Members of this House will easily imagine why Austria should not be particularly zealous in preventing a partition of Sardinia, seeing that she herself has lost, both in Lombardy and Tuscany, dominions belonging either to herself, or to members of the Royal family, through the action of the King of Sardinia. It is a month since I communicated with Vienna; and a week afterwards I made similar communications to St. Petersburg, and it certainly is a disappointment to Her Majesty's Government that, considering that so long a time has elapsed, and that annexation has, as it were, been impending during all this time, we have not received any notice or intelligence that any strong remonstrance against the annexation is intended to be made by those Governments. The language of Count Cavour has been, I think, a good deal of the character described by my hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth, because, while he continues to say, as he said some time ago, that the King of Sardinia would not cede, or sell, or exchange Savoy, he goes on in the latter part of his despatch to say that if the people of Savoy are disposed to belong to another empire, and be under another sovereign, however the King of Sardinia might regret it, he would make no objection to their obtaining their wish. Now, I certainly conceive that that is a very extraordinary and a very unnecessary declaration. We know very well that there have lately been and are countries which have felt themselves so oppressed by their Governments, or have had such different views of policy from those entertained by other Governments, that they have wished to sever their connection with their sovereigns; but we have never heard that of Savoy, nor, that I am aware of, has there till lately been any indication that the people of Savoy wished to sever their connection with, or abjure their allegiance to, the House of Savoy. It is, therefore, a singular, I should say an unprecedented thing, for a Sovereign to say, "These subjects of mine are much attached to me; I value them very much. At the same time, if they wish to dissolve their allegiance and belong to some other country, I can have no objection to their doing so." It certainly looks as if the King of Sardinia and his Minister were not very unwilling to sever the connection. Now, Sir, I must say that our position must be a good deal influenced by these different things. If the great Powers of Europe which were to be consulted; if Austria and Russia feel no great interest in this question; if Prussia and Great Britain are the only European Powers that do feel any interest in it, and if the King of Sardinia, on his part, is apparently willing to yield this territory, it certainly does become very difficult to make any opposition to that act. But, Sir, there is another matter which I am going to state to the House, because, after the questions which were asked of me by a noble Lord not now present, I think I ought to state to the House what is my impression as soon as I have received a decided impression upon the subject. There was delivered to me yesterday a despatch from M. Thouvenel to Count Persigny, laying the case of the annexation of Savoy before Her Majesty's Government for their consideration. The despatch is a very temperate one. It abjures altogether the notion of natural boundaries, and states the case as one of a special interest arising from special circumstances—namely, that the position of Italy is changed; that the position of France is thereby made worse; and that therefore this is a special case which deserves the special consideration of Europe. But, although it is stated in the despatch that this question is submitted to the wisdom and equity of Europe, I must say that, taking the whole despatch together, including the statement that it is a necessity for France and for her security that she should have this extension, she can hardly be justified in saying that the Powers of Europe are to be consulted, and that by their verdict the French Government mean to abide. I have not yet laid this despatch before my colleagues. I am telling the House at once all I know upon this subject. The Cabinet will, no doubt, consider gravely and maturely what answer shall be given. The whole of this despatch, and especially that part of it which relates to the question of Faucigny and Chablais, is one of such gravity and importance that I will not say more about it at present than that it requires the most serious consideration. As soon as I am in a position to answer it, and Her Majesty has approved the answer, I shall lose no time in laying the despatch before the House.

THE SALE OF GAS ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Lords of the Treasury are now prepared to carry out the provisions of the Sale of Gas Act, and to have the "Gas-holder" at once deposited at the Exchequer Office. Great inconvenience had been caused by the neglect of the Government to have the gas-holder deposited at the Exchequer Office. The reason for that neglect appeared to be a doubt in the mind of the Astronomer Royal whether the instrument might not be put out of order if it were moved; but the deputation of meter-makers were unanimously of a different opinion. It had been stated that the instrument mentioned in the Act was not known; but such was not the fact. Even gentlemen of the medical profession were well acquainted with it, for they sometimes made use of it in order to test the lungs of their patients. There was great excitement in the country on the subject. Every town council and almost every quarter sessions had held a meeting to decide whether they would or would not adopt the Act; and they had appointed Inspectors, who were unable to discharge their duties because the model of the instrument had not been deposited as required by the Act. Certain officials appeared to think that, though the Act of Parliament had distinctly placed the carrying out of the measure in their charge, it did not properly come within their duties; and they referred the deputation to the Board of Trade. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. M. Gibson) received them courteously; but he said that there was nothing in the Act that gave the Board power to interfere. That was quite true, and the only reason he could assign for the manner in which the Act was drawn was, that he supposed its noble author (Lord Redesdale) was anxious to follow as closely as possible another Act of Parliament of a kindred character—the Weights and Measures Act.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the Board of Trade were not charged with any powers to carry the Gas Act into execution. About a week ago they were consulted by the Treasury as to the sufficiency of the Act for the object for which it was passed. After consideration they had come to the conclusion that the Act did not require any immediate amendment, and might be carried into execution. They had communicated their opinion to the Treasury; but otherwise they could not interfere, the Act giving to the Board of Trade no authority whatever.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, his excuse for troubling the House with a few observations must be that of all the speakers that addressed them, he should be the only one that made any remarks upon the Question really before the House—namely, the adjournment till Monday. There was a celebrated speech that they had all heard in their youth, of which these proceedings on a Friday evening always strongly reminded him. It began—Quousque tandem abutere patientia nostra? These conversations of two or three hours on every conceivable subject, forced the phrase irresistibly upon him. In allowing them they were guilty of the grossest abuse of the forms of the House; they were really neglecting the business of the country, and in ninety-nine out of every hundred of the questions that were thus raised, they were needlessly wasting the public time. The Standing Orders were distinct and explicit. They provided that—

“ Unless the House should otherwise direct, all Orders of the Day set down for Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, shall be disposed of before the House proceeded with any Motion of which notice shall have been given.”

But by the practice which had grown up they had virtually repealed that Standing Order so far as Fridays were concerned, because Notices were taken before they could proceed to the Orders of the Day. He had taken the trouble, as he sat wistfully looking at the clock, to note down the length of time which each of the discussions they had just heard had occupied. They began with the hon. Member for Finsbury, who took them into Kent, and for ten minutes occupied the House with observations on the subject of coroners—a matter which could hardly be of so much urgency as to require the immediate interference of Parliament. Then he was sorry to say that a Scotch Member spoke next. Scotch Members did not generally offend in this way as much as the representatives of any other parts of the United Kingdom; but to-night a Scotch Member had erred grievously against the forms of the House, and for 25 minutes he was discussing the claims of the Nabobs of the Carnatic, under the pretence of asking the Secretary for India whether he should have any objection to lay papers on the table. There was, in fact, another very objectionable practice growing up—of which they had had two examples that night—the practice of putting on the paper notice that on the Motion of the Adjournment of the House, he would ask the Minister of a certain subject whether he was prepared to lay certain papers on the table, and then making long speeches instead of reserving them for actual Motions for the production of the papers. In that manner speeches had been made that night on the Carnatic and on Savoy. Hon. Gentlemen had brought on discussions without giving any notice of them beyond a notice that they would each ask a simple question; and he trusted that to this practice the House would not give its sanction. Then for ten minutes the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham detained them with the Royal College at Sandhurst. Next came three or four minor Indian subjects. The question of the Indian Museum occupied the House for four or five minutes; and then extension of trade and intercourse with Central India took up another five minutes. The question about the army of India occupied another five minutes. Next came, as usual, an Irish debate, which occupied forty-five minutes, the subject being the removal of the Irish poor. No more important question affecting the comfort and welfare of masses of the community could be brought forward than the laws relating to the settlement and removal of the poor; but he (Mr. Bouverie) must protest against the idea of raising it in this incidental manner, which precluded those Members, who respected the forms of the House (which he always endeavoured to do), from expressing opinions which they might have come to after long and serious reflection upon the subject. Then came the hon. Member for Pontefract, who must forgive him for thinking that he was a great sinner in this respect. The hon. Gentleman consumed fifteen minutes on a point with which he (Mr. Bouverie) must say the House had properly nothing to do—he attempted to force the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give a sum of money, which the right hon. Gentleman, having a due regard to the public purse, thought it his duty to refuse. Next the hon. Member for Launceston carried them across the Atlantic, and for ten minutes discoursed on the French fortifications on the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, and on our rights under existing treaties. That was another very important subject; but he submitted that it ought to have been brought on by a formal notice, and then there might have been a proper debate upon it. Lastly, they had had a discussion of half an hour upon the all-important subject of Savoy, respecting which they had just heard a most interesting statement from the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. That statement was one that it was very desirable the House should be in possession of; the facts bore upon a subject which was agitating the mind of all Europe; but he must still contend that the time which had been chosen for communicating these facts was not a fitting occasion. The House had been exhausted by the conversations which had already taken place, and instead of a full House, and the Minister making his statement at five o'clock, there were hardly fifty members in the House. Hon. Gentlemen had gone home to dine (and he did not wonder at it); and they would be surprised when they came back at the end of two hours to learn what an important announcement had been made in this incidental manner by the Secretary of State. The more he saw of this practice the more he deprecated its continuance, and the more he was satisfied that it was damaging to the reputation of the House as a place of business. The only thing he could compare it to was a part of Mr. Albert Smith's performance at the Egyptian Hall. There was a song which Mr. Smith sang, and in which he introduced every topic of the day in rapid succession. This appeared to be the style of thing to which the House was gradually tending. The forms of the House would not permit him to repeat the Motion which he had made a short time ago, and which would have saved the House from these irregularities; but he would endeavour to do the next best thing in his power—he would give notice of his intention to move that this Motion for adjournment should be made on Thursday instead of on Friday. If hon. Members then chose to infringe upon their own privileges, and to make speeches on a Motion of adjournment, instead of taking their chance for precedence in the ballot for notices of Motion, it would be their own fault; and the business of the country would not at any rate be delayed four or five hours, Friday after Friday, in the way it was now.

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

WITH FRANCE.
t MAJESTY.

Is.—That HER Saturday next at One of the h the Address
ent on the subject of the Treaty of Commerce with France, and that the Lords had appointed the LORD STEWARD and the LORD CHAMBERLAIN of the HOUSEHOLD to attend HER MAJESTY therewith on the part of their Lordships, and do desire this House to appoint a proportionable number of its Members to go with them.

Ordered, That Mr. BYNG, Mr. BAINES, the VICE CHAMBERLAIN, and the COMPTROLLER of the HOUSEHOLD do go with the Lords mentioned in the said Message.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Lords, to acquaint them therewith; and that the Clerk do carry the said Message.

SUPPLY.—CHINA.—VOTE OF CREDIT.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT moved that the Speaker leave the Chair, in order to go into Committee of Supply.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he rose to move the Amendment of which he had given notice. He had intended to have brought this question forward at the opening of Parliament, as its importance demanded; but from various causes he was sorry to find that two months had elapsed before he could get an opportunity. It was true that a short discussion took place on the subject about a week ago, but it was postponed at the instance of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, who said he expected shortly to receive additional papers from Mr. Bruce. He understood the noble Lord had laid some despatches on the subject before the House in the early part of the evening, but he saw by the newspapers that Mr. Bruce was doing nothing, waiting for instructions from the noble Lord. Mr. Bruce was waiting for the noble Lord, and the noble Lord was waiting for Mr. Bruce. In the meantime a gigantic expedition was prepared, which he ventured to submit would cost far more than the £850,000, the amount of the Vote about to be asked for that purpose. He understood that the Government were not disposed to admit that the force would be so large as was generally supposed. But he had received a statement from a high source, asserting that the Indian Government were sending 18,000 British troops and between 7,000 and 8,000 Native troops from India. Artillery, and, he believed, a battering train, were being sent from this country, and there was besides a considerable force from France. Several thousand marines and seamen would also be employed on shore; so that the total force would approach very nearly to 40,000 men. It was possible that the Government had sent orders to reduce that force; and he hoped they had, for it was of portentous magnitude, and he did not know what 40,000 men could be required for. The Chinese were a most unwarlike people, and the least capable of any set of men of resisting even a small force. The employment, therefore, of an enormous force such as he had mentioned, excited apprehensions that some serious views of conquest were entertained. The question of expense was, then, involved in this matter, and, perhaps, an augmentation of the income tax next year. Upon this question of expense he believed that some entertained hopes that a considerable portion might be recovered from the Chinese in the way of indemnity; but he would read the emphatic language used by Lord Elgin in one of his despatches. The noble Lord stated:—

“ Among the difficult questions which I had to resolve at Tien-tsin no one gave me so much anxiety and annoyance as that of the amount to be exacted from the Chinese Government in name of indemnity. From a very early period in those negotiations both Baron Gros and I satisfied ourselves that it would be idle to attempt to extort money directly from the Imperial Government in the North. Everything we saw around us indicated the penury of the treasury. Nothing could be more miserable than the state of the high officers of the Imperial Government with whom we came in contact. The troops called together to defend the capital were, as we had reason to believe, unpaid. Under these circumstances we came to the conclusion that, on practical grounds, and apart from certain considerations of morality and justice which might, perhaps, have been urged on behalf of the Chinese Government, it would be unwise to drive it to despair, and, perhaps, to extreme measures of resistance, by putting forward pecuniary claims which it could satisfy only by resorting to measures that would increase its unpopularity and extend the area of rebellion in the empire. The power of passive endurance is not wanting to the Chinese character, and it was to be feared that the Emperor might make up his mind to brave the worst at our hands, rather than consent to render himself, as his father did after the last war with England, tax-gatherer, on an extensive scale, for foreigners. We resolved, therefore, that such pecuniary claims as we had to prefer should be regarded as a charge on the province of Canton exclusively; that the city should be held as a pledge for their payment; and that the Emperor should only be required to sanction our taking measures to recover them from the local authorities.”

Let the House consider how enormous would be the expense of the army now being sent to China. It must be borne in mind that the troops proceeding from the highest point, namely, India, would have to go 5,000 miles, and the stores must be transported 15,000 miles. These were matters which cost enormous sums. Some time ago he put a notice in the business paper with the view of inducing the Government to select some diplomatist of great experience to take charge of these important affairs now pending in China; and within the last few days it had been formally announced that Lord Elgin had been selected to proceed to China. That appointment put an end, to a certain degree, to the public anxiety as to the selection of the functionary to go out to China, because very considerable confidence was no doubt placed in the noble Lord's judgment, and the noble Lord might naturally be deemed the fittest person to obtain the ratification of the treaty he negotiated. He perceived from the despatches laid before the House that Lord Elgin was earnestly requested by Lord Malmesbury not to quit his post until he had completed the work so well begun. He supposed the noble Lord had authority to leave, but he thought it matter of regret that the noble Lord did not remain until the whole matter was finished. As he now wished to vary the terms of the Amendment he had given notice of upon the Motion for going into Committee of Supply, he would read the Amendment he desired to substitute. It was as follows:—

“ That humbly participating in the wish of Her Majesty, expressed in Her most gracious speech on the opening of this Session of Parliament—namely, that she will be gratified if the prompt acquiescence of the Emperor of China in the moderate demands which have been made upon him by the Allies shall obviate the necessity for the employment of force—this House is of opinion that the moderation of policy thus indicated on the part of Her Majesty and that of Her Ally the Emperor of the French will best contribute to diminish expenditure, avert complications, and to promote commerce, the interests of justice, and the establishment of peace.”

Sometimes trifling incidents gave rise to wars. He recollected one war that began in consequence of a hatchet being stolen from a farmer. In the present case, when there was to be a combination of the troops of the two countries, and when difficult circumstances were to be anticipated, it was desirable that every precaution against an unnecessary extension of operations should be taken. It appeared that this great force will be under the direction of two Plenipotentiaries, two Admirals, and two Generals. Now, if all these high functionaries acted harmoniously together, as it was to be hoped they would, such harmony would exceed any "happy family" that had ever been exhibited as yet. As material interests connected with the commerce of England were at stake, it was to be hoped that the Government of this country had arranged with the Government of France certain conditions, beyond which their operations would not extend. There were rumours that this expeditionary army was to be disembarked at the mouth of that river which had been the scene of so much disaster, and was then to march to Peking. He earnestly hoped that that might not be the case. No doubt this force, and probably one-fourth of it, would overthrow any Chinese force that could be opposed to it; but the consequence of marching a great army into the country might be serious. Hitherto, the two wars carried on against China had been on the seaboard, but this, it was said, was to be conducted by an inland operation. He did not pretend to say that some demonstration might not be necessary to restore the reputation of the British troops to a more satisfactory footing in the eyes of the Chinese Government; but he hoped that the passage in Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne expressing a hope that the employment of force would not be required would not remain a dead letter, but that the moderate demands which the Plenipotentiaries had been instructed to make, would obviate the necessity for the employment of force. They might expect that such would be the case the more confidently, seeing that the noble Lord himself and other distinguished members of the Cabinet had on a former occasion very strongly deprecated operations against China. The condition of the country would certainly place great, almost insuperable, difficulties in the way of the troops, and he did not see how batteries of artillery could be worked upon such roads as lay between Tien-tsin and the capital, unless expenditure were disregarded and no resistance encountered. The reason why the French joined so readily in this expedition was, he supposed, that they had a very large army without a present European war wherein to employ it, and this Chinese conflict was perhaps meant as a temporary amusement or occupation for the French soldiery till something more serious turned up. He would not object to our sending a powerful force if France did the same—to be sure we were 10,000 miles nearer the scene of action—but he did not see why we should send double the force of our Ally. He hoped that the noble Lord would immediately inform the House that an agreement on this subject had been entered into with the French Government, and relieve their minds from the apprehension that it had been left loose and indefinite, at the mercy of this diplomatist or that general. The two Governments ought to lay down a definite basis for this proceeding, which was one of very great moment. If they neglected to do so, it was quite possible the expenses of the expedition might swell beyond all calculations, perhaps to eight or ten millions. The hon. and gallant General concluded by moving—

"That humbly participating in the wish of Her Majesty, expressed in Her most gracious speech on the opening of this Session of Parliament—namely, that she will be gratified if the prompt acquiescence of the Emperor of China in the moderate demands which have been made upon him by the allies shall obviate the necessity for the employment of force—this House is of opinion that the moderation of policy thus indicated on the part of Her Majesty and that of Her Ally the Emperor of the French will best contribute to diminish expenditure, avert complications, and to promote commerce, the interests of justice, and the establishment of peace.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: In regard to the question last raised by my hon. and gallant Friend—namely, the military operations in China—it would obviously be unwise and impolitic to publish the exact instructions given to the military and naval commanders; and, besides, it would also be exceedingly unwise to make those instructions so strict and positive that the officers commanding, at a distance of 10,000 or 15,000 miles from home, would be tied up to a particular course, in whatever circumstances they might find themselves. I therefore cannot give the military and naval instructions. My hon. and gallant Friend says it is not desirable that the troops should march upon Peking. Undoubtedly it is not, and we have always expressed our desire that it may not be necessary. But, in the event of all reasonable terms being rejected by the Chinese, it will be the duty of the troops to proceed to Peking; and it would be not only unwise, but a departure from duty, for us to give particular instructions that there should be no marching upon the capital under any circumstances. The terms of negotiation have not yet been finally settled, on account of circumstances which have lately occurred. Instructions have been drawn up by Lord

Elgin in which the French Government generally concur; but there are some points upon which they wish for further explanation. Her Majesty's Government thought that the best way, under these circumstances, would be for Lord Elgin, who was very well acquainted with Baron Gros, and had acted with him in a very cordial manner, to go to Paris and consult with him as to the points on which explanation was required. One point of very great importance was, whether the two negotiators, Lord Elgin and Baron Gros, each of them having the full trust and confidence of their respective Governments, should have supreme authority over the naval and military commanders, and have the power of stopping operations whenever they should think it advisable to do so. It is a very right principle that they should possess that power; but at the same time it requires modification, for the naval or military commanders might be so situated that it would be impossible for them to stop operations at a particular moment with safety to the troops and ships. That and other points are still under discussion; no final conclusion, as far as I have yet heard from Lord Elgin, has been come to in regard to them. I shall say a few words as to the necessity for the display of military force. It is evident that when 400 or 500 men were killed and wounded by an ambuscade, without any sort of notice, the lives and property of Europeans in that country could not be safe unless in one way or another reparation were made for that outrage. ["Hear, hear!"] He observed that some hon. Gentlemen seem to doubt that this was done without notice; but what occurred was simply this:—When Mr. Bruce said he was going to the mouth of the Peiho, he expressed the hope that he should be allowed to go up with a vessel sufficient to carry himself and his retinue to Tien-tsin, and that he might be conveyed in an honourable manner from thence to the capital. That proposal was not met by a positive refusal. On the contrary, the Commissioners at Shanghai said they would communicate it to the Court at Peking, and get an answer in regard to it; the time, however, which they required for that purpose was unreasonably long. When Mr. Bruce reached the mouth of the Peiho the people said there were no authorities on the spot, that they were acting without orders, that they had merely put up the stakes in the river as a protection against pirates, and that they were not authorized to say anything to the British Ambassador. Whether Mr. Bruce was right or wrong in the course he took, it is quite clear that he and Admiral Hope went up to the barrier without any notice having been given to them that their passage up the river was to be obstructed. That being the case, and the loss inflicted on us being so severe, it was necessary that some reparation should be insisted upon. The demands we made were exceedingly moderate. We required, of course, that the treaty which had been concluded, and waited only for ratification, should be carried out. We demanded also an apology for the outrage which had been committed. That being done, we proposed that our Minister should go up in a peaceable manner to Peking, and that there the ratification of the treaty should take place. Considering that we are at the expense of a considerable armament, more reasonable proposals than these could not well be made. If they are refused and the armament should arrive there, then Mr. Bruce was instructed to ask for a large indemnity. I do not think we could propose anything less than this; and if these moderate terms are not accepted, then the treaty and the other stipulations will have to be enforced by arms. The strength of the expedition will by no means be so great as my hon. and gallant Friend imagines, but we trust and believe it will prove sufficient for the enforcement of our proposals. No one can lament the whole matter more than I do. We do not go to China to form alliances against other Powers. We have no question of boundaries to settle there, or any disputes of the kind that arise in connection with the affairs of Europe or America. What we have to do there is merely to trade; but for the purposes of trade we must have security for the persons and property of our countrymen. Our trade has enormously increased of late years. The trade of Shanghai, for instance, has sprung up since the Treaty of Nankin, and has already assumed considerable proportions. Being a large trade, a great number of persons are engaged in it, and disputes of various kinds are liable to occur. It is therefore desirable that our Minister in that country should be able to resort to the chief authorities, when necessary, and that he should not be confined to Canton, having to deal with petty officials, and to wait months for the conveyance of messages to and the return of answers from Peking. It is necessary that our Minister should have the power of going to Peking, with free access to the authorities there. I do not think we ought to be content with the proposition in the American Treaty that the Minister should go to Peking only on matters of business, and come away again directly. That is not enough. Our Minister ought to have the option of being at Peking whenever he thinks necessary. It may be found more for our interest and convenience that the Minister should reside at Shanghai, and only go occasionally to Peking, still I think that the condition which Lord Elgin inserted in the Treaty is essential and ought to be insisted on. I have only further to say that Lord Elgin will soon return from Paris and proceed upon his mission to Peking. There is no man more anxious to maintain the most peaceful relations with China than my noble Friend Lord Elgin. He is esteemed by the people of that country, and he has a strong desire for their welfare. Both he and Baron Gros are animated by the most pacific sentiments, and we have thought we could not do better than ask Lord Elgin and Baron Gros to go out again as our Plenipotentiaries to arrange our differences with the Chinese Government.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he had listened to the speech of the noble Lord in the hope that he would have laid before the House some plan of a comprehensive policy for regulating our future relations with China, and for bringing to a close the discreditable position we had hitherto occupied in that country. He wished the House to look back to the period when the Government first undertook the responsibility of communicating with the Emperor, and to allow him to retrace what had since occurred. In 1832, when the charter of the East India Company came to an end, a different state of things was forced upon the Chinese Government. Instead of the monopoly that existed on the part of the East India Company, when a disciplined force acted under treaty engagements, and everything was conducted in an orderly manner, the trade was thrown open to persons who looked to China as an El Dorado. The Government sent out a nobleman (Lord Napier) as superintendent of trade, who was neither charged with the powers of a Plenipotentiary nor backed by a suitable force, but who landed at Canton in the dead of night, and who was accredited to no one but the head of the police and the Customs authorities of Canton. He was invited, the trade was stopped, and almost every one who had anything to lose left the country. He (Sir James Elphinstone) was there at the time, and therefore spoke with a personal knowledge of the facts. Lord Napier's death brought that state of things to an end, and for three or four years afterwards the trade was carried on under the most irregular circumstances. The seizure of opium, the burning of the factories, and a series of outrages upon British subjects led to the first Chinese war. The Government sent out Sir Henry Pottinger as Plenipotentiary, and he concluded the Treaty of Nankin, after hostilities that brought the Chinese Government into great disrepute with their subjects. That treaty was called a seven years' settlement. It was clearly impossible that the relations of the two countries could long rest upon the basis of that treaty. British subjects were exposed to indignities of every description; they were massacred and murdered; they were confined to the neighbourhood of Canton; the city of Canton, contrary to treaty engagements, was closed against them; and the affair of the Arrow was only the culminating point in the long list of injuries and indignities. He thought that Her Majesty's Government were perfectly in the right in this question of the Arrow, because if they allowed vessels that carried the British licence to be interfered with, the commerce of our settlements in those seas would soon fall to the ground. He should, therefore, have supported the Government of the noble Viscount in this dispute with the Chinese Government if he had had the honour of a seat in Parliament at that time. The second Chinese war resulted in the mission of Lord Elgin. In his belief, the whole of the operations of that war, up to the point when Lord Elgin left China, were conducted with singular ability, not only by our Plenipotentiary, but also by the gallant Admiral who commanded our naval forces (Sir M. Seymour). We then had another treaty, which, although it was an improvement on that of Sir Henry Pottinger, was not framed in that comprehensive spirit and regard to the future which ought to have characterized it. Lord Elgin was now going out again, and he trusted that in any future treaty the noble Lord might conclude provision would be made for placing our trade on such a footing that it could be carried on peaceably in future, humanizing and civilizing the Chinese, and giving us greater influence with the Chinese Court. As regarded military operations he differed with the noble Lord as to the plan of operations he had appeared to shadow out, for, in his opinion, it would be a fatal mistake for the troops to advance upon Peking. No doubt the insult perpetrated upon us deserved retribution; but, in the first instance, it ought to be put before the Chinese as demanding an ample apology and an indemnity large enough to compensate us for the loss of our vessels and material and compensation to those who were injured or their relatives. That was, he thought, as far as we could well go at the outset, failing such a settlement. He would then reduce the forts of the Pehio, but he would be very chary of going further in that direction. He should fall back, and take up the strategic position we ought to occupy, which was to hold the city of Nankin. He had always held that that city was the strategic point which we ought to occupy in China, and which would enable us completely to command that empire. He who held it would have a complete control over all the great producing districts, by the possession which it would give him of the command of all the commercial arteries of the country, and it would then be impossible for the Emperor to collect his revenue or exercise the powers of Government. He (Sir James Elphinstone) would first, therefore, take possession of the Taku forts, and then fall back upon Nankin, where he would make it known to the inhabitants that we were prepared to maintain order and to receive their produce. But if our forces were to go to Peking the fleet must start in the month of April; some time would be required to reduce the Taku forts, and the month of August would have arrived before the troops could have got to the Chinese capital. Now, it was the opinion of every person acquainted with China that in that event the Emperor would retire into Mantchouria. He had not himself a doubt upon that point. Our army would then have to maintain order among a vast and turbulent rabble; they would have to spend the winter under a climate in which the thermometer sometimes fell to 20 or 30 degrees below zero, and their communications would be cut off by myriads of Tartars. They had all heard of the disasters of Cabul, and it would be too much in one lifetime to suffer from a similar calamity. Our troops might be able to overthrow any army which could be mustered against them, but the Chinese would probably not collect together that we might butcher them. Asiatics would not fight under our conditions, and of all Asiatics the Chinese were the most subtle and ingenious. They would do everything to prevent our march to Peking, and, when there, would, no doubt, do everything to make our stay as unpleasant as possible. Now, the policy he recommended was one which would checkmate the Emperor at starting, and to do this we ought to take possession of Nankin with a force of gunboats. This would enable us to keep the internal navigation of the country clear, and silk and tea would come to us down the tributaries; the atrocities alike of the rebels and the Imperialists would be prevented; the prosperity and safety of the producing districts would be insured; and the Emperor would at the same time be cut off from the fairest portion of his dominions and forced into a negotiation which, under proper management, would end in a more permanent settlement of the question. This, in his opinion, was the true solution of the Chinese difficulty. With regard to the rebellion, there seemed to be considerable misapprehension. It was of no recent occurrence, but appeared to have existed, more or less, from time immemorial. In 1820, when he went out to China, the rebels were in force in the province of Quangtung. The Chinese authorities then got Americans to fight for them, and one of these, a man named M'Gee, kept a public-house, was made a mandarin of the peacock's feather, and used to wait at dinner with his peacock's feather on. In 1849 a sort of semi-Christian movement took place in this province quite distinct from the normal rebellion with which, however, it became speedily identified, but our policy throughout had been of the most vacillating kind. Sometimes we supported the rebels, sometimes the Government; and all this time much of the Chinese coasting trade was thrown into the hands of foreigners, or the Chinese merchants had to pay black-mail for its convoy and protection from piracy. Unless the Government of Great Britain was in a position to take the Chinese Government into their own hands they were not warranted in weakening the power of the existing Imperial Government. The rebels had never carried on a regular Government of any kind, but had been guilty of rapine and murder wherever they went. The only chance of maintaining order and authority in China was to strengthen the hands of the existing Government; and this was the view taken by Lord Elgin in one of his despatches addressed to Lord Clarendon. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, in the statement he had just made to the House, seemed to point to a demand for indemnification from China; but unless we laid hold of the export duties of the country we had no means of obtaining indemnity from that people. In the despatch from Lord Elgin read by the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster the great poverty of the Chinese was clearly pointed out, and he observed that it was unwise to put forward pecuniary claims upon them in such circumstances.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL said, the claim insisted on in the Treaty of Tien-tsin was £1,200,000, as compensation for losses sustained by Her Majesty's subjects.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE: Yes, but the noble Lord now asked for an indemnity for the great armaments we were sending out to China. He told the noble Lord that it was impossible to obtain it. We had the Persian expedition to guide us in our calculations as to the probable expense of this expedition to China. The Persian expedition only lasted about five months, the distance from Bombay was 1,500 miles, and the sum the country was called upon to pay in order to meet the expenses of that expedition was £2,225,000. How much more than that amount was laid upon our willing horse, the empire of India, he never could ascertain correctly, but it was said that the whole cost of the Persian expedition amounted to £3,750,000, and it is most probable that it did not greatly, if at all, fall short of that sum. But that amount was expended upon a small force going a distance of 1,500 miles. Now, the distance from Bombay to the mouth of the Peiho was 5,000 miles, from Calcutta 4,700 miles, and from Madras 4,800 miles. The contrast price of coal for the expedition to the Peiho is £3 per ton. The horses, artillery, and attendants upon an army of 10,000 or 12,000 men, going such a distance, must be much larger than the number which was required for the Persian expedition; and the basis of the operations being India, the army must necessarily carry the greater part of its supplies with it. But supposing the whole thing to be done in a few months—though he did not expect it would take less than twelve months before the expedition could be at an end—and supposing it would be necessary to leave a force in the country to enforce the carrying out of the provisions of the treaty, in that case his belief was that they would not get out of this Chinese war at a less cost than £10,000,000. And all this was to be incurred at a time when they had a deficiency of £7,000,000 or £8,000,000, of which no account was taken, but which must eventually come out of the pockets of the people; and with a large deficiency and no adequate amount allowed for the expenses of the Chinese expedition, the result to this country would be disastrous. That was the reason why he had steadily opposed the financial measures of the present Government. As to the French, he could not conceive what brought them into this Chinese matter at all. During the sixteen years when he was in the habit of going backwards and forwards to China, he found the whole of the French trade to that country represented by one ship, that brought out claret to China and took back some toys and green tea, and silk piece goods. He believed that that trade had lately increased, but he was sorry to say, in a most unfavourable direction; namely, in the carrying Coolies, which was neither more nor less than a system of slavery. This trade had been gradually increasing of late years, and had now reached a very unsupportable pitch. It was spreading throughout China a distrust and hatred of the Europeans, and especially of the English, because the inhabitants of China could not draw the distinction between us and the French nation in regard to this obnoxious trade, believing us to be the great promoters of that trade, because we were the only nation that appeared to have commercial transactions with them to any great extent. Now he was of opinion that this Coolie question was a most serious one, and must be dealt with summarily by us. He had heard nothing said by the Government as to the propriety of putting a question to the French Government upon this subject, and it was one that was eating into the vitals of our Chinese trade, and would continue to do so until we took up the matter as we ought to do and settled it. Before he sat down he wished to impress upon the Government that they ought by no means to take the control of the army and fleets out of the hands of the military and naval commanders after a definite policy had been decided upon; because if an Ambassador, having the control, proposed to concentrate the forces on a given point, the Admiral in command, when two nations were co-operating, would often be embarrassed in the discharge of the service in consequence of having to consult the officers of the other nation with whom he was acting. Their great object in China now was to obtain by a permanent treaty arrangement the commodities which they went there to purchase, and in doing so they ought at all times to act as Christian merchants, to support the Imperial Government, defend the honour of our flag, and abstain from shedding the blood of the inhabitants in unnecessary quarrels, and to carry on all their transactions in the spirit of peace and justice.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, when the speech in which the Session of Parliament was opened met my eyes, and when I came to the paragraph which referred to these unhappy transactions in China, I confess I was glad to see, or to think, that the tone of that paragraph was moderate, and indicated a disposition on the part of Her Majesty's Government to avoid any re-opening of the war with China. I presume that the Resolution which has been moved by the hon. and gallant Gentleman below me is a Resolution rather calling upon the House to support the Government in the policy which was indicated in Her Majesty's Speech. The words of it are such as I imagine every Member would be quite willing to support with his vote, and such as the Foreign Secretary would be ready to accept. There is another object, as it appears to me, in proposing this Resolution—namely, to afford the noble Lord an opportunity of making the statement which, on some previous evening, he gave the House to understand he would make on Chinese affairs. With that statement I confess I am a good deal disappointed; for he has not told us a single thing, except that the amount of force to be sent to China is only about half as much as that which had been stated by my hon. Friend near me. It appears to me that on occasions of this nature, when the country may possibly be dragged into a bloody and most costly contest, it is the duty of the Minister for Foreign Affairs to be a little more explicit to the House. We have had before us, on another occasion, a case which has to pay for it. We are apparently involved in another transaction, which I think the most robust conscience in this House can never regard in the light of an honourable cause. Let us for a moment—and I shall not take up the time of the House more than a very few minutes—trace the progress of these transactions. I will not go back to the original Chinese war, which was about as bad as anything could be, but to that war which was commenced by the indiscretion—to use no harsher term—of Sir John Bowring, the English Plenipotentiary—which was based on a fraud,—upon that which the House of Commons has condemned as a positive lie; and although when there was a dissolution of Parliament a majority was returned to support the Minister who was then in office, yet no attempt has ever been made—and I think no Minister would ever pretend to attempt—to induce the House of Commons to reverse the judgment to which it came on that occasion; and I believe there is now scarcely a dissentient opinion throughout the country as to the folly and guilt of that transaction. One way or other that war came to an end, and a treaty was made under the auspices of a noble Lord who is at present a Member of the Cabinet. There was, in the negotiation of that treaty, a grave error committed. There seemed to be a constant disposition to introduce something into it which should be a special cause of aggravation to the Chinese, but which could be of no use to the trade or the political interests of this country; and one thing was insisted upon which has hitherto been unheard of in China—namely, that an English Minister should take up his residence at Peking. It is a question open to discussion whether it is worth while to keep a Minister at any Court in the world—it is a question whether it would not be much better that all your Ambassadors should be withdrawn; and that when any difficulty arose between the Government of this country and any foreign Government you should send out a Minister for the special purpose of dealing with it. But, however, this question may be decided, that man must have a wonderful notion of English policy or English commerce who thinks that anything can be gained by picking up some inexperienced or some needy diplomatist—though I would not apply the term needy to this case—and sending him to reside at Peking, where he will be the least comfortable, and perhaps the very least wanted. That clause was inserted in the treaty, I believe, with the special object of humiliating the Chinese, and to give a proof of the absolute supremacy and triumph which the arms of England had obtained over the feeble Government of China. Now, to turn from the question of the treaty, to the question of its ratification—I do not understand why, in the midst of a political affair of this nature, a nobleman who had been the Minister who had arranged this treaty should not have stayed until the ratification was complete. There may have been reasons for his return that I do not know of, and it may be that the Minister who succeeded him has been, as compared with other men in the subordinate situations he has filled, fit for the position. He is a gentleman whom I never saw, of whom I know nothing, except for this transaction—indeed, I never heard his name until he went to China, and we found him engaged in a transaction so calamitous to this country and so calamitous also to the Government and people of China. In this second case I maintain that we are just as wrong as we were in the case of Sir John Bowring at Canton. All the arguments which the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs used in 1857 would, to my thinking, be valid against the case which he has undertaken in some sort to apologize for to-night. The noble Lord spoke of treachery that was exhibited towards the forces of England; but we have it on the authority of an English officer who was engaged in this sanguinary and unhappy affair, a gentleman holding the rank of captain, and connected with a high dignity of the Church, who says there was no treachery whatever. And, more than that, if the Chinese had intended to be treacherous or to lay an ambush, he says that not a single vessel could have escaped, nor a single person on board have survived, had the Chinese taken the opportunity that was afforded them for firing on the squadron and inflicting such damage upon it as was open to them to do. The fact is, it is not worth our while, as sensible men, involved in the discredit and guilt of this transaction, to try and cover it up by charges of treachery against the Chinese. The charge is one of utter folly and imbecility on the part of our own Minister, and, notwithstanding all that may be said of the valour of the Admiral, of great indiscretion on his part. I hold that prudence and valour are twins and go together. Together they do great things; but separate they end in disasters like this. I have no patience to hear in this House Gentlemen getting up and praising the valour of the commanders of vessels on occasions like this. Every man in the fleet, I suppose, showed equal valour; but the 400 or 500 men who were sacrificed on that occasion were sacrificed to the bad arrangements of the Admiral and the utter folly of the Minister. That is an opinion which I do not offer as my own, but as that of men who served in China, and the opinion, I undertake to say, of 99 out of 100 of all reflecting men in England who have read the narrative of this miserable transaction. Up to that point no one can blame the present Government. The noble Lord had just taken office in the very week in which this business took place in the Peiho; therefore he is not to be blame for what happened 15,000 miles away; but I think neither he nor his colleagues showed afterwards that judgment which might have been expected from men placed in responsible positions when they heard the accounts of this transaction. It appears to me no man could read the despatches and narrative, whether they came direct from the Chinese papers or from the correspondent in China of a London paper, or from Indian papers, or from private letters, or any other source, but that he must come to the conclusion that Mr. Bruce has been guilty of a great want of judgment, the consequence of which has been a most disastrous failure. But what has been done with a man who has shown a great lack of judgment and has failed disastrously? I do not pretend to say that I, or any other man may, not sometimes have failed in judgment; we may fail in many affairs of life:—but surely when a Minister placed in this responsible position 15,000 miles from home commits errors so grievous as to bring about results so startling and alarming to the people of this country, the first thing the Government should do would be not to continue such a man in an office of such responsibility, but to replace him by some one in whom the Government and country could hope to find a sounder judgment and better discretion. Nothing can be so absurd to my mind as negotiating with a people through a Minister who has just failed in the first and only transaction he has had with them, and whose mind must necessarily be irritated by his want of success; because, instead of going to them with a mind unbiassed, entertaining generous sentiments and such regard for the people as the case admitted of, together with a sincere wish that both nations might live in amity with each other, his mind must be in a state of irritation at his own defeat. I say it is not possible to pick out from the whole world a man—considering equal competency in other respects—who would be so entirely unfitted to have the conduct of these further negotiations or operations, whatever they may be, as Mr. Bruce, who since these transactions has been continued as our Minister in China. If Gentlemen will read his despatches they will see that he never was fit for the office, because they will find that he commenced his negotiations in a spirit of what I must call most unfair suspicion and distrust. Almost every expression that he uses is one which shows how much he was disposed to affront rather than to consult the feelings of those with whom he was about to negotiate, and, in fact, he appears to make a positive claim to the confidence of his employers, the Government at home, because he wishes to do things precisely in that manner most calculated to mortify and humiliate the dignitaries of the Chinese empire. Well, if he was not fit for his office then, can he be fit for it now? If he be so great a man that Kwelliang, the Prime Minister over 300,000,000 of people, was not sufficiently great a man to meet him, then, if you trust your future negotiations to him, I should not have the smallest expectation of their coming to a successful result; and I think the estimate of expense which the hon. Member for Portsmouth has laid before the House probably falls short of the bill that will ultimately have to be paid by us. But now the noble Lord, doing tardily that which some months ago ought to have been done, proposes to send Lord Elgin out again, with the hope that he may terminate this unhappy state of affairs. I am not able to say whether Lord Elgin is the most suitable man for the purpose; but from his experience and knowledge of Chinese affairs he would appear to be so. If he can clear his mind of all feeling, exasperation, or anything akin to that which Mr. Bruce has felt, then I do not know why he may not be as good a man for the purpose as any other man. Possibly, the failure of his brother may have this beneficial effect upon him, that he may be anxious by his own conciliatory conduct to close this dismal chapter, and he may be anxious by his own conduct of affairs to veil the misfortune of his relative, and therefore he may prove, in the end, the most suitable man to send out to China. I find no fault with the selection of that noble Lord, for I presume there can hardly be a greater difficulty for a Minister than to select a suitable person to fill a most responsible and difficult position on the other side of the globe. I think the noble Lord should begin his instructions—which instructions, by the by, we are not allowed to know anything about—by not insisting upon that part of the treaty which requires that an English Minister should reside at Peking. I confess, as I said before, I can see no advantage that could be gained to the trade or policy of this country by our Minister residing at Peking; but if we are more powerful, and can send fleets and armies without stint to break up a great nation that has existed for centuries before we were heard of—if we can do all this, it is not necessary to use all this vast power in so ungenerous a manner as to annoy and insult the supreme governor of 300 or 400 millions of people. If the noble Lord at the head of the Government should speak to-night, or on any future occasion, I hope he will tell us what is the good to be expected from establishing Mr. Bruce, or Mr. Bruce's successor, at Peking. If he can show that the good is something greatly overbalancing the evil, then we can consider it; but it seems to me to be—to use a rather favourite expression of the day—going to war for “an idea,” and that idea about as stupid a one as ever entered into the head of any statesman. Now, on one point the hon. Member for Portsmouth has referred to I should like to make a few observations. The course being taken before going into this new war,—or this new crime, I do not know any other word for it—is one of an alliance with another nation. I am not one of those who are always expressing distrust of the Emperor of the French; I speak with respect on all occasions of the Emperor of the French, the Emperor of Austria, and all the Powers that rule in all countries, as much as any person with whom I am acquainted. But this may be the case—the objects of another Government may be different from the objects of this Government. The noble Lord has told us there is no convention with France as to this transaction; no specific agreement between the two countries as to what they are going to war for, what are to be the terms of peace, how the cost is to be defrayed, or if either Power intends to retain any territory in China. All these points were arranged before the Russian war; but they have not been arranged before the Chinese war; and we may be dragged into complications in China that will cause immeasurable evil there, and lead afterwards to serious complications and unpleasantness nearer home. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot feel very happy if he heard the speech of the hon. Member for Portsmouth, and his estimate of the probable expenses of this war. As to expense, it appears to me that the country and Parliament have become absolutely drunk on the question. The "words of truth and soberness," such as I endeavour to speak on this subject, are treated as if I were talking of the affairs of the people of another planet, which we have nothing on earth to do with. Here is a great toiling nation of 30,000,000 of inhabitants, increasing every census, with its exports doubling every few years, its population enjoying itself more and more; this is the vast reservoir from which Parliament and the Chancellor of the Exchequer think they can draw inexhaustible streams of wealth, to pay the cost of a policy so idiotic as this we are pursuing in China. I believe the hon. Member for Portsmouth is right in all his calculations and estimates of the cost of the expedition. The calculations we have heard from the Treasury Bench are the mere fringes of that immense mass of cost that must come down on us, if we live to another year. Hon. Gentlemen opposite charge me with having some special affection for the present tenants of that bench. I have always felt a great interest in everybody who has been powerful on that bench since I have had a seat in this House, when I thought they pursued a course in harmony with the true interests of the country and the opinions I have formed of what is necessary for those true interests. I do not blame the Government for any considerable wrong they have done, because they came into this transaction as a legacy of misfortune from their predecessors. But when I approach this Chinese question I confess I think the Government stands on grounds so slippery that I should not be in the least surprised if in the next Session of Parliament—should they be living as a Government, as I hope they may—they find themselves engulfed by this very Chinese question, which has once before caused political changes in this House. When that discussion took place three years ago I was spending some weeks in the city of Rome. I there received a letter from the hon. Member for Rochdale, written immediately after that division; speaking of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech, I recollect well that he said it was "a marvel of persuasive eloquence." That is true; I have heard the statement confirmed by others who listened to that speech. But the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion was speaking on behalf of great principles of justice, and telling the House that what is called the prestige of England is valueless to the nation if it is not based on an equitable policy to other nations. I am not charging the Government with having been inequitable, nor blaming them for transactions of which they are not guilty. I am only warning them against two things—first, against forming a partnership with another Power in transactions which, in connection with another Power, they cannot control; next, against making demands on the Government of China based only on the disaster caused by the folly of their own Minister, and which they have no right, in the sight of God or man, to make. Looking back on our transactions with China during the last few years, I believe nothing more vicious can be found in our history; no page of our annals is more full of humiliation, because full of crime, than that on which is recorded our transactions with China; and, because I feel this—because I wish the Government to live and prosper—because I wish this House to stand in honour before the country—because I wish the country to hold a position of repute and morality before the world, therefore it is I warn the Government and this House against proceeding with a policy which no man here can say in his conscience is not a policy conducted in defiance of the laws of Heaven, and those principles of justice without which human society itself cannot be held together.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Sir, the hon. Member for Portsmouth appears to have misconceived what fell from the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), from the emphatic manner in which he has warned the Government against giving instructions for our forces to advance to Peking. The hon. Member's speech is, however, inconsistent in its main principles. The hon. Member's policy consists of an advance on Nankin, which he admits is at this time in the hands of the rebels, or left an utter desert and waste; and he endeavoured to show that we ought to advance upon that city, not for the purpose of putting a temporary pressure on the Chinese Government, but with a view of permanently retaining it. Now, Nankin is either a waste or in the hands of a body of the Chinese people, with whom we are not at war. Our object has been to localize the war as much as possible—to show that we are engaged in hostilities with the Government only, and wish the people to suffer as little as possible. The hon. Member says Nankin ought to be permanently annexed. [Sir J. ELPHINSTONE: Occupied.] Well, “annex” and “occupy” are nearly convertible terms. But I am certain Her Majesty’s Government will not be disposed to adopt his advice. Nothing could be more disastrous than saddling ourselves with a tract of country which must involve us in hostilities, and could be but of little use. Then the hon. Gentleman quarrelled with the moderation of the terms of the Government. He blames it for having only required the ratification of the treaty as it stood, and that it has not demanded any indemnity for the war, though he had before said the country is so impoverished it would be impossible to get any. I think the hon. Member’s warning that the English and French troops should not march too far into the interior is superfluous. If there are any two armies in the world that do not require a warning against advancing on Nankin, up a river frozen in winter, through an immense population, relatively to which any army must be small, they are the armies of France and England. The English army has the recollections of Cabul, and we should not be willing to incur any similar disaster. The French army, too, has advanced on foreign capitals, from which it barely returned, and could cite its own experience against the attempt. The hon. Member has referred to the difficulties in some of the Chinese towns caused by the Coolie emigration; a very valuable officer, Mr. Austen, has directed his special attention to this subject; and I hope other European nations are accommodating themselves to our mode of conducting the traffic, and that complications with the Chinese from this cause will be prevented. Now let me come to the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham. He said, with great truth, that this is not a question which the two sides of the House need discuss with asperity; for both have been engaged in the transactions that led to the mishap of the Peiho. The instructions were originally given by Lord Clarendon, and adopted by Lord Malmesbury. Mr. Bruce was, I believe, appointed by Lord Malmesbury. There can, therefore, be no party recriminations as to the misfortunes that have occurred. But he also says the treaty bargained for things not necessary. I have no wish to say a single word in defence of the treaty of Tien-tsin. I have an opinion of my own on Chinese matters. Looking back on all the history of our transactions with China, I think we have there been “in a wrong groove,” and it is very difficult to get out of it. But I hope the statesmanship of the noble Earl who is about to go to China may obtain for us a better footing there. It may be true that the treaty imposes upon the Chinese conditions which they did not anticipate, and conferred upon us certain advantages. But, at the same time, two Governments represented on both sides of the House have adopted the treaty, so that it constitutes, as it were, a point of departure. Now, it is possible that there is no necessity that there should be an English Minister resident at Peking. Lord Elgin appeared to be of that opinion; for, although he stipulated for the right of being able to go to head-quarters in case any difficulty should arise, he at the same time assured the Chinese Government that, except on those occasions upon which some misconduct on the part of its officials gave cause for complaint, the English Minister would not insist upon going to Peking and residing there. Indeed, he rather held the occurrence of such an event in terrorem over them, in case the Chinese Government should act with injustice towards British subjects. But be that as it may, the Treaty at Tien-tsin is now a fait accompli, and has been accepted by both sides of the House, and its ratification must therefore be insisted on. We have not, even subsequent to the attack at the mouth of the Peiho, attached any onerous conditions to that ratification. All, indeed, that we have demanded is that the ratification should take place. It must be borne in mind that the question is one which was beset with great difficulties. The affair of the Peiho took place on the 25th of June. When the news with respect to it reached us, we had to decide upon the conduct of our officers in a remote part of the world. It is also but just to Mr. Bruce to state that his was a very difficult position; he was perplexed by the vacillation of the Chinese plenipotentiaries at Shanghai ; he had to contend during the whole summer with the duplicity of their diplomacy. I do not reproach the Chinese functionaries on this account, because I am not quite sure that duplicity quite as glaring did not characterize the diplomacy of European nations boasting the highest civilization, within a period stretching not quite so far back as the end of the last century, nor am I sure it is quite free from it even now. At all events, Mr. Bruce saw that the object of the Chinese was to frustrate by delay the object which he had in view. He accordingly proceeded to the mouth of the Peiho, and he found on his arrival there the entrance barricaded. I may here observe that I think the hon. Member for Birmingham is slightly in error in the expressions on this point to which he gave utterance, for it does not follow that an ambuscade is not resorted to with a treacherous design because it does not succeed. There is, at all events, no doubt that our officers went up to the barricade in perfect good faith. When they reached it they found no flags flying, and no men of rank came down to receive them. The issue was, as we are all aware, that a battery opened on them and that great slaughter took place. Now, that being so, it is quite clear that, whatever may have been the wisdom of our policy towards China in former years, we have now but one course to pursue with respect to that country. We may hope to obtain the ratification of the Treaty of Tien-tsin without bloodshed, but it is, I contend, absurd to approach the Chinese with that object without making some demonstration of force to show that we are capable of carrying our wishes into effect. It is very easy, I cannot help saying, to be wise after the event, and to criticise the conduct of men with the view of showing that they have displayed a great want of judgment. But that is not exactly a fair way of looking at the matter, and, when we are told that the Americans negotiated successfully with the Chinese, it must be borne in mind that they merely asked to be allowed to come within the scope of the most favoured nation clause, and that their privileges in the matter were greatly facilitated by the negotiations of Lord Elgin and the presence of an English fleet. The truth is that the Chinese look upon all "whites," whether Europeans or Americans, as members almost of the same nation, and what they had granted to one nation they would never think of refusing to another. With regard to those persons who have censured the proceedings in China, I will remind them that it is easy to be wise after the event, and to criticise the conduct of men acting at a great distance from home and surrounded by difficulties; but let me suppose that Admiral Hope had succeeded in silencing the fire of the Chinese batteries, and had accomplished his purpose, nothing would then, I imagine, be said in derogation of the judgment displayed by Mr. Bruce. But, passing from that point, I have the strongest expectation that Lord Elgin on his arrival in China will be able to place this question on a better footing. He possesses, in my opinion, many of the qualities which are necessary to effect that object. He has great local experience. He it is who made the Treaty of Tien-tsin, and he must be in a peculiar manner desirous that peace should be established on a durable and permanent basis. You cannot, moreover, read the blue-books connected with this subject without perceiving that he is inclined to the opinion that we are asking too much from the Chinese. Through the whole of his correspondence, indeed, there is breathed on his part a spirit of conciliation which animates me with the utmost hope that we shall be able, with his assistance and the great demonstration of force which we are about to make—for we could not carry our views into effect without such a demonstration—to place our relations with the Chinese empire upon a satisfactory footing. I shall now say no more on the subject, but when the House goes into Committee I shall be prepared to explain the circumstances and amount of the Vote which we are about to ask you to grant this evening.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I quite concur with the right hon. Gentleman that the discussion on this important subject is one which need not assume a party character. The late Government, I am aware, appointed Mr. Bruce, and we should be very much to blame if we endeavoured to escape from any responsibility which attaches to us in this matter. But, while I agree with the right hon. Gentleman to this extent, I am sorry to be obliged to add that he has not in the course of his observations relieved me from that disappointment with which I heard the statement of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. In making that statement I think the noble Lord has hardly acted up to the promise which he made on a former occasion, when I understood him to say that at no distant date—as soon as the despatches which he then expected should have been received—he would make a full explanation to the House as to the policy of the Government with respect to the position of affairs in China. We are still left in ignorance upon that point. The subject is one in reference to which I am sure the Government cannot complain that they have been subjected to undue pressure from this side of the House. The contrary, indeed, has been the case; for owing to the great interest which we have felt in the discussions on the Budget, on matters of foreign policy, and the approaching debate on the Reform Bill, the attention of Parliament has been to a great extent diverted from the consideration of this most important question. This matter involves considerations of the first importance. It involves what are hereafter to be our relations with that great and peculiar people, the Chinese; it involves an immense amount of trade with that quarter of the world,—I am sorry to say, at this moment it involves the question whether or not we are to embark in a most costly and difficult war; and, lastly, it involves the question of what is the becoming conduct for the Government of this country to take after that most disastrous reverse Her Majesty's arms sustained at the mouth of the Peiho. I think, too, that that most unfortunate event involves the question in such extreme difficulty as to entitle the Government to the support and assistance of the House. Approaching this difficult and embarrassing question in this spirit, I quite admit that, after that unhappy affair at the mouth of the Peiho, it is the undoubted duty of our Government to see that our power and prestige in the East are not diminished. On that account I am not disposed to find any fault with the Government for having sent out a powerful but which was described to him by the hon. Member for Rochdale in terms he quoted to the House, and to the justice of which I entirely subscribe. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will not suspect me of any intention or spirit of flattery when I say that I think that speech was the finest and most impressive I ever heard in this House. I only hope the right hon. Gentleman has not forgotten the sentiments he then expressed. The noble Lord, the Foreign Secretary, also addressed us on that occasion. He was not then, as now, sitting side by side with the noble Viscount. He then stood in very different relations to the noble Lord from those in which he is now placed; and I believe neither the House nor the noble Lord can have forgotten the emphasis with which he, in a spirit of equity and wisdom, in which I heartily concurred, bade this House be just and fear not. That was the maxim the noble Lord laid down; and in the present difficult and anxious state of our relations with China I earnestly hope that the noble Lord will now act on that principle,—be just and fear not. The noble Lord told us to-night that he would not raise any question as to the conduct of Mr. Bruce; and I have no desire to force any discussion on that conduct more than is unavoidable. But I must say that the extent to which the noble Lord to-night abstained from giving us any view of the intended policy of the Government does force us, in my opinion, to enter in some degree on the conduct of Mr. Bruce, because that conduct lies at the very root of the policy which the Government are to adopt. Well, I have stated that I think the Government are right in making a demonstration of force in China; but the noble Lord—and that is one of the respects in which he has told us the policy of the Government—the noble Lord made an announcement to-night, in confirmation of what he told us on a former occasion, to which the hon. Member for Birmingham did not allude,—that one of the demands which the Government do intend to make of the Government of China is an apology for the transactions that took place at the mouth of the Peiho. The hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir J. Elphinstone) adverted to that demand of the Government, and in terms of approbation. I know not how far the views I entertain on this subject will find favour in the general opinion of the House, but this is a matter of so much importance, involving consequences of such moment to this country, that I cannot stop to ask whether my views may find favour in this House, or to what extent they may be shared; but I feel it my duty to state those views, and I wish to put it to the House and the Government whether, looking to the unfortunate origin of that transaction at the mouth of the Peiho, looking to the whole conduct of Mr. Bruce in this matter, we are entitled to demand an apology from the Chinese or not. If this is to be your policy—if you are to demand an apology from the Government of China, that decision involves of necessity two questions—first, do the facts as they occurred, acting in that spirit of justice to which I have adverted, justify the demand for an apology? And the second question which of necessity arises is this—if that apology should be refused, what is the alternative? Let me advert for a moment to a question on which the noble Lord has not touched to-night; nor, indeed, has the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Herbert) referred to it, but I have heard it adverted to before—namely, that the instructions of Lord Malmesbury to Mr. Bruce under the late Government were such as to justify the course pursued by Mr. Bruce. Now, I entirely dispute that proposition. [Lord JOHN RUSSELL: I did not say so.] I did not impute it to the noble Lord; on the contrary, I said he did not say so; but the statement has been made by others, and I cannot help adverting to it. Now, I can see nothing in the instructions of Lord Malmesbury that called on Mr. Bruce to make that attack off Peiho. With the permission of the House I will read the very few words of Lord Malmesbury's despatch which really bear on this question. [Mr. BRIGHT: What is the date of the despatch?] I quote the first despatch in the printed papers, dated March 1, 1859. The only instructions to Mr. Bruce, which appear to bear on this point, are contained in these words:—

"The Admiral in command of Her Majesty's naval forces in China has been directed to send up with you to the mouth of the Peiho a sufficient naval force, and unless any unforeseen circumstances should appear to make another arrangement more advisable, it would seem desirable that you should reach Tien-tsin in a British ship of war."

I know no other expressions from which it is possible to say that Lord Malmesbury had instructed Mr. Bruce to force his way up the Peiho; and that is the question upon which the matter will ultimately turn. I will not at this late hour detain the House by entering into these despatches more than is necessary to establish this point; but I desire to show that Mr. Bruce was not justified in ordering the attack in the Peiho, therefore I will at once direct the attention of the House to the despatch Mr. Bruce received from the Chinese Commissioners Kweiliang and Hwashana. I think that Mr. Bruce acted with discretion in refusing to negotiate at Shanghai. It is quite clear that, for reasons of their own they wished to detain him at Shanghai and there re-open negotiations; but Mr. Bruce, I repeat, acted with judgment in refusing to remain at Shanghai to negotiate. But when the Chinese Commissioners found that Mr. Bruce was determined to proceed on his mission to Peking, and would not re-open the negotiations, that very important despatch was written on the 12th of June by them, on which mainly, if not solely, turns the question as to the propriety of Mr. Bruce's attack on the Peiho forts. That despatch says:—

"The Commissioners feeling that it would not be correct that the day appointed for that purpose [to exchange the ratifications of the treaty], which was near at hand, should be passed, after due deliberation decided that the only course open to them was to represent the matter fully to His Majesty the Emperor, and to request him to be pleased specially to select some high officer who might proceed to Tien-tsin to make arrangements for Mr. Bruce's reception. Their memorial was sent forward at the rate of 200 miles a day, and would arrive at the latest in some eight or nine days at Peking, so that it might be assumed that when Mr. Bruce and the Ministers of France and America reached Tien-tsin the Imperial Commissioners could not fail to have arrived as well, and so the exchange of treaties in Peking would be effected by the time fixed for the purpose. . . . It behoves them, therefore, in obedience to His Majesty's commands, to return post haste to the capital. As they have prayed His Majesty to detach a high officer to act as agent in the matter, Mr. Bruce will be certainly enabled to arrive at his destination by the time appointed. With the peaceful relations now established between the two nations, nothing certainly will be done that is not in conformity with the provisions of the treaty, and the Commissioners accordingly pray Mr. Bruce at once to put away all misgiving on that subject. . . . His mission being a pacific one (or as he comes speaking peace) his treatment by the Government of China will not fail to be in every way courteous; and it is the sincere wish of the Commissioners that relations of friendship may be from this time forth consolidated, and that on each side confidence may be felt in the good faith and justice of the other."

Now, I wish to ask the Government what diplomatists in any country could have held language more perfectly fair—more perfectly consistent with the bond fide intention to execute the treaty at Tien-tsin than that which I have read? Could Mr. Bruce take the slightest exception to that language? On the contrary, was not Mr. Bruce bound, after receiving this letter from the Commissioners, at any rate to have waited the course of events the Commissioners had indicated in that despatch? I cannot see that he had the least pretence for doubting the proposal they made. But what did Mr. Bruce do on the receipt of this despatch? The despatch was dated the 12th of June. Eight or nine days were necessary, on their own showing, to communicate with Peking. Mr. Bruce then proceeded to the mouth of the Peiho, and, without waiting to see whether or not these Commissioners were acting in good faith, he gave directions to Admiral Hope to break through the barriers and force the passage of the Peiho. What is the language of Mr. Bruce on this subject? In the despatch in which he describes the failure of the attack on the Peiho, he writes thus to Lord Malmesbury:—

"After a long and anxious consultation M. de Bourboulon and I decided that we ought to adhere strictly to the course laid down in our letters to Kweiliang at Shanghai, and that we should insist, as much for the sake of our future communications with Peking as for the successful accomplishment of the mission now confided to us, on the right of using the river as the natural highway to the capital."

"I do not think that in any case we ought to have allowed our right to choose the only expeditious and commodious route to the capital to be questioned."

I speak with diffidence on this point in the presence of those conversant with such questions when I say I believe that Mr. Bruce is not supported by the law of nations in laying down the proposition that they had the right to choose the route by which they should proceed to the Chinese capital. But, however that may be, I hold that he was wrong in not waiting longer to see how far the promises made by the Chi-

these transactions with the idea that the Chinese authorities ought to be approached in a very different spirit from that wise caution and moderation which, in my opinion, would have best enabled him to perform the difficult duty assigned to him. Well, what happened immediately afterwards? Not waiting for the answer to the message sent to Peking, Mr. Bruce directed the unfortunate attack on the 25th of June to be made on the forts of the Peiho. At 9 o'clock on that morning a junk came alongside Her Majesty's ship Magicienne, the vessel in which Mr. Bruce was stationed, and which was anchored about nine miles from the forts, bringing an offer from the Governor General of Pecheliee to welcome the British Envoy at Peh-tang-ho, whence he might proceed to Peking by land. The Secretary of State for War has told us we are apt to be very wise after the event. I admit that we are arguing this question with that advantage; but surely we must not allow that consideration to deter us from endeavouring to place ourselves, as nearly as we can, in the position in which our Minister stood at the time, and then passing a fair judgment on his conduct. Why, I ask, was the Magicienne at a distance of nine miles from the scene of action? That was not the case with the American Minister. He was on the spot at the critical moment, although far less interested in what was going on than our representative. When the communication reached Mr. Bruce inviting him to Peh-tang-ho, in my opinion he ought, if possible, to have countermanded his orders for the attack. For what was the invitation he received? Here is the translation of the Chinese communication:—

"Heng, Governor General of Chili, &c., makes a communication. In obedience to the commands of His Imperial Majesty, the Governor General has come to Peh-tang-ho, a port (or harbour) to the northward of Ta-koo, to be of any service (or to do the honours to) Her Britannic Majesty's Envoy. As the negotiators of the treaty made last year, His Majesty the Emperor has issued a decree commanding the Chief Secretary of State, Kweiliang, and the President of the Board of Civil Office, Hwashana, to return from Shanghai to Peking and they may arrive any day. If the Envoy of Her Britannic Majesty will have the goodness to wait until the Chief Secretary Kweiliang and his colleagues reach the capital, they will thereupon receive him at once, and he will enter the capital to exchange the treaties (or will exchange the treaties in the capital)."

General of the province on the morning of the 25th of June, although it may not have been the direct result of the previous communications from Shanghai, does not exactly correspond with it in spirit? Was it not a carrying out, as far as the Chinese authorities could do so, of their avowed intention to receive our Minister with all proper honour, and expedite his mission to Peking? I must express my strong opinion that after what passed at Shanghai—after the despatch of the 12th of June, Mr. Bruce was not warranted in ordering the attack of the 25th. Still less, after the invitation sent to him on the morning of the 25th, was the unhappy attack on the forts to be justified. And if it was not justified, are we entitled to demand an apology? The Chinese only did what they had a perfect right to do in barring the entrance of the river. I admit that their conduct at the mouth of the Peiho was not ingenuous or straightforward. [Lord J. RUSSELL: Hear, hear.] The noble Lord cheers, but he is not able to tell me who was responsible for the deception practised on that occasion. The Chinese pretended that there were only militia there; and when Admiral Hope sent in to make certain demands he was met by people who said that the barrier was placed there only to exclude rebels. Nobody, surely, will contend, considering the character of the nation with whom we have to deal, and after the communications received from high officials and persons in authority, that because of these doubtful proceedings at the mouth of the Peiho, the responsibility for which cannot be traced to any one, we are justified in using force to choose our route to the Chinese capital. For, remember, there was no dispute as to our Minister going to Peking to exchange the ratifications. The Chinese Commissioners at Shanghai fully conceded that point. The only question was as to the route to be taken; and under those circumstances it cannot be maintained that we were warranted in attempting to break through the barriers, and in declaring that we would go by the Peiho, and in no other way. But supposing we demand an apology, and it is refused, what is to be the alternative? Are Her Majesty's Government going to embark the country in a protracted and sanguinary war with China on so doubtful a plea? I hope not. I think the Government are right in requiring that the treaty shall be ratified, and in making a powerful demonstration to support that demand. But I take exception to their intention to insist on an apology, unless they are prepared—which I hope they are not—to make the refusal of that apology a cause of war. At the same time, if they are not so prepared, it would be most unwise to demand the apology at all. The noble Lord alluded to a very doubtful point—namely, how far the Ambassadors have power over the commanders of the naval and military forces, and the extent to which they could direct the operations. What does the noble Lord mean by “the Ambassadors stopping those operations?” Have instructions gone out to commence hostilities before the arrival of the Ambassadors? That is a point on which the House ought to be informed. I believe by the time the two Ambassadors reach China the season will be very far advanced for military enterprises. With regard to the appointment of Lord Elgin, I am happy to say I make no exception or objection. I believe that, looking to the great knowledge which that noble Lord must have acquired of the habits and usages of the Chinese, the Government could not have made a better selection of their negotiator; but I confess I am anxious to learn on what footing Mr. Bruce is to remain. Is he to continue in a diplomatic position, or will Lord Elgin supersede him? Are both of them to receive salaries from the country as Ambassadors to China? In conclusion, I may express a hope that the noble Lord at the head of the Government will be able to give us some more satisfactory information with regard to the future policy of the country than has yet been afforded by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs or the right hon. Gentleman who has last addressed us.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, that no one was more ready than himself to assent to the doctrine of the hon. Member for Birmingham, when speaking of Admiral Hope, that personal gallantry was no excuse for alleged misdirected operations; and he ventured to think that Admiral Hope himself would willingly subscribe to that doctrine. The real question was, whether the hon. Member for Birmingham was justified in asserting that these operations at the Peiho were undertaken without a reasonable prospect of success. He did not allege that there was any cause to suspect an ambushade, and he had not seen any statement in Admiral Hope's despatches to that effect. He would put the case on broader and more general grounds, and maintain that if we looked to the whole history of our wars in China there was nothing in this case to justify Admiral Hope in refusing to obey the instructions he had received. There was no ground for asserting that the Admiral made no reconnaissance, the fact was that he took all the means in his power to obtain information; and admitting the truth of everything that had been stated, that the forts were in a state of sufficient preparation, better than Chinese forts usually were; that foreign auxiliaries were present, and that Russian caps and Russian faces were seen behind the entrenchments, was there in these circumstances sufficient reason for him to decline the contest? He would put it to any professional man, or even unprofessional man, present whether he would not have been held to have disgraced himself had he done so? But there was also another point of view from which it was fair to look at the question. It has been said that the operations in China had been wholly unsuccessful; but was it true that they were so in every part? Until the hon. Member for Birmingham made his observations to-night, the opinions expressed in the House had been so generally favourable to Admiral Hope that he had not prepared himself with references to despatches; but this, he remembered, that the statement by Admiral Hope was distinct—and, indeed, it was admitted by the Chinese themselves, though, of course, with some attempted explanation—that the firing from his guns silenced those of the forts. Now, if the Admiral was able to conduct the operations so far successfully, was it possible to say that he was not justified in undertaking them? He now came to the disastrous part of the affair—the landing. He knew that Admiral Hope took upon himself the responsibility of that part of the operations; but, he asked, was he morally responsible for it? He stood by his men, and fought his best—when he was completely disabled the command fell into other hands, and though with the feelings of a gentleman he took on himself the responsibility of the whole operations, it was too much to say that because that part that was not conducted by him personally had proved unsuccessful he was responsible for all the disaster. He did not wish further to enter into the question except to protest, with the hon. Member for Birmingham, against the further waste of gallant lives in such operations. He was not one of those who looked for the millennium of peace, when wars were to cease, but he remembered hearing an opinion expressed by Sir Robert Peel, in which he agreed, that no war undertaken for mere pecuniary or commercial purposes was ever worth the cost of blood and treasure expended. He did not object to war when honour, interest, safety, or justice, demanded it, but he did object to wars such as these Chinese wars, in which success brought no honour, and failure could only be atoned for by devoted personal heroism.

MR. CUMMING BRUCE said, he could not refrain from asking the permission of the House to read an extract from a letter of the representative of Her Majesty in China with regard to the conduct of that gallant admiral, on whom the hon. Member for Birmingham, having wasted all his eulogy and admiration on the Emperor of the French, had thought fit to pour the vials of his indignation. The British Minister wrote of the gallant officer, with whom he was acting,

“Our Admiral is a hero of the antique stamp; such coolness, pluck, and devotion to his duty; he is a great character, say of him what we will. If he underrated his foe, I should like to know who did not; and, as he had never fought with Chinese, he could only form his opinion from what other people had told him. People in England talk as if he went in for attack; but that is not so. We went in to ascend the river, the only high road, and that up which Lord Macartney had gone. No Chinese authorities had told us we were not to take that route; the forts, they declared, were not put up with any intention against us; and no soldiers or banners had been seen there the week before. The gun-boats lay inside the bar, and we had no reason to doubt that, if they advanced boldly and peaceably, to carry out the instructions we had received, they might ascend the river without any such opposition being offered.”

These were the remarks of our Minister in China. He also held in his hand a letter from a gallant French officer who served out there, and who said that “there was nothing to criticise in the conduct of Admiral Hope; but that great praise was due to him for having covered with high honour the most disastrous check which had ever been undergone in China;”

The French officer went on to remark that,

“properly speaking, there was no attack made, but that the object sought was only to open the passage; and that, in the opinion of those best qualified to judge of the moral value of the Chinese resistance, it might well have been presumed that intimidation alone would have sufficed to remove it.”

With regard to the landing, the same French writer thought that, even if this had been done by Admiral Hope's authority, it was a step which he might have been justified in taking. Our Minister, Mr. Bruce, had been blamed by the hon. Member for Birmingham, inasmuch as he received a message from the Governor General of the province at nine o'clock in the morning, and yet the attack went on; that he took no notice of it, and did not suspend operations against the Chinese. But the facts were these. The booms were blown up on the night of the 24th. On the 25th two junks arrived, with provisions, and a letter from the Governor General of the province. There was some informality in the letter, and Mr. Bruce immediately went on board the French Minister's ship to communicate with him. While he was there, consulting with his French colleague, the firing began. The firing continued till night. It was supposed that he might have stopped the firing; but the fact was, that the Magicienne was anchored outside the bar, ten miles from shore. No news came during the day; the Ambassadors were most anxious, but the state of the tide rendered it impossible to communicate with the Admiral. In fact, all the boats of the Magicienne were employed inside the bar, with the gun-boats; and they had no other boat capable of facing such weather. One member of the Embassy, with the master of the Magicienne, did, in fact, endeavour, in the ship's gig, to communicate with the shore, but found it was utterly impossible, and was obliged to return, re infectâ. The conduct of the Minister, in not communicating with the Admiral, was not, therefore, so unjustifiable and inhuman as some hon. Gentlemen declared. Another thing which Mr. Bruce had been unduly condemned for was, not having adopted the course which the American Minister did, in proceeding by another way to Peking. It was very easy to criticise after the event. But, on his return from the capital, the American Minister called upon our Ambassador on his way down, and authorized him to state officially that, after his experience at Peking, he (the American Minister) was perfectly persuaded that Mr. Bruce had followed the only course which could have led to any satisfactory result. Mr. Bruce had been much blamed for simply acting upon his instructions, which were to obtain the ratification of this treaty at Peking, and at Peking only; he was not entitled to receive it at Shanghai, but he was to insist on all the tokens of respect due to the Minister of a great and equal power. If he had consented to go to Peking by any other road than that only known and recognized highway by which Lord Macartney and Lord Amherst had gone before him, this would have been, in the eyes of the Chinese, a confession of inferiority and a submission to insult. If he had done so, he would have violated his instructions, and thrown away all the advantages gained by the Treaty of Tien-tsin. He (Mr. C. Bruce) regretted this evasion, on the part of the Chinese, of their treaty engagements, but he did not yet think what had happened would necessarily lead to a renewal of the war, if the negotiation was conducted in a proper spirit. He hoped a renewal of the war would be avoided, because it would be a war in which our success would itself be a calamity for our own interests, inasmuch as it would lower the prestige of the Chinese Government, the only means of preserving order amongst two or three hundred millions of people; and if it brought about a state of anarchy in China, that would be cutting up our commerce by the roots. But he thought the effect of this defeat—as he was afraid it must be called—at the mouth of the Pehio had been much exaggerated; and that the Chinese Government, perhaps, “frightened at the sound themselves had made,” would submit to the terms which our Ambassador would offer; and that nothing would occur to prevent the peaceful ratification of the treaty. A great deal had been said about the worthlessness of the stipulations of this treaty that we should have a Minister resident at Peking; but he was at a loss to reconcile the description which had been given by the hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) with the miserable and unsatisfactory state of our former relations with China. It must be remembered, however, that three Governments in succession had recognized the necessity of having a British Minister at Peking. He must also remind the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. B. Cochrane) that Lord Elgin was expressly precluded by his instructions from making a treaty which did not confer a right to enter Peking. It must also be remembered that the people of China were not averse to our expedition; the gallant Admiral admitted that the peasants themselves came down to assist him in getting the gun-boats up the river. What we had really to overthrow was the authority of the mandarins. Mr. Bruce had been blamed for going to China with a preconceived notion that everybody was against him. But Mr. Bruce thought that the war party had recovered its influence in China, and that he could obtain the treaty only at the place where he was authorized to do so, namely, at Peking. But what would have been said if Mr. Bruce, from the fear that his entrance would be opposed, had turned tail towards the coast? Would he not in that case have deserved the censure which had been thrown upon him? In his opinion Mr. Bruce had been most unfairly and unjustifiably attacked, and he trusted the House would excuse him for having felt it his duty to state the subject to the House in the way in which he had.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I entirely agree with the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Pakington), that when you are judging the conduct of a man, you ought to imagine yourself to be in the situation in which he was placed when he performed the act upon which you are passing judgment, and I think that that is the way in which the conduct of Mr. Bruce ought to be considered. What were Mr. Bruce's instructions? He was instructed to exchange the ratifications of the Treaty of Tien-tsin; he was told that those ratifications were, in accordance with an Article of the treaty, to be exchanged at Peking; he was therefore ordered to go to Peking, and he was told to go by the Peiho. He was told that from the mouth of the Peiho he was to go up the river in a ship of war as far as Tien-tsin, and he was informed that the Admiral was to accompany him with a sufficient force. Now, what is the meaning of "a sufficient force?" The only interpretation which anybody in Mr. Bruce's place could place upon the expression "a sufficient force," must have been a force sufficient to enable him to go from the mouth of the Peiho to Tien-tsin in a ship of war, and thence to proceed by land to Peking and exchange the ratifications. But it is said that there was a qualifying clause—namely, that he was to pursue that course unless unforeseen circumstances should lead him to adopt a more advisable one. I think that Mr. Bruce was perfectly justified in thinking that there were no such circumstances to induce him to alter his course. The right hon. Baronet has quoted a letter from the Chinese Commissioners, which he stated was very fair and friendly, and indicated peaceable intentions; but what did that letter invite him to do? Why, to go to the mouth of the Peiho, for the purpose of going thence to Peking to exchange the ratifications. He goes to the Peiho, and what does he find there? Does he find at the mouth of the Peiho an official communication saying, "The Government don't like you to go up this way; you must go in some other direction; your passage here will be obstructed by order of the Government?" Nothing of the kind. He finds an impediment. The right hon. Baronet says that every nation has a right to barricade its own rivers. Against an enemy no doubt it has; but you do not barricade your rivers against a friend who is coming to complete a transaction which is to establish peace and friendship and commercial intercourse between you and the nation which he represents. The Ambassadors inquire, "What does this barricade mean, what is the intention of it?" and the answer is, "It is not put up by the Government, it is simply a little arrangement of self-defence established by the people of the district to protect themselves"—against whom? Against the English and French Ministers? No: "against pirates." But the Ambassadors were not pirates, therefore they had no reason to suppose that these barricades were established to stop their progress. Was there any officer of the Chinese Government there saying, "Here I am, and I tell you that you can't go up this way," or "Have the goodness to go another way?" Not a bit of it. The Ambassadors were told that there was no one there but militia and peasantry; nor was there any one in an official capacity under the Chinese Government to offer any obstruction to their progress. Under these circumstances it really appears to me that Mr. Bruce and Admiral Hope were perfectly justified in taking steps to remove the impediment, to remove the obstacles, which did not bear any semblance whatever to an official refusal, and to do that which they came authorized and invited by the Chinese Commissioners to do. Did they begin the attack? No. They began removing the barrier; it was the Chinese who began the attack. It was not necessary for our forces to commence firing. All they wanted was quietly to remove the obstructions in the river, and to pursue the course which Mr. Bruce and M. de Bourboulon had been instructed to take, and had been invited by the Chinese Commissioners to pursue. But was the Peiho the wrong way? Why, the Peiho was so entirely admitted by the Chinese Government to be the proper read by which foreign Ministers should go to Peking, that in the treaty they have concluded with Russia—a treaty which was concluded in May, a month or six weeks before these transactions—there is a stipulation that the Russian Minister, whenever he comes by sea, shall go to Peking by the Peiho. That river was, therefore, acknowledged by the Chinese Government to be the proper way for diplomatic agents to come, and they knew, moreover, that by our treaty of Nankin we were entitled to the privileges enjoyed by the most favoured nations, including that granted to the Russian Minister of going to Peking by the Peiho, the passage thus shut against us. I cannot, therefore, imagine any man placed in the situation of Mr. Bruce, knowing what had been the habitual practice, and with instructions to exchange the ratification of the treaty within a certain time—for, be it observed, the period assigned in the treaty for the exchange of the ratifications was upon the point of expiring—shrinking from the difficulties which he found to impede his course, and going away with the treaty unratified. If Mr. Bruce had done so he would have been justly chargeable with a neglect of duty. It would have been said, "You were told to go up the Peiho in a ship of war; you were told that the Admiral would accompany you with a sufficient force; there was a sufficient force; why did you run away, and allow the honour of the country to be tarnished and its engagements set at naught when you had the means of discharging the mission entrusted to you?" But the right hon. Baronet says, that on the morning of the day on which the attack took place, at nine o'clock, Mr. Bruce received a letter from the Chinese authorities, inviting him to go to Peking by another way. The right hon. Baronet read that letter very glibly, and if Mr. Bruce had received it as it appears in the blue-book he would have read it very glibly too; but, unfortunately, the letter was in Chinese, and took a considerable time to be translated and made intelligible. No less than two hours elapsed before the letter could be understood, and then Mr. Bruce had to communicate with the French Minister, who was in another vessel at some distance; and I am told that, owing to the stormy nature of the day, the force of the currents, and the very insufficient boat in which alone Mr. Bruce could go, all the other boats being with the squadron inside the bar, he was a long time in reaching the representative of France. By the time he had explained the state of affairs to the French Minister the firing had begun, and it was too late to make any change in his arrangements. But supposing the Chinese letter to have reached him in time, would it have been wise or proper in him to accept the invitation to go to Peking by the road pointed out by the writer? We know what that road was. The American Minister did accept the invitation, and we know how he was carried through the country in a wooden box on two wheels, without light or air; how between Tien-tsin and Peking he was obliged to get out and walk because the jolting was so intolerable, and it was impossible to submit any longer to the torture of remaining in his "carriage of honour;" and how when he at last arrived at Peking he was kept a close prisoner, was not allowed to communicate with the resident Russian Minister, was not permitted to exchange ratifications at Peking, but was sent back for that purpose to Tien-tsin. Would this country have been pleased to be told that its representative, who had been instructed not to submit in his passage up to Peking to any degrading ceremony—because it must be remembered that Mr. Bruce was warned by Lord Malmesbury that what might be done on his first arrival would be made a precedent for all future occasions—had been dragged through the country in a covered cart, and so jolted by the way that, in order to avoid a dislocation of his joints, he had been compelled to walk a considerable part of the road? In China there are three modes of honour or of degradation. Those persons whom the Chinese desire to honour are carried in sedan chairs; those who are next in rank are allowed to ride; and none but the very lowest class of people are put in covered boxes and jolted over the rough roads of that country. I say, then, that if I had been in Mr. Bruce's situation and had received the Chinese letter in time, nothing could have induced me to accept the invitation which it conveyed. No "unforeseen circumstance" could have justified me in undergoing the unforeseen degradation and personal inconvenience which I have attempted to describe. As to the conduct of the Admiral, enough has been already said upon that subject, but everybody must admit that there never was a greater display of heroism than in the attack at the mouth of the Peiho, not only on the part of the Admiral, but also on the part of all under his command. cial intercourse with China than Russia has, more subjects resident in that country, and therefore greater need for direct communication with the central Government of the empire. It may be, no doubt, a question of discretion whether we should exercise the right of having a permanent mission at Peking. That is a question which would undoubtedly require much consideration. There are many reasons, I am ready to admit, why the position of a European resident at Peking might, at all events during part of the year, not be a fit position in which to place a man. But the right of going to Peking and the right of communicating with the Government of Peking are rights essential if we want our subjects and their property to be secure. Another stipulation is that we should be allowed to navigate the great river Yang-tse-Kiang, and to trade with the towns on the banks of that river. At present, while the rebellion continues, and the great towns are reduced to deserted ruins, it is not a right that can be exercised to any great advantage; but it is very important with a view to the extension of trade with China. It is said that we should take possession of Nankin and govern there. I am afraid that town is not likely to afford good accommodation either to our troops or to our commerce; but the right of going up the river Yang-tse-Kiang and trading with the populous towns in the interior is of great importance in the prosecution of our commerce with China. The third stipulation of importance is, that British subjects should have the right to travel in the interior of China with passports. That also is of great importance to our commercial intercourse, and it is a stipulation not at all repugnant to the habits and feelings of the Chinese. People are apt to imagine that what took place at Canton will take place everywhere else. But that is a great mistake. The bad feeling existing towards us at Canton was, I believe, not only artificially got up, but an exception to the rule. At Shanghai there is a large European community living in perfect amity with the Chinese, visiting and associating with them, and our residents go into the interior a certain distance without any molestation from the people of the country. I say our policy with China is to obtain the ratification of the Treaty, and to obtain for our subjects in China freedom for themselves, and security for their commerce and property. We want no conquest. It forms no part of the intention with which this expedition is sent to conquer any portion of China, or to obtain possession of any part of China more than we now possess. But we do think, and I am persuaded the country is of that opinion, that it would be disgraceful to this country—that we should lose our position in the East—if, having sustained that disaster which took place at the mouth of the Peiho, we simply allowed things to remain as they are, if we allowed the Treaty of Tien-tsin to remain unratified, and if we did not require from the Chinese Government the satisfaction which we have demanded. It is said that we are pressing the Emperor of China too hard if we demand an apology. If there is to be any redress I think an apology the least which any individual or any nation could demand for an outrage like that which was committed at the Peiho. But there is no reason to suppose that the Emperor of China is disinclined to give us that apology; because we have reason to understand that the term which he has given to the transaction is that it was an isolated fact, arising chiefly from the impetuosity of the British commander; that it was not to interrupt in any degree the friendly intercourse of the two nations; and that he has actually opened to British commerce one of the ports which, by the treaty, was to be added to the five. The Emperor of China is not in a temper of mind indignantly to refuse to make an apology for an act which he disclaims as the result of any orders which he himself had given. When I am asked what is our policy with regard to China, I say that our policy is to require the fulfilment of the Treaty of Tien-tsin, to have by virtue of that treaty increased commercial intercourse with China, but not to involve the two nations in a war which may not be necessary, and not to acquire by conquest any additional cession of territory. With regard to the importance of trade with China, I only ask hon. Gentlemen to go back in their recollection to the feeling of satisfaction which was excited in this country at the time we received the Treaty of Nankin. Let them recollect the general applause of Sir Henry Pottinger for having concluded a treaty which every one believed was of the utmost advantage to this country, and the expectations that the treaty would do great things. The commerce with China has increased very much; in virtue of that treaty we have made an establishment at Shanghai, which is really becoming now a European settlement. But there were things not provided for by the Treaty of Nankin, which are provided for by the Treaty of Tien-tsin, and I do not anticipate that I go beyond the probability of events when I say that when those two treaties are faithfully executed, opening all the resources of China to Europe and America—for we require no exclusive advantage,—they will confer great benefit on the nations of Europe and America, and tend at the same time to improve and increase the prosperity of the Chinese themselves.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he remembered hearing the noble Lord the First Minister, three years ago, defend a very much worse cause against the eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and against the weight of the intellect and patriotism of the House. It was true that the noble Lord on that occasion sustained a defeat, but he cashiered the House of Commons for it. He admitted that the noble Lord succeeded in that move. He had the country with him, because it was thought he had shown pluck in having maintained that there was a necessity for thrashing the Chinese and compelling them to enter into commercial treaties at the point of the bayonet. The noble Viscount spoke exactly in the same vein that evening as he had three years ago. He showed no penitence, he exhibited no sign of remorse; he appeared as ready to commence war with the Chinese now as he was then. He (Mr. Whiteside) had no intention of attacking Mr. Bruce; but he could not allow the matter to pass without stating what he thought to have been the error of that gentleman. The Earl of Malmesbury in the despatch conveying his instruction to Mr. Bruce made use of this language,—

“And unless any unforeseen circumstances should appear to make another arrangement more desirable, it would be desirable that you should reach Tien-tsin in a British ship of war.”

Could there be in the mind of any man who read that an idea that Lord Malmesbury's intention was that Mr. Bruce should make war on the Chinese. Was it not clear that Lord Malmesbury's intention was that in order to maintain the dignity of Great Britain, Mr. Bruce ought to go up the river in a ship of war? But was that the spirit in which Mr. Bruce did go up the river? Was the language used by that gentleman in his despatch to the Foreign Secretary such as to conciliate the Emperor of China? In a despatch written by him he spoke of the necessity of "inspiring the Emperor and his councillors with the conviction that what was once demanded from them would be exacted," and again,—“I am determined to assume an attitude and tone best calculated to make the Chinese submit quietly to my very unpalatable proposals, by impressing them with the opinion that these concessions are inevitable unless they are prepared to draw the sword.” Why, that gentleman was determined to fight, and went with a resolution of fighting anybody he could find to fight with. The noble Lord was incorrect in saying that Mr. Bruce could not have acted when he got the letter in the morning, because Mr. Bruce himself said,—

“It was difficult to communicate with the Admiral (who was nine miles distant), but I should not have been deterred by the informality of the letter if the contents had been satisfactory.”

Mr. Bruce could have reached the Admiral in a steamer if he had liked the tone of the letter, and so, not liking the tone of the letter, he had a battle. As a humane man, the noble Lord must regret the loss of life on that occasion, but the tone of the noble Lord's speech was calculated to encourage the Ambassador to go there and commit the same offence. But he (Mr. Whiteside) would ask the noble Viscount in what book he found that an Ambassador had in the country to which he was accredited a right to force his way up a river and bombard any forts which might present an obstacle to him? Would an Ambassador from this country to France have a right to so act if he were refused a passage up the Seine? Instead of acting as he had done, Mr. Bruce should have written home and consulted the noble Viscount who would have been sure to recommend a pacific policy. The noble Viscount had explained to the House what his Chinese policy was. As well as he (Mr. Whiteside) could understand, it was this—that no matter how many thousand Chinese lives might be sacrificed thereby, we—in strict alliance with our friend the Emperor of the French—were to force our way to Peking. We were to blow up their forts and bombard their towns, and then say, Good people, we are a trading community; we have come here to extend your commerce and ours; we commence by violating all the rules of morals and humanity, but we have the authority of the First Minister in England, the First Minister in Europe, that this is a right policy. The noble Viscount was very desirous that our Ambassador should reach Peking; but if he got there would he sleep calmly? From all accounts it did not seem to be a comfortable place for an Ambassador. He (Mr. Whiteside) wished he had the eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to convince the noble Viscount that he was not right—though, by the way, the right hon. Gentleman had not convinced the noble Viscount three years ago about that miserable affair of the lorcha Arrow, and justice had now overtaken him for his failure, as he was obliged to propose Estimates for a Chinese expedition, that he must in principle condemn. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War seemed to be the only Member of the Cabinet who on this occasion spoke for peace. The noble Viscount to whom he (Mr. Whiteside) had listened that evening, as he always listened to him, with great attention—had spoken with great determination. Indeed, it was pleasant to hear the noble Viscount at such times. He always spoke with more than his usual animation, spirit, and eloquence, when he was preparing for a war. He had made the Chinese tremble before, and he was determined to make them tremble again—of course with the laudable object of improving our pacific and commercial relations with them. The noble Viscount asked the Chinese for an indemnity; but as the House had that evening heard, on good authority, the Chinese were too poor to pay it. He (Mr. Whiteside) hoped for peace; but whatever might be the result of this war the responsibility of it would rest on the noble Viscount's head, as did the responsibility of the last, though that, indeed, did not seem to affect him much, and when it was brought to a conclusion the House of Commons would have to discharge the bill.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, his conduct had been severely criticised by the hon. Member for Elgin, who had accused him of making misstatements; but he (Mr. Cochrane) was prepared to give the authority for every statement he made. The noble Viscount at the head of the Government had made a very jocose speech with respect to the miserable and unfortunate engagement in the Peiho. The noble Viscount admitted that the Chinese Commissioner sent a letter to Mr. Bruce, which Mr. Bruce could not read because it was in Chinese. Large estimates were voted for interpreters, and yet the noble Viscount made a joke about Mr. Bruce not being able to read a Chinese letter. He was surprised that the noble Viscount had used the language he uttered with regard to the calamitous event in the Peiho. The noble Viscount had also joked about the American Minister, Mr. Ward; but there existed the American President's as well as that Gentleman's own authority for the statement, that he was treated with the utmost distinction. He again expressed his regret that a Minister of the Crown should have made a joke of the sacrifice of life which had occurred at the action in the Peiho, and had embarked in a new war without a sufficient sense of the responsibility incurred.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The hon. Member has totally misunderstood and misrepresented what I said. I made a joke about the letter, and not about the action; and no man of common feeling, who respected himself, would unjustly impute to another that he made a joke of a great calamity. The hon. Gentleman imagined me to say that there was no interpreter present. That is not the case. There was an interpreter, but it took about two hours to get the letter interpreted so as to be properly understood.

SIR HARRY VERNEY thought that nothing was more important than that distant functionaries should be supported when they were in the right. What was said in that House was acutely felt, and great pain was inflicted by unjust observations. Mr. Bruce was distinctly instructed firmly to resist all the attempts of the Chinese to obstruct his progress to the capital; and he did not see, under the circumstances, how he could have acted otherwise than he had done. He was convinced that the most humane and merciful policy was to insist upon direct communication with the central authorities at Peking; for, as long as English traders were left at the mercy of the weak and corrupt officials in the provinces and on the sea-board, disputes and outrages would never cease.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

£850,000, Naval and Military operations in China (Vote of Credit).

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT hoped the Committee would allow him to proceed with the Vote of Credit for the Chinese war.

MR. DISRAELI objected to going into a Committee of Supply at that late hour. Moreover, the late Minister of War, who had an important statement to make to the Committee, had left the House under the impression that the Vote would not be taken at so advanced an hour of the night.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT assured the Committee that it was absolutely necessary the Vote should be passed that night.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the necessities of the public service required that this Vote should be taken at once. Unless that were done the Government could not meet its engagements without violating the law.

MR. DISRAELI said, if the right hon. Gentleman asserted on his word and authority that this was the last evening on which the Vote could be taken, he had nothing to say—except that the public business was not conducted as it ought to be.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was informed by those officials who watched minutely from day to day the public expenditure, and compared it with the legal authorities, that this was the last day upon which they could take the Vote with the certainty of being able to meet the regular demands of the public service in the different departments of the Government. The Vote could be criticised or impugned, if need were, when the Report was brought up.

MR. DISRAELI consented to the Vote being proceeded with, solely on the unequivocal statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and on no other consideration whatever.

Vote agreed to.

DIVORCE COURT.

QUESTION.

LORD LYNTHURST said, he wished to call the attention of their Lordships to the state of the Divorce Court, and to ask his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack if there was any objection to lay upon the table the Memorial of the Lord Chief Justice upon this subject. From the great pressure of business in that Court much inconvenience had been experienced by the Judges, and a great suffering by the suitors. The evil did not arise from any incapacity of the learned Judge who presided over the Court, but from the provisions of the Act by which the Court was constituted, and which enacted that no decree for the dissolution of any marriage could be pronounced except by a Court constituted of two Judges of the Common Law Courts in addition to the Judge Ordinary. Since the Divorce Court had been established, such had been the pressure of business in the Common Law Courts, that the time of the Judges was almost occupied there, and they really could afford but little or none to the Divorce Court without suffering the business of their own Courts to get into arrear. The consequence was, that unless the clause alluded to in the Act was repealed, further and greater inconvenience would arise—the only alternative being the appointment of additional Judges. According to the opinion which he (Lord Lyndhurst) entertained, as well as according to the opinion of some eminent persons whom he had consulted, the best course would be to repeal that clause in the Act. A single Judge was quite competent to deal with all cases which arose in that Court. A single Judge had presided in the old-established Ecclesiastical Court, and had discharged the business of that Court, so far as judicial duties were concerned, in a

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I have no hesitation in saying that I shall feel great pleasure in laying before your Lordships the Memorial of the Lord Chief Justice. At present it has rather the aspect of a friendly and private communication to myself; but, as a wish has been expressed by the noble and learned Lord that it should be laid on the table, I think it will be very expedient to do so. The Act of Parliament referred to is founded on a Report made by the Common Law Judges, and, in fact, drawn up by one of them; and their opinion, I think, is entitled to deep respect. As to the other point, the delays of the Divorce Court, I deeply regret them; I have done my best to provide a remedy for them. I should not propose to increase the number of the Judges, for that would be a great evil; but I have already expressed to your Lordships a desire to adopt the expedient the noble and learned Lord has proposed—to allow a single Judge to preside in the Divorce Court, and pronounce its decisions. I will undertake to lay on the table a Bill for this purpose.

LORD LYNTHURST expressed his acknowledgments to the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE TO FRANCE.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he asked a Question on Friday of his noble Friend opposite (the Duke of Newcastle) concerning the papers which had been produced relative to the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France, as to a very marked discrepancy between the despatches and certain telegrams which appeared in the morning papers; and he had also asked him respecting a Circular Despatch of M. Thouvenel explaining the views of the French Government, and whether that despatch would be laid upon the table. He would not have troubled their Lordships relative to the circular of M. Thouvenel but for certain observations which fell from, or rather escaped from, the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the House of Commons. His noble Friend opposite took him to task, he thought rather severely, for having overstepped the limits of discretion in putting his question; but if he were disposed to retaliate, he could point out, not only discrepancies between despatches and telegrams, but between Ministers, colleagues in the same Cabinet; for while the noble Duke was speaking in that House, in the other the noble Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs thought the despatch of so much consequence that, without communicating with his own colleagues, unasked and unsolicited, and while speaking on a wholly different point, he stated the substance of that communication to the House of Commons. He assured his noble Friend opposite that he would not press for information on this or any other matter with a view to embarrassing the Government, or in cases where the production of such information might be prejudicial to the interests of the public service; but he thought their Lordships would agree that if the noble Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was right in communicating to one House the contents of the despatch, he (the Earl of Carnarvon) could not be very wrong in asking a question concerning it in the other. The result, however, had been to show the country the exact position of affairs with regard to the annexation of Savoy; and he thought that the discussion, so far from weakening, had strengthened the hands of Her Majesty's Government, because it had elicited a feeling in Parliament and in the country as to this question which could not be mistaken. It was not yet, it would appear, perfectly certain that Savoy was annexed; it was not yet quite clear that the annexation was complete, though he feared they were at the verge of it. The noble Duke did not attempt to contradict the facts disclosed by the telegrams; and in other sources of information it was stated that two regiments of French soldiers were ordered into the country for the purpose of securing, he supposed, the freedom of election there. It might be impossible to arrest this proceeding for the annexation of Savoy, but it was of great consequence that it should not proceed further; and whether the annexation was to be limited to the Alps, and not to move in the direction of other countries and other frontiers, or not, it was most important that their Lordships should be in possession of all the information with which Her Majesty's Government could with safety to the public interest furnish them, so that the House might have the opportunity of discussing the subject and expressing an opinion upon it. He hoped that the promise which the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had given in the other

House, to produce the latest despatches for the information of Parliament would be carried out in their Lordships' House also, and that the noble Duke would lay upon the table of their Lordships' House as soon as possible the despatch of M. Thouvenel and the answer thereto of the Foreign Secretary.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE was sure that their Lordships would excuse him for not renewing the conversation which had taken place a few evenings since on this subject. His noble Friend had asked a question, and had a right to an answer; but he must observe that his noble Friend had misquoted the observations of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office. The promise which had been given by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, as he understood it, was not that the despatch would be produced immediately, but that as soon as the sanction of Her Majesty had been given to the answer to M. Thouvenel, and as soon as that answer had been forwarded, the despatch and reply would be laid before both Houses.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.—THE QUEEN'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (the EARL of ST. GERMANS) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address of Thursday last, as follows:—

“ I thank you for your loyal and dutiful Address. It is most gratifying to Me to receive your assurance, that after having considered the Treaty of Commerce which I have concluded with the Emperor of the French, you are prepared to take steps to assist Me in carrying out a measure which is intended to promote commercial and friendly intercourse between this country and France, and to afford an additional security for the continuance of peace.”

THE BALLOT.—RESOLUTION.

LORD TEYNHAM said, he rose to move a Resolution That it is expedient, in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, that the Votes of the Electors be taken by secret Ballot. Having presented petitions from Droitwich, Maidstone, Bath, Banbury, Haverfordwest, Chichester, Newport in the Isle of Wight, Redruth, Dundalk, Colchester, Norwich, Guildford, Chatham, and other places in favour of the ballot, he would, in introducing the subject, beg to recall to their Lordships' recollection that the working of our representative institutions involved two considerations of the utmost importance. There was, in the first place, a high moral question bearing strongly upon individual happiness and the welfare of our domestic life, and exercising a powerful influence on our present and future condition: and in the next place because our example would have a most important influence upon the other nations of the globe. There could be no doubt that, under the present system, a foul blot had been cast upon our institutions, which all our legislative efforts had hitherto failed to remove, but which, on the contrary, seemed to be deeper now than at any former period, and it behoved their Lordships to see if that blot could not be expunged, and a system established freer from corruption and more worthy the imitation of our Colonies as well as of independent States. If asked why he brought this subject before the attention of the House of Lords, he would reply that a political practice which had been adopted in ancient Greece and Rome, which was supposed by many to have been one of the secrets, if not the secret, of the prosperity of mediæval Venice, — which had been adopted by various sections of our own community, including the House of Lords, — which had been carried by the children of our forefathers to the eastern coast of North America, and had there become one of the settled institutions of the United States, and which, soon after representative institutions were granted to our colonies in the southern hemisphere, was adopted by them as a means of preventing the transplantation of the evils of the electoral system of the mother country, — was eminently worthy of the consideration of any assemblage of men. When the subject was first introduced "in another place" it met with but little support, but it was re-introduced year after year, and each year the fore the country now? There was not a man in England who did not deplore the evils of bribery and intimidation that now existed. Their Lordships well knew that every effort of the law to put these evils down had failed, and it became them then to make an effort to have the question brought fairly under consideration, in order that they might see whether the reports they had heard of those evils were founded in truth or were exaggerated. If he was asked why he sought to discuss that question in their Lordships' House, he answered that it had been debated in their Lordships' House before. In 1693, the 6th of William and Mary, he read in the Journals of the House that it was "Ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled that a Motion being made for the purpose of considering voting by ballot in their Lordships' House, and that the same be taken into consideration on Saturday, 17th February, at 11 o'clock, and all the Lords in and about town to be summoned to attend." That debate was several times adjourned, but at the last date to which it was adjourned he could find no reference to it in the Journals. The Motion, no doubt, had reference to balloting in their Lordships' House; but, if it were worthy of consideration in their own interests, surely it was much more worthy of consideration with reference to the application of it to the nation at large. It was not so very long since the practice existed in their Lordships' House. He could trace it down to 1820. The last Secret Committee ballotted for was on the 8th of June, 1820, to examine the papers laid before Parliament by command of His Majesty in reference to the conduct of the Queen. If that was so, why should they not try the experiment of the ballot upon the country at large? What was the position of the question before the country now? Parliament was apparently about to concede the franchise to a larger number of electors, but of those who were about to be admitted to the exercise of the franchise the majority would receive it with fear and trembling without the ballot, but would hail it as a boon of first-rate importance accompanied by the security which the ballot would confer. Upon these various grounds he thought he had not exceeded his duty in asking their Lordships to examine the question he had the honour to introduce to their notice. It had been his painful occupation to think over the evils connected with open voting.

and he felt he should not be doing his duty by the country or by the question if he abstained from asking their Lordships if they did not think and feel that there were bitter and disgraceful things connected with open voting which it was well worth their while to consider if by the ballot they could not be removed. In the morning of the day that House was a court of justice, and the interests of justice ought to be more highly prized by their Lordships, if possible, than by any other class of the community. Surely, for the purposes of legal advice one solicitor was sufficient for each candidate. But he had a letter from a solicitor on this subject on the evils of the present system, one of which, the writer stated, was the employment of every solicitor on one side or the other during an election, and that the candidate who retained the most lawyers was sure to gain his election. If a solicitor, engaged as an electioneering agent, used the influence which he gained by a knowledge of a man's affairs, he could thereby induce a man to vote contrary to his convictions; and if a man told a lie as a voter, how was he to be expected to tell the truth as a witness? Justice might miscarry, and therefore, in the interest of justice, he contended that it was our duty to make this change. The next evil in connection with open voting which he had to bring before their Lordships was that of drunkenness. If many were of opinion that he who employed the greatest number of solicitors gained his election, it might be equally asserted that he who retained the greatest number of public-houses had the best chance of success. But what was the result of that? They read it in the Reports of Election Committees, and they saw it with their own eyes in every country town where an election was going on. They knew there were great temptations to drunkenness on such occasions, and they knew to what that led. Then they came to treating. There might be those who would not sell themselves for money, but would sell themselves for drink, as many a man did when he was half-seas over. To what did the whole of that tend? It tended they knew to that which destroyed public morality, and which contaminated our electoral system with awful and disgraceful scenes of drunkenness. What was there besides? The religion they professed was one of peace, and proclaimed "peace, goodwill towards man." Their very magistrates were styled "justices of
